Honourable P R I V Y - C O U N C I L , & c .

MY LORD,

H E Author and Subject, here presented to your Lordship, have in themselves, the best of Claims to so great a Protection : For, neither can he, whose known Capacity, Industry, and Integrity, rendered him the Ornament of his own Profession, and of his Prince's Council, apply himself with more Success, than to one, who has risen, by the same Steps, to a nobler Eminence of Honour and Employment; nor ought any other, than the Guardian and Dispenser of publick Equity, to be acknowledged as the Patron of the Law of Nature and Nations. But the Ambition of this Address was alike needful, in Respect of all the Translators; as an Occasion of acknowledging the Influence which they feel from your Lordship's Authority, with Regard both to their Function and their Studies: Your Lordship esteeming it no less worthy a Part of your Character and Office, to support the most primitive Church, and the most regular Universities; than to preside over the Justice of the wisest State, or to direct the Policy of the happiest Reign.

I am,

With all Duty and Respect,

Your Lordship's most obliged

Humble Servant,

BASIL KENNETT.

*I*t is a Dilemma frequently urged against Versions of this Kind, that when a Subject lies remote from vulgar Consideration, Persons of Learning will pursue the Knowledge of it in the learned Languages, whilst others must remain equally Strangers to it in all, which yet abates proportionably of its Force, according as either the original Performance has been less fortunate in Stile; or as the Improvements of a modern Tongue have been able to extend themselves to the abstrusest Reasonings, and to speak even of Philosophy with the Advantages of Eloquence. As there is a Concurrence of these two Conditions, to justify the present Attempt; so the second of them, which, through personal Inability, may have been impaired, seems yet to be recompensed, by a peculiar Weight and Prevalency in the first. For the Commendation of our Author's Judgment hath scarce been more universal, than the Censure of his Composition; which though, by all, acknowledged to be expressive, yet to most appears so difficult and discouraging, that they sometimes fancy the Sense to have broken its Way through the Phrase, and to have left these Irregularities, as the Tokens of its Violence. It is true, he has not failed in the very Entrance of his Work, to apologize for this Defect of Ornament; but the Plea he offers is, what may better excuse the necessary Roughness of a Subject, than the particular Unhappiness of a Writer. Another visible Disadvantage there was, which called for Relief. Our Author having published the first Draught of this great Undertaking in the Year MDCLX, with the Title of Elementa Jurisprudentiæ, having also employed the Labour and Collections of twelve Years, in bringing it to its present Method and Name, was not content to have drawn together all Assistances, which were of direct and immediate Use, from the Stores of Morality, Politicks, and Law; but engaged himself in a longer and wider Search, running through the whole Circle of philological Authors, antient and mo-modern, and disposing, under the Heads of his Work, the most remote Examples, and Illustrations. Hence every Page came to be loaded, not only with numerous Citations at large, but with disorderly Marks of Addition, Reference, Comparison, and the like: As if the Confusion of a swelling Margin had run over, and discharged it self upon the Text. Thus the Periods were frequently disjointed, the Argument interrupted, or obscured, and the greatest Part of the main Body thrown into the disagreeable Figure of a Common-place.

Some Endeavours have been here applied towards the lessening of both these Imperfections. In Respect of Stile, it is hoped, that the Metal, how rude soever and incapable of being polished to exact Beauty, yet after a second melting, may appear less deformed, and may pass into more general Use: But it is beyond Doubt, that the other Inequality has been farther rectified, by our casting under the Page the needless and misshapen Mass of foreign Supplies; which it might have been no unpardonable Boldness utterly to have pared away; but that we ought to be cautious of practising upon an Author, and to take Care, lest by cutting off an Excreescency, we should endanger the Life of a Design.

Custom has not so far prevailed over Decency, as to engage the Translators in proclaiming the Justice of their Choice, and Merit of their Author. Much less would they ground his Character on the invidious Argument of Comparison. To contend with the admired Names of Grotius, Selden, and the Right Reverend the present Lord Bishop of Peterborough, is what he ought to decline in Point of Modesty, if not of Safety. Yet this seems to have fallen out to his Advantage, that no one of those great Men attempted a compleat Body of moral, or political Doctrine. The first chose rather to insist on Authorities taken from the Historians, Civilians, and Canonists, than on philosophical Deductions, from the Nature of Men, and the Reasons of Things. The second entred no farther into this Subject, than as the Jewish Institutions directed his View. My Lord of Peterborough, having overthrowen the deceitful Fabrick of a late treacherous Builder, and settled the Science of Morality on its truest and deepest Foundations, left the Superstructure to be raised by inferior Hands. Thus, while each had a particular Boundary to his own Enquiries, all contributed to the Perfection of our Author's System: In which, as he abstains not from grateful Remembrances of these, and other learned Benefactors, so he now teaches the Publisher of this Translation, most gladly to acknowledge the Favour and Assistance of his Friends; of whom two especially, the Reverend Mr. Percivale, and the Reverend Mr. Itchiner, by entirely rendering the fifth and eighth Books, have, with the same Kindness, accepted a Part in his Burthen, and allowed him a Share in their Reputation and Success.

Science of Morality, &c.

S E C T. I.

EEING ^a the speculative Sciences, if consider'd in, and for themselves only, are all of 'em useless; and seeing the Pursuit of such Objects cou'd never be the End, for which Man was created; it ought not to seem strange to any, if the Generality of Mankind shou'd be found incapable of applying themselves to this sort of Science with any tolerable Success; and a very great Part not able even to comprehend its first Rudiments: But it wou'd be just Cause of Wonder, shou'd the Practical Science of ^b Moral Actions not be attainable, to a competent Degree at least, by all who will make use of their Reason, in whatsoever State and Condition they are found to be.

And really, none can reasonably doubt, but that every Man, who will be happy, must needs, in order to make himself so, regulate his Conduct after some certain manner; and that God, as Author and Parent of all human Race, does prescribe to all Men, without exception, the Duties, which tend to procure them that Happiness, which they so passionately seek after. Now from hence it necessarily follows, that the natural Principles of this Science, are such as may be easily discover'd; and such too, as are proportionate to the Capacities of all sort of Persons: So that to be instructed in this Science, there will be no occasion to mount up to Heaven; or to have from thence any extraordinary Revelation for that purpose. An antient Doctor of the Church has made use ^d of this Reason, to shew the Injustice and Vanity of the greatest Part of the Heathen Philosophers; who pretended that Philosophy, without excepting the noblest Part of it, even that which concerns Morality; was not but for the small Number of those, who were the initiated, and profess'd Disciples thereof: And it must be own'd, to the Eternal Glory of the Supreme Legislator of Mankind; as well as to the utter Confusion of themselves; that none can com-

^b I mean by this, and the Term Morality, not only what is commonly so call'd; but also The Law of Nature, and Politicks: In a word, all that it is necessary for the Conduct of a Man's Self, according to his Estate and Condition.

^d *Non est ergo sapientia, si ab hominum cætu abhorret: quoniam, si sapientia homini data est, sine ullo discrimine omnibus data est; ut nemo sit profusus, qui eam capere non possit. At illi [Philosophi] virtutem humano generi data sic amplexantur, ut sibi omnium publico bono frui velle videantur; tam invidi, quam si velint deligare oculos, aut effodere cæteris, ut solem videant --- Quod si natura hominis sapientie capax est; oportuit opifices, & rusticos, & mulieres, & omnes denique qui humanam formam gerunt doceri, ut sapiant; populumque ex omni lingua, & conditione, & sexu, & ætate constari. plain, without Injustice, that God has given him Laws, either impracticable; or environ'd with such Obscurity, as cannot be penetrated by one who really has his Duty at heart; notwithstanding all his Pains and Application. This the wisest Heathens have acknowledg'd; nor will it be improper here to produce their Testimonies; to confound those, who, under Christianity itself, seem to call in question so incontestable a Truth. The Stoicks, who made Morality their principal Study, maintain'd, that their Philosophy was not above the Reach of ° Women and Slaves; and that, as the way to Virtue lies open to all Men without Distinction; † so there is no Estate or Condition with peculiar Privileges exclusive of others, as to the Faculty of knowing the Principles and Rules, as well of those Duties which are common to all; as of those which belong to each Particular. Is it so, (said an Emperour and Philosopher of the same Sect) that you cannot recommend yourself, and raise a Character by the Delicacy of your Wit, and the Fineness of your Understanding? Very well. But there are many other Things, as to any of which you cannot say, I am not fit for it. Put in practice them, and shew forth what does entirely depend on yourself; Sincerity, Gravity, Humanity, Laboriousness and Industry, Contempt of Voluptuousness. Be content with thy Condition; stand in need but of a little; avoid Luxury, trifling Amusements, and vain Discourses. Have a Soul judicious, free, and great. Don't you see, that, being able to raise yourself by so many Virtues, without having any pretence on the Account of natural Incapacity; you still continue in the Mire, only because you will? Ever bear in mind, that all the Happiness of this Life depends on but very few Things. Because you despair of being eminent in Logic, or Natural Philosophy; will you give over all Thoughts of being free, sociable, and submissive to the Orders of God? Another Roman Philosopher, most illustriously eminent on account of his Eloquence and Employ in the Government, had said long before, (being to confirm this Proposition; That a good Man will never think that useful or profitable, that is not honest; and that he will never do, or even think of doing any thing, that he dares not boldly discover to all the World:) Is it not *a shame for Philosophers to doubt of a Truth, of which even Peasants make no doubt? Witness that Saying, which is commonly made use of, when we describe a Man of Integrity; That he is a Man, with whom one may play * at Mora in the dark: For 'twas the Peasants who invented that old Proverb.*

But tho' none had ever yet discover'd in the Principles and Rules of Morality, so high a Degree of Evidence, and that they are so duly adjusted to all Capacities; one might still appeal in this Matter to the very Nature of the Thing itself; and in some measure to Experience. We have here no Business to dive down into the impenetrable Secrets of Nature, to discover those imperceptible Springs, that produce in the World so many Phænomena, and such variety of wonderful Events; to measure the Magnitude and Distance of the Stars; to rake up the Entrails of the Earth, and dig down to its very Center; † no more have we here any occasion to bury ourselves in metaphysical Speculations; to turn over a vast Number of Volumes; to learn several Languages; to pierce thro' the Darkness of remote Antiquity; in a word, to be very learned: We shall scarce have occasion to carry our Thoughts beyond ourselves, or consult any other Master besides our own Heart. The most common † Experience of Life; and a little Reflection on ourselves, and the Objects that surround us on every Side; are sufficient to furnish even the most ordinary Capacities with general Ideas of the Law of Nature; and the true Grounds of all our moral Duties. Who does but ever so little examine his own Nature; and contemplate that wonderful Order of the Universe, which on all sides presents itself to the View of every one capable of any Degree of Reflection; will immediately be rais'd to the Knowledge of that Almighty, All-wise, and All-good Creator, in whom we ^k live, and move, and have our Being; to whom too, he will find he owes Homage with all the rest of the Universe. Whence it is easy to conclude, that we ought to have the highest Idea of this Supreme Being, that our Minds are capable of receiving; and to obey his Laws, as far as we can attain to the Knowledge of them. After this, there will be no great need of much Penetration, to perceive how

God has, by a natural Result from the Constitution of Human Affairs, put us under a Necessity of practising, one towards another, certain Duties, without which Society cou'd not be maintain'd; and how he has thereby laid upon us an indispensable Obligation to observe those Duties; every one according to his State and Vocation. This is certain at least, that no sooner are those Principles propos'd, but that every one becomes sensible of their Goodness, and finds himself clearly convinc'd of their Truth; provided he be not the Slave of some violent Passion, that darkens and clouds his Judgment; or that there be not some other Obstacle to hinder and divert his Attention. Let us here add the Testimony of a Heathen Philosopher; 'tis the celebrated Confucius of *China*¹. The Rule of Reason, says he, which comprehends the reciprocal Duties of a King and his Subjects; a Father and Mother, and their Children; of Husband and Wife; of the young Folks, and the Aged; of Friends, and all who have any Correspondence or Intercourse with one another, is not above the reach of the Vulgar. Whereas the Maxims which certain People have themselves invented, or which they wou'd have pass for sublime, and above our Comprehension; such as are certain strange and abstruse Principles, and which have no Relation to those five sorts of Persons before-mention'd; cannot be at all reckon'd among the Rules of Reason. Thus this wise Chinêsé expresses himself, being to explain a Maxim, which he is endeavouring to set in its full Light, in order to prove, that 'tis easy for all the World to be virtuous; 'tis the same Maxim which the Gospel so much inculcates: Do not that to others, which you wou'd not have done to yourself. And in very deed, there needs no more, to be convinc'd that the most ignorant are by Reason persuaded of the Necessity of the general Duties of the Law of Nature; than^m either to ask 'em if they wou'd be willing any one shou'd do themselves the Hurt which they do others; or to actually do it: For they will then immediately make it appear, either by their Answer; or by their Complaints and Actions, that they look on such Practices to be evil*; and that they understand very well, that they are forbid them, not purely thro' Caprice, or a mistaken Notion of Justice and publick Good; but for most strong and equitable Reasons. Every one will complain, if he is slander'd, or robb'd, or ill treated in his own, or in the Person of those who are dear to him; or in any other manner whatsoever: The most stupid have then understanding enough to represent lively in their way, the Greatness of the Injustice; and the Punishment due to the Offender. Therefore, when they themselves commit any thing of the like Nature against others, it is doing them no wrong to condemn them by their own Judgment; and to look on their Ignorance, in which they may pretend to have been on that Head, as altogether inexcusable. But what is much more considerable, they can, not only comprehend and discover with little trouble the Fundamental Principles of Morality; but besides, wou'd they but use their utmost Endeavours to augment their small Stock of Knowledge; they might, without much Difficulty, draw from thence certain Consequences, and extend their Knowledge to a Competency considerable enough; at least sufficient for their Condition. Instances too of this kind we often meet with in some of this sort of People; who plainly shew, both by their Discourse and by their Conduct; that they are neither short, nor wrong in their Ideas concerning Morality; altho' they may not be always able to explain fully, or to express clearly the Whole of what they think. The Conduct and Intentions of Peasants,ⁿ says Montagne, I have generally observ'd to be more agreeable to the Prescription of true Philosophy, than those of our Philosophers themselves. Vulgus interdum^o plus sapit; quia tantum, quantum opus est, sapit. This was probably the Sentiment of an antient Philosopher,^p when he said; That many People without having their Reason improv'd by Study, live nevertheless in a manner conformable to the Dictates of right Reason.

IF Persons of the lowest Rank can arrive at such a Pitch of Knowledge in Morality; it is much more to be expected that those, who have greater Talents, and more Penetration, with greater external Helps, and more especially Men of Learning; should be able to acquire to themselves in this Science, and that too in a much more distinct manner, all the Light and Knowledge any way requisite for the Conduct of Life: Nay I dare even venture to affirm, were the natural

Principles of Morality, with due Application, closely purſu'd, Step by Step as far as they wou'd carry us; that all the moral Duties of Man, in every Station of Life, might from thence be easily deduc'd, by a Train of Consequences connected one with the other, in a Method strictly demonstrative: It appears to me very improbable, * that our Creator, having given us Faculties sufficient to discover and demonstrate with entire Certainty abundance of speculative Things, of which we may without a Fault be ignorant; principally, that vast Number of mathematical Truths, which have been acknowledged to be incontestable, by all who have been able to comprehend their Proofs and Principles: It is I say improbable and incongruous to suppose, that the same Creator has not also made us capable of knowing, and establishing with the same Evidence, the Maxims of Morality; in which are contain'd those Duties he indispensably requires of us; and on the Practice whereof all our Happiness depends. But, besides this Reason, which the Goodness of God will not permit us to doubt of; there is still another drawn from the Nature of the Thing itself; and which alone wou'd be of Force enough to convince any reasonable Person, of the Possibility of reducing the Science of Morality to a System, as well connected, as those of Geometry, for example, or Mechanicks; and founded on as certain Principles. It is no Part of the Business in Morality to know the real Essence of Substances; which is what has been hitherto attempted without Success, and in all probability will never be brought about; as a great † Philosopher of this Age has made appear: All that is requir'd here, is only to examine and compare with Care and Diligence certain Relations, which we conceive between human Actions and a certain Rule. Let us hear what Mr. Locke himself says on this Occasion^a, “I doubt not, says he, but from self-evident Propositions, by necessary Consequences, as incontestable as those in Mathematicks, the Measures of Right and Wrong might be made out, to any one who will apply himself with the same Indifferency and Attention to the one, as he does to the other, of these Sciences. The Relation of other Modes may certainly be perceived, as well as those of Number and Extension: And I cannot see; why they shou'd not also be capable of Demonstration, if due Methods were thought on to examine, or pursue their Agreement or Disagreement. Where there is no^b Property, there is no Injustice, is a Proposition as certain as any Demonstration in Euclid: for the Idea of Property being a Right to any thing; and the Idea to which the Name Injustice is given, being the Invasion or Violation of that Right; it is evident, that these Ideas being thus establish'd, and these Names annex'd to them, I can as certainly know this Proposition to be true, as that a Triangle has three Angles equal to two right ones. Again, No Government allows absolute Liberty: The Idea of Government being the Establishment of Society upon certain Rules or Laws, which require Conformity to them; and the Idea of absolute Liberty being for any one to do whatever he pleases; I am as capable of being certain of the Truth of this Proposition, as of any in Mathematicks. — The precise real Essence of the Things, moral Words stand for, may (says the same Author^c elsewhere) be perfectly known; and so the Congruity, or Incongruity of the Things themselves, be certainly discover'd, in which consists perfect Knowledge. Nor let any one object, that the Names of Substances are often to be made use of in Morality, as well as those of Modes, from which will arise Obscurity. For as to Substances, when concern'd in moral Discourses, their divers Natures are not so much enquired into, as supposed; v. g. When we say, That Man is subject to Law: we mean nothing by Man, but a corporeal rational Creature: what the real Essence or other Qualities of that Creature are in this Case, is no way consider'd. And therefore, whether a Child or a Changeling be a Man in a physical Sense, may amongst the Naturalists be as disputable as it will, it concerns not at all the moral Man, as I may call him, which is this immoveable unchangeable Idea, of a corporeal rational Being: For were there a Monkey, or any other Creature to be found, that had the Use of Reason, to such a degree, as to be able to understand general Signs, and to deduce Consequences about general Ideas, he wou'd, no doubt, be subject to Law, and, in that Sense, be a Man, how much soever he differ'd in shape from others of that Name. The Names of Substances, if they be used in them, as they should, can no more disturb moral, than they do mathematical Discourses: where, if the Mathematician speaks of a Cube or Globe of Gold, or any other Body, he has his clear settled Idea, which varies not, altho' it may, by mistake, be apply'd to a particular Body, to which it belongs not. || The Negligence or Perverseness of Mankind, cannot be excused, if their Discourses in Morality be not much more clear, than those in natural Philosophy: since they are about Ideas in the Mind, which are none of them false or disproportionate; they having no external Beings for Archetypes which they are refer'd to, and must correspond with. It is far easier for Men to frame in their Minds an Idea, which shall be the Standard to which they will give the Name Justice, with which Pattern so made, all Actions that agree shall pass under that Denomination, than, having seen Arifides, to frame an Idea, that shall in all things be exactly like him, who is as he is, let Men make what Idea they please of him. For the one, they need but know the Combination of Ideas, that are put together within their own Minds; for the other, they must enquire into the whole Nature, and abstruse hidden Constitution, and various Qualities of a Thing existing without them. ---^d The Truth and Certainty of moral Discourses abstracts from the Lives of Men, and the Existence of those Virtues in the World, whereof they treat: Nor are Tully's Offices less true, because there “ Idea. If it be true in Speculation, i.e. in Idea, “ That Murder deserves Death, it will also be “ true in reality of any Action that exists con“ formable to that Idea of Murder. As for “ other Actions, the Truth of that Proposition “ concerns them not. --- * But it will be here “ said, that if moral Knowledge be placed in the “ Contemplation of our own moral Ideas, and “ those, as other Modes, be of our own making,

“ is no body in the World that exactly practises

 “ what strange Notions will there be of Justice
 “ and Temperance? What Confusion of Virtues “ and Vices, if every one may make what Ideas
 “ of them he pleases? (To this Mr. Locke answers,) “ There will be no Confusion nor Disorder in “ the Things themselves, nor the Reasonings a“ bout them; no more than (in Mathematicks)
 “ there wou’d be a Disturbance in the Demon“ stration, or a Change in the Properties of Fi“ gures, and their Relations one to another, if a “ Man should make a Triangle with four Cor“ ners, or a Trapezium † with four Right Angles: “ that is, in plain English, change the Names of “ the Figures, and call that by one Name, which “ Mathematicians call ordinarily by another. --- I “ confess, the Change of the Name by the Im“ propriety of Speech, will at first disturb him, “ who knows not what Idea it stands for: But “ as soon as the Figure is drawn, the Conse“ quences, and Demonstrations are plain and clear.
 “ Just the same it is in moral Knowledge, let a “ Man have the Idea of taking from others, with“ out their Consent, what their honest Industry “ has possess’d them of, and call this Justice, if “ he please. --- He that takes the Name here with“ out the Idea put to it, will be mistaken, by “ joining another Idea of his own to that Name:

“ but strip the Idea of that Name, or take it “ such as it is in the Speaker’s Mind, and the “ same Things will agree to it, as if you call’d it “ Injustice. --- || Where God, or any other Law“ maker, hath defined any moral Names, there “ they have made the Essence of that Species to “ which that Name belongs; and there it is not “ safe to apply or use them otherwise: but in “ other Cases ’tis bare Impropriety of Speech
 “ to apply them contrary to the common Usage “ of the Country. But yet even this too disturbs “ not the Certainty of that Knowledge, which “ is still to be had by a due Contemplation and “ comparing of those even nick-nam’d Ideas.”
 See how this great Philosopher reasons. Let us add here, that the Demonstrations of speculative Truths are much more compounded, and depend on a much greater Number of Principles, than the Demonstrations of the Rules of Morality. To be convinc’d of this, we need only compare the Elements of Geometry, with a little methodical System of the Duties, which the Law of Nature prescribes to Men; and, at the same time, that we shall find what I have just now said, to be true; we shall also, in my opinion, be forc’d to acknowledge; that it is incomparably more easy to comprehend the Principles and Reasonings of the last mention’d Book; than the Theorems, Problems, and Demonstrations of the former. In fact, as an antient Philosopher very justly remarks; ‘ It is false to say, that Precepts of Morality are of so vast an Extent, as to make us despair of ever seeing the end of them; those that concern the most necessary and considerable Things, may be reduc’d to a certain Number: It is true, that the Circumstances of Time, Place, and Persons, create therein some Diversity; but that signifies but little, for we have even in those Cases general Maxims which are sufficient to direct our Judgments therein.

S E C T. III.

Notwithstanding all these Reflections, which it is very obvious to make; some have^a for a long time believ’d, and even at this day many do maintain, that Morality is a Science very uncertain; and wherein scarce any thing beyond Probabilities is to be found or expected: But it is not altogether for want of due Examination into the Nature of Things, that this false Notion has prevail’d. There has ever been an uninterrupted Succession of Men, who, seduc’d by a secret Desire to shake off the troublesome and importunate Yoke of Duty; and to indulge themselves securely in the Gratification, if not of their sensual and gross Desires, yet at least of their more delicate and refin’d Inclinations; have employ’d all the Faculties of their Souls in extinguishing the Evidence of those Truths, which were the most clear, and the most generally acknowledg’d; in order to involve in their Ruin all certainty of the Rules of Virtue. My Design is not to dispute with these Men in form; and to refute Step by Step all their vain Subtilties. I shall content myself with saying here, in a few words, something to two Objections; on which they chiefly rely, and which seem most apt to amuse and deceive.

The first Objection is drawn from the Difficulty there is to decide some certain Questions in Morality; and reconcile too even some of its Principles. Since the moral Law (says^b a celebrated Author) that concern the particular Duty of each

^b Montagne’s Essays, Book III, p. 398, in English. And p. 797. in the Paris Edit. in Fol. And Edit. 1727, lib. 3, c. 13, p. 478, 479. Tom. IV.

Person singly, are so difficult to be rightly constituted, as we see they are; 'tis no wonder, if those, which are to direct so many Particulars, are much more so. Do but consider the Form of that Justice which governs us, 'tis the very Emblem of human Infirmity; so full is it of Error and Contradiction.

But 1st, Whosoever will but bestow some small Attention upon this Matter, will, I am confident, readily agree, that the Thing which generally causes these Perplexities, is Interest; which join'd with the Prejudices of Infancy, Education, or Custom, obscure the clearest Dictates of right Reason: of this we every day see numberless Instances. The greatest Part of Mankind are so much blinded with an excessive and mistaken Self-love, that all their Penetration and Discernment of Mind, seem entirely to forsake 'em, as soon as ever any one Matter comes in debate, the Decision whereof is attended with Loss or Gain. And yet they shall with ease, and without one false Step, go thro' with many other Things, a thousand times more difficult, which they examine coolly, and with a Mind wholly disinterested. This is very well express'd by the Philosopher Hierocles. *One sure Mark, says he, that right Reason is natural to Men, is, that the unjust Man, when he is acting in an Affair, that does no way touch his own Interest, judges exactly according to the Rules of Justice; and the Intemperate, according to those of Moderation and Temperance. In a word, vicious Persons of every sort, have just Ideas in Things, where they don't suffer themselves to be prepossess'd by Passion. And here we have the true Reason, why it is in the Power of a wicked Man to reform, and become virtuous; for he has no more to do, but to open his Eyes, and to condemn the Irregularity of his past Conduct; which he can't but be sensible of, if he acts with any Degree of Attention. Thus this Greek Commentator on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras judiciously observes the Case to be. But yet it but too often happens, that, when there is even no violent Passion, or personal Interest, able to misguide the Judgment; Precipitation and Prepossession fail not to produce the very same Effects. A Man oftentimes becomes tenaciously fond of false or doubtful Principles, taken up without Examination or Reflection; and then 'tis no wonder, if he finds himself unable to reconcile these with the true; or to draw from 'em just and regular Consequences. How few do we find, who so much as think of ever calling in question certain Principles which they have early imbib'd; especially if they see 'em authoriz'd by the Opinions in vogue; or establish'd by the Law and Custom of the Country they live in? You will find several Authors, who push'd on either openly and avowedly, or unawares and insensibly, by meer Party-Animosity; have made it their sole Aim, while they were composing Treatises on certain Questions in ^c Morality or Politicks; to endeavour to find out, not what was most conformable to the invariable Rules of right Reason and Equity; but only what to them seem'd most proper to justify the receiv'd Party-Notions; or the Pretensions and Maxims of the Sovereign, under whose Dominion they liv'd.

2^{dly}, Those who make such Objections as these, I am now examining; are generally such Persons, as, whatever Abilities and Penetration they may otherwise have, seem not to have study'd these Matters with sufficient Care, or with a sincere Affection for Truth; or else such, as maliciously take Advantage of even the smallest Errors or Mistakes, which they can find out in the Discourses or Works of such Authors, as have not, with just Attention and Care follow'd the natural Principles of this Science of Morality. And, in truth, 'tis but too often seen, that Authors build on Foundations not altogether solid enough; and produce weak and pitiful Arguments, to establish the most clear and incontestable Truths. Whoever shall examine the vain Subtilties, impertinent Questions, ridiculous Decisions, and detestable Maxims, with which the Books of many Casuists are fill'd; will, no doubt, find ample Matter, to furnish out a prodigious Parade of Contradictions and Absurdities; but when all's done, this can no way affect the Certainty of the Principles and Rules of true Morality; but wholly redounds to the Confusion of those blind, shall I say, or sham Doctors; certainly most wretched Subtilizers and Refiners, in whose Hands the purest Gold turns to muck and dross. Wherefore, before they triumph too much, on pretence of some Inconsistency, which they may imagine to have observ'd between some certain Duties; or on account of some weak Proofs, that such and such Writers have made use of; they ought first seriously to consider, whether they have not unhappily mis'd the right way; and whether, if they wou'd but trace Things back to their true Sources; they might not from thence furnish themselves sufficiently, for the Resolution of those Difficulties, with which they have been hitherto perplex'd. Charron, for example, maintains, that ^d very often the Precepts of a single Virtue cannot be put in Practice, without prejudice either to that same Virtue, or to some other; by reason of their clashing and interfering one with the other: so that you cannot answer the Demands of the one, but at the Expence of the other. This is at least, adds he, uncovering one Altar to cover another; so defective and weak is all human Sufficiency, that it is neither able to give or receive one certain, universal, and consistent Plan of Duty, sufficient for the forming a good Man by; nor can it so well advise and provide, but that the means of doing good shall sometimes interfere; and Charity and Justice be often found repugnant to each other: If in War, I fight on my Relation or Friend engag'd on the Enemy's side, Justice requires me to kill him; but Charity to save and spare him: If a Man be mortally wounded, so that, it being impossible for him to recover, he can only linger on in the Extremity of Pain; 'tis then a Work of ^e Charity to dispatch him: but yet 'tis what ^f Justice will punish. Nay, to be found near such an one in a By-place, where it is doubtful who is the Murderer; altho' it was with design to do him Offices of Humanity, is extremely dangerous; and can end in nothing less to the Person so found, with all his Innocency, than the undergoing a criminal Prosecution on account of this Accident: But these Words, if well consider'd, prove only this; that there are some Cases, where several Virtues cannot be put in practice at the same time, and with regard to the same Object; not that there is any Inconsistency between the Virtues themselves, their Functions, or Effects. It is no more than a seeming Conflict between certain Duties, of which some for the time being are to take place of others; so that what, out of such Circumstances, wou'd have been an indispensable Act of Virtue, does then become unlawful, or at least indifferent. Thus the Virtue, which at that Juncture is, if I may so say, oblig'd to give place; receives no Prejudice, nor loses any of its Rights or Privileges. Charron seems to have been willing to soften and rectify his Notions in the second Edition of his Book; where he adds the following Words: Nor ought Virtue to be esteem'd answerable for all this, or the several Virtues charg'd with repugnancy to one another; for they are in perfect Concord; but the Weakness of the human Condition; since with all its Sufficiency and Industry, it is still so defective and feeble, that it is not able to find out a certain Plan, &c. That is to say, (if I mistake not; and to give these Words the most reasonable Construction they are capable of:) that the several Virtues consider'd as they are in themselves, and in the Idea of the Divine Understanding, or of some celestial Intelligent Being, agree perfectly well one with the other; but that our Ideas and Faculties are not sufficient to reconcile them in such manner, as to satisfy our Minds, and to determine our Judgments with certainty in those Cases where they seem to interfere; which in effect is the same thing to us, as to suppose a real and absolute Inconsistency in the Virtues themselves. This calls to my Mind another Author, whom Charron very often copies, and who says on the Subject of natural Laws; ^a That it is credible, that there are natural Laws, as is seen in other Animals: but they are lost in us; this same fine human Reason of ours every where taking upon itself to domineer and bear sway; shuffling and confounding the Face of Things, according to its own Vanity and Inconstancy. But what we have said before, does not allow us to admit of a Supposition so injurious to the Divine Goodness; nor are the Examples, produc'd by Charron, sufficient to make it out. It is very rare, that a Soldier is oblig'd to kill with his own Hands, knowing and seeing him, his Relation or Friend, who may happen to be in the opposite Party. There are few Princes or Generals of an Army, who wou'd require this of a Soldier, or subaltern Officer; or who wou'd not, out of regard to the Tyes of Consanguinity or Friendship, easily forgive his having spar'd the Life of a Person so dear to him. But suppose it shou'd happen, that in a just War, (for that must be suppos'd in the present Case) I shou'd, by the precise Order of my General, or of my Sovereign himself, having sufficient Reasons for giving me such Orders; be reduc'd to the fatal Necessity of killing, with my own Hands, my Relation or Friend; I don't see, in this Case, how Charity can any ways interpose in favour of that Relation or Friend of mine, who is suppos'd to have born Arms in a bad Cause; especially, if my refusal to obey be capital. I must own, this wou'd be a very sad and most ungrateful Office; but after all, 'tis in me no other than the Performance of what I am indispensably oblig'd to do: And my Relation or Friend ought to look on me as acting no otherwise than as the simple Instrument, and that too with great Regret, of those just Acts of Hostility, to which he has voluntarily expos'd himself. The other Case that Charron mentions, is as easy to decide; nor is there in it any Opposition betwixt Publick Justice and Private Charity, as this Author himself has made appear in the second Edition of his Work^b. Suppose I think a Man mortally wounded, beyond all Hope or Possibility of a Cure, (in which I, who am neither Physician or Surgeon, may very easily be mistaken; since we very often see People recover after they have been given over, even by Men of those Professions;) altho' Compassion may seem to move and sollicit all who pass by, to abridge the Sufferings of one, who is thought in a Condition altogether desperate; yet Charity cannot require me to dispatch for him those miserable Remains of Life; unless his Case be attended with such Circumstances, as makes it lawful for himself to do it: Nor are there wanting in this Case^c Principles sufficient to determine us. But shou'd it prove to be so in this Case, that the Man had, according to the Principles of the Law of Nature, full Liberty to dispose of his own Life; and that he shou'd intreat me to hasten the inevitable Moment of a Term, which wou'd otherwise soon expire, and the Prolongation whereof cou'd serve to no other Purpose, but to continue him in needless Pain and Misery; yet, if the Laws of my Country absolutely forbid me to contribute in any manner towards hastening the Death of another, under any pretence whatsoever; as is the Case almost every where, and that upon very good Grounds; the Laws of Charity in such Case cou'd in no wise oblige or authorize me, to render to this unfortunate Man the Service he demands; and it is no more permitted to grant him this Request, than to force a Criminal out of the Hands of Justice, with an Intent to save his Life. As for the Danger he is expos'd to, of being taken for the Murderer, or put to the Rack, who stays by the wounded Person, in order to succour and relieve him; there is not always Reason to fear such fatal Consequences from a good Office on this pressing Occasion: But suppose there was all the Reason in the World to apprehend them; the Care of our own Preservation, which is strongly^d recommended to every particular Man, by the same Law of Nature; wou'd, no doubt in this Case, be found to outweigh the Laws of Humanity; which are then only obligatory, when we can put them in Practice, without bringing on ourselves any considerable Damage, or great Inconvenience; to which we are not otherwise oblig'd to expose ourselves in favour of him, who has need of our Assistance. The Inference therefore, which Charron draws from these Examples, that Justice not only offends against Charity, but that it is a Clog and Impediment to itself; is altogether wrong and unjust. And wou'd we but examine, as we ought, the other Reasons produc'd by this Author; or those who, before and after him, have been desirous to signalize themselves by their Endeavours to establish a Pyrrhonism, which spares not the most necessary Truths; we shou'd, I am fatisfy'd, find that none of their other Reasons, do a whit better make out those pretended Contradictions, they fancy to themselves, between the Principles of Morality; and that the Weakness of all those Objections, which they have hitherto been able to invent, will only serve on the contrary to prepossess us in favour of that entire Certainty, and perfect Consistency, to be found in all Decisions and Determinations, grounded on the true Principles of our moral Duties.

3dly, The Difficulties that sometimes cause Perplexity in Matters of Morality, or natural Right, do not proceed so much from the Obscurity we find in the Rule itself; as from certain particular Circumstances, which render the Application thereof difficult, but not impossible; and consequently are no more Proofs of the Uncertainty of the Rule, than the Trouble we are at, to apply a Demonstration in Mathematicks, diminishes the Evidence or Infallibility thereof. Besides, these Difficulties do not concern the general Principles, nor the Maxims which mediately or immediately flow from them, even to a considerable Distance; but only certain remote Consequences, * and of little Importance, in comparison with the others. If we will but suffer ourselves to make never so little Use of that Faculty of reasoning which Nature has endow'd us all with; we cannot in the least doubt of the Truth of these following Rules: That we ought to render to the Deity a Worship worthy of him; and to obey his Laws, as far as they are known to us: that every one is oblig'd to avoid the Excesses of Intemperance; which, by ruining his Health, make him incapable of attending those Things, to which he is call'd by his Condition; and of making himself useful to humane Society: that he is not permitted to injure his Neighbour; and that, if he has done him any Damage, he ought to repair it as soon as may be: that he ought not to deny any one all friendly Services, not hurtful to himself, that he can do him: that he ought inviolably to keep his Word: that all Fraud and Tricking is criminal: that Children are under an indispensable Obligation to honour their Parents: that it is just to obey the Orders and Laws of a lawful Sovereign, as long as he prescribes nothing contrary to the invariable Principles of the Law of Nature; or to any Divine Law clearly reveal'd. &c. All these Fundamental Truths, and many more of the like Nature, are so evident, that it is impossible to bring any Objection against them, that is even but plausible; or whose Weakness will not appear at first Sight. But it may be disputed with some shew of Reason, Whether a Man, for example, who has committed Adultery with a married Woman, is oblig'd to make Satisfaction to the legitimate Children; for the loss they sustain by the Concurrence of an illegitimate Share in the Succession?

*Whether that Promise be binding, which I authorize another to make in my Name, where the Person to whom it was to be made, dies before Notice or Acceptance? Whether when a Thing, sold and not deliver'd, happens to perish by some Accident, without any Fault of the Seller; he, or the Buyer, ought to stand to the loss of it? Whether a Prescription shall cure to the Prejudice of those who are not yet born? Whether a Possessor, bona fide, ought to make good the Fruits which he hath consum'd? Whether Polygamy or Divorce are absolutely contrary to the Law of Nature? Whether such or such degrees of Consanguinity or Affinity are forbid by the same Law? Whether Sons or Daughters may marry without their Parents Consent? Altho' even these, and other the like Questions may not perhaps be very difficult to decide, if examin'd attentively, and without Prepossession; yet there is besides almost always, as to the Practical Part, another infallible way to determine ourselves thereupon; and that by clear and self-evident Principles: without at all entering into the Foundation of the Question. You doubt, for example, whether Polygamy or Divorce are in their Natures absolutely unlawful; but, to say nothing of the Laws of the Gospel, you find these Things forbidden by the Civil Laws of your Country; and you cannot reasonably doubt, but that it is a Crime to disobey the Laws of the Sovereign Power; even when they take from you the Liberty of doing that, which otherwise would be permitted, or indifferent. Shou'd the Question be about Things not settled by the Civil Laws; you have then these two incontestable Principles to regulate your Conduct by: First, that in difficult Cases you ought always to take the surest Side of the Question. Secondly, that the surest Side, is always the opposite to that your Passions incline to. And from hence I draw a Consequence, that serves equally to confound as well those who seek excuse for their Faults from a pretended invincible Ignorance, or from the Difficulties of their particular Cases; as those, who alledge these Difficulties, in order to destroy the Certainty of all the Principles of Morality: The Consequence, I wou'd infer, is this; that a Man before he can arrive at this State of Doubt and Perplexity, so as to be at a loss which side of the Question to take, in Points relating to his own Conduct; must first have negligently over-look'd Maxims, so clear, as to be self-evident; and so easy, as to be obvious in every Case of Practical Duty. Thus it is plain, that the Fault lies at our own Door, and not at our Creator's; who, as he has given us his Laws, so has he given us Light, sufficient to direct, and keep us from tumbling from one unfathomable Difficulty to another, into a perpetual State of Doubtfulness and Uncertainty. The Case is much the same here with that of the Master of a Family; who, upon taking a long Journey, had left with his Domesticks Orders sufficiently clear; and easy to be executed: and in this Case shou'd the Domesticks, for want of having follow'd their Master's Orders, find themselves reduc'd to such a Nonplus, as not to be able, with their utmost Application, and most hearty Endeavours, to determine what to do,* with respect to certain Affairs, that should afterwards fall out, relating to his Service; they could have no Grounds to complain of their Master's Severity, when at his Return he punish'd them for having taken wrong Measures, and ill manag'd his Concerns.

* This with respect to these only that we can admit what Marriotte says, (Essay upon Logic, p. 154, whose Words are cited and adopted by the late Mr. Bayle, Ansv. to the Quest. of a Provinc. Tom. I, p. 352.) That it is often necessary to consider a great Number of Things, to judge well what we ought to follow or avoid. But they are much in the wrong, both the one and the other, to infer from thence the Uncertainty of all Morality in general; and to maintain, that the Conclusions thereof are more uncertain than those of natural Philosophy.

4thly, Unless we will doubt merely for the sake of doubting, or have the Assurance to deny that 'tis Light at Mid-day; we cannot refuse to acknowledge, that there are a great Number of Principles and Maxims of Morality, which are attended with the highest degree of Evidence; and which are entirely consistent one with another. There are some of these Truths, the Belief whereof, we are oblig'd to acknowledge to be as ancient as the World; and so extensive, as to be diffus'd in a manner quite throughout it; as shall be hereafter shewn. Now if there be any certain Proof, any sure Mark of the Clearness of our Ideas and Opinions; such an universal Consent as this, must undeniably be such. As for those Things, whose Evidence does not shew it self without some Reflection, be it more or less profound; and about which there is likewise great diversity of Opinions; if we take an account of all such as really have some Difficulties at first, even to those who examine them with some degree of Attention; it will be found that their Number is but small; that for the most part they entirely depend upon extraordinary Conjunctions; and that they are often, by Dint of Thought, fairly vanquish'd; so that the Difficulty, which at first was look'd on as insuperable, at length vanishes, and turns to the most clear and satisfactory Solution. But however, supposing there were Cases, and those too not uncommon; where it was absolutely impossible to come to any fix'd Resolution, upon Principles clear and self-evident; God doubtless would not, in such Cases, make Men responsible for those Errours, which, after their best Endeavours us'd to find out the Truth, they shou'd unhappily fall into. So that this would not at all make either against the Goodness or Justice of the Creator and sovereign Lord of Men; or against the Certainty and Evidence of those Principles, which we have always ready at hand, as sure Guides to conduct us safely in an infinite number of Cases: But we ought rather, in such Case, to say, that even this Degree of Light, seeing God has not thought fit to give us a greater, is sufficiently adapted to the State and Interests of Mankind: Tho' 'tis my fix'd Opinion, that it cannot without Rashness be positively affirm'd; that those incontestable Principles of Morality we have, are not, if duly pursu'd thro' all their Consequences, fully sufficient to furnish us with infallible Maxims in all imaginable Cases, that can be suppos'd to occur in human Life. And my Reason is this; That these Principles have prov'd so fruitful, that even to this Day, they have not been explain'd entirely; and drawn out into all their Consequences: But on the contrary, during the Space of near six thousand Years, that is, of the whole Duration of Mankind; there has hardly been any one Science so much neglected, or so superficially cultivated, as this Science of Morality; as will appear by the Sequel of this Discourse.

5thly, After all, supposing now that Means cannot be found out, entirely to resolve some Difficulties objected to certain remote Consequences, that follow from some of the evident Principles of Morality; will this be sufficient, in the Judgment of any reasonable Man, to shake the Certainty of all those Principles; and of that vast Number of Consequences, which may be most manifestly deduc'd from thence? Permit me, on this Occasion, to make a general and very important Remark; which, tho' made use of by several Authors, it is yet worth while here to repeat, and place in all its several Lights; to prevent the Effects of those dangerous Impressions, which they who endeavour directly or indirectly to introduce into the World an extravagant, and, as I may venture to say, most ridiculous Scepticism, might otherwise make. You shall see these Men, with great Earnestness and Application, collecting from all Parts, and exposing to the utmost, all, even the most minute Difficulties, which they think can be urg'd against the most certain and generally receiv'd Truths; and then concluding, with an Air of Triumph; *That poor Reason, alas! knows not where to fix its Foot: that it is an uncertain, fluttering, and supple Tool, to be turn'd about like any Weather-cock: that the great Secret it has found out to prevent its losing its way, is not to stir one single Step forwards; so that, wherever it finds two Ways, it stands stock still: with much more to the like Effect. Now all such Reasonings are grounded upon this single Principle; that, whatever is a certain Truth, must be adequately known by us; and remov'd from all manner of Difficulty. But this is a Proposition too considerable to be taken for granted; and ought to have been first fully prov'd, as the Ground on which all their Reasoning stands; unless they mean to beg the Question, by assuming for an unquestionable Truth, what is really false; which does but ill become Men, who wou'd seem resolv'd to admit of nothing for Truth, but what they comprehend as fully and clearly, as they do, that two and two make four. May it not very well be so, that our Faculties are precisely adapted to our present State and Occasions here; and consequently circumscrib'd within their proper Bounds? (For bounded they must then be; since it can never be prov'd, that to this end they ought to be commensurate with the Nature and Properties of all those Things whereof we have Ideas.) This then being suppos'd, which no way implies any thing contrary to the Goodness or Wisdom of the Creator; is not the having clear and direct Proofs of any Principle, enough to warrant the admitting it as certain; notwithstanding there still remain some Difficulties, the Solution whereof we do not yet see? To go about to make such

* Ὅρα ὅς πῶς ὀλίγα ἐστὶν, ὧν κρατήσας τις, δύναται ἔυρον καὶ θεοῦδ' ἰσῶσαι βίον; καὶ γὰρ οἱ θεοὶ πλέον οὐδὲν ἀπαιτήσουσι παρά τ' αὐτοῦ σολάσσοντος. That is to say, You see how few Things we have to practise, in order to lead a happy and divine Life; for the Gods will require nothing more of him, who shall follow these Rules. Marcus Antonin. lib. 2, sect. 5.

* See Bayle's Dictionary, p. 1565, Col. 1.

Difficulties serve for Proofs of the Negative of that very Principle, would be vain and frivolous; 'twould be no more than an idle evasive Fallacy, that wou'd be still bottom'd upon that precarious Supposition I just now mention'd; and one single Instance will be sufficient to make it out. Let the Question be, say they, whether *Matter is to be divided infinitely, and let the usual Proofs be produc'd on the affirmative side of the Question; you will find 'em at first sight so clearly demonstrative, that all the great Difficulties of the Atomists on the other side, won't in the least affect your Assent to the Affirmative: But then take the Negative, and let the Objections against the Affirmative be set forth and urg'd as Proofs; and they will not fail to make as great an Impression on your Mind, as the Proofs for the Affirmative had done just before; so that you will find these a sufficient bar to the others. For my part, I think the Difference, according to the Rules of right Reasoning, to be very considerable; for the Arguments for the infinite Divisibility of Matter, flow directly from the Idea of the very Nature of Matter, as an extended solid Substance; whereof the Parts, tho' never so small, cannot be otherwise conceiv'd than as endu'd with Figure, and as having Sides, by which they are contiguous; not to say any thing of the Demonstrations Geometry affords us in this Case: Whereas the Objections of the Atomists, which contain their strongest Proofs for the Negative; being entirely grounded on the Difficulty of conceiving a Number of Parts really infinite, wherein the Imagination is at a loss; are altogether inconclusive: unless upon Supposition that nothing ought to be admitted as certain, but what we have an Idea of, exempt from all Difficulty; tho' a thing otherwise attended with never so much Credibility, grounded on Reasons most evident; and such as are drawn directly from the Nature of the thing it self. Now 'till such Supposition shall be demonstrated, (and how can that be ever done, especially by one under the Character of a Sceptick?) there will not be so much as a Possibility of stirring the Certainty of many Truths, as well speculative as practical; which are manifestly held forth by Reason to all, who consult her with Dispositions proper for that purpose. The sincere Lovers of Truth will ever find a just Medium, between the foolish Presumption of the peremptory Dogmatist; who holds for Demonstrations, all his ill-grounded Fancies, concerning even the most doubtful Matters: and the false Modesty of the rigid Pyrrhonist; who, sinking under the Weight of the smallest Difficulties, boldly rejects all Certainty; on pretence, that he cannot attain to a Knowledge entirely perfect, and exempt from all Mixture of Obscurity. In vain do they heap Difficulty upon Difficulty concerning the Nature and Attributes of God; this will never, in the Judgment of any reasonable Man, either overthrow the Existence of that Infinite Being; or the certain, tho' imperfect Knowledge we have of some of his Perfections; particularly those, which have relation to our Interests and Occasions. In vain do they seek to exaggerate, with all the Cunning of subtle Philosophers, those ill-grounded Doubts; which, on the Subject of moral Obligations, the Mind, either not attentive enough in discerning Truth; or else ingeniously industrious in inventing Fallacy; can form to it self. The Idea of a Creator, boundless in Power, Wisdom, and Goodness; and the Idea of our selves, as intelligent, reasonable, and sociable Creatures: These two Ideas, I say, if well look'd into, and compar'd together in their whole Extent, will always furnish us with steady Grounds of Duty, and sure Rules of Conduct; notwithstanding it may sometimes so fall out, that, for want of Care or Attention, we may, in some uncommon Cases, not know how to apply them; or cannot methodically demonstrate the necessary Connexion of some remote Consequences, with the first Principles of Morality.

S E C T. IV.

THE other Objection, which I purpose to answer in a few Words, is taken from the great Diversity of Opinions there is in the World concerning Virtue and Vice; inso-much that not only some particular Men, but even whole Nations, have openly derided all Morality; or at least some of its Principles. With this View the Pyrrhonists heretofore^a made their long Enumeration of the Contrarieties they had observ'd thereupon; as well those which are found between the Customs of particular Nations; as between the Notions even of Philosophers themselves. But what will all this serve to prove? That Men do not always make a right Use of their Reason*. I readily grant it; and seeing there are, even amongst the Men of Wit and Understanding, some who so strangely misuse their Leisure and Parts; as to employ their utmost Efforts in utterly destroying, or in rendring at least very dubious, the most manifest Truths; on pretence that there are Difficulties, beyond the Reach and narrow Limits of our bounded Understandings; I am not at all surpriz'd, to find some rude and unpolish'd Nations, who being either extremely corrupted; or enslav'd to Opinions, consecrated and establish'd by long Usage and Custom; to have continu'd, either wholly or in part, immers'd in the grossest Ignorance of those moral Truths, which are indeed in themselves evident enough; but not to such, as either wilfully shut their Eyes against the Light of Nature; or who will not give themselves the trouble of explicitly considering, and pursuing those Ideas, which continually, I may say, every Moment, and from all sides, present themselves openly to their view. Or shall we hence infer, that those sure and incontestable Principles of Conduct, if any such there are, ought to have been actually impress'd, even from the Cradle, on the Minds of all Men; so that none could be either ignorant of, or under any mistaken or different Notions about them. Montagne indeed reasons after this manner; An Author, who, amongst a vast number of fine judicious Thoughts, has but too visibly discover'd a Spirit of Pyrhonism, carry'd on beyond its due Bounds^b. They are pleasant, says he, when to give some Certainty to Laws, they say, that there are some of 'em firm, perpetual, and immutable, which they call natural; and say, they are essentially impress'd on the Minds of all Mankind: and of these some make the Number to be Three, some Four, some more, some less; which shows, that even this Impression is a thing as doubtful as any of the rest. Now they are so unfortunate, (for what can I call it else, but Misfortune, that of so infinite a number of Laws, there should not be found one at least, that Fortune and the Temerity of Chance has suffer'd to be universally receiv'd by the Consent of all Nations?) They are, I say, so unhappy, that of those three or four select Laws, there is not so much as one, but is contradicted and disorder'd, not by one Nation only, but by many. And yet this same universal Approbation is the only probable Mark, from which they can argue, or infer, any Laws at all to be natural; for we shou'd without all doubt unanimously follow, whatsoever Nature had really enjoind us; and not only every Nation, but every particular Man would be extremely sensible of the Force and Violence offer'd him, should any attempt to push him on to a Transgression of such Laws. But this is a Supposition not to be admitted without Proof; it being contrary to Experience: and long since own'd to be false in Fact, by the most able Philosophers. ^c Nature alone, (says one of them), cannot furnish us with the knowledge of moral Rectitude and Virtue; she has indeed implanted in us the Seeds of the Science of Virtue, but not the Science it self. This is the Result of those Reflections and Comparisons which the Mind, by parity of Reason, makes between the Things it has often review'd and consider'd. A celebrated^d Philosopher of the last Age, one to whom the World will be eternally oblig'd, for having introduc'd the right manner of philosophising; not that he was infallible neither; nor did he always follow his own Rules; Des Cartes, I say, had made the Opinion of innate Ideas very common among his Followers. But there arose another Philosopher, ^e not long since deceas'd, who has re-establish'd, and put in a new Light the antient Opinion. The Reasons which he alledges, seem so very strong, that whoever examines them with a little Attention, and without Prejudice, cannot refuse to submit to them. Dr. Sherlock, who has taken upon him lately to refute them, has, in my Opinion, with all his Penetration and all his Efforts; only given those who deny innate Ideas, all the reason in the world to confirm themselves in an Opinion, which they see attack'd with so little Success^f. All the Doctor says, is either grounded on abstracted, and scarce intelligible Principles; or on such, as are advanc'd without Proof; or whose just Consequences terminate in the Proof of that, which at the bottom amounts to no more than the very Opinion he opposes. But what is most of all surprizing, he very preptorily affirms, That ^g the Doctrine of Mr. Locke, about the Origine of innate Ideas, may very much serve the Cause of Atheism; for, says he, if none of our Ideas are innate, neither those we have of the Deity, nor those we have of Virtue and Vice; what shall hinder the Atheist from saying, that all those Ideas are the Effects of a wrong Education; and that they were first imprinted on the Minds of Children, for the good of Society; and to restrain and keep them in awe? For my part, I think on the contrary, (nor am I the only one of this Opinion,) that the Clergy themselves give great Advantage to the Atheist; when, not satisfy'd with those incontestable Proofs, we have of the great Truths of Religion and Morality; they chiefly maintain and urge, through an imprudent Zeal, certain Reasons for Proofs; which are really none, or at least very doubtful ones; and then cry out, that all's lost, if these are not allow'd of as well as the former. For after all, I would fain know how Dr. Sherlock, without entering into metaphysical Reasonings, which are generally very uncertain, and do not properly belong to a Dispute about Matter of Fact; will be ever able to prove to an Atheist, that notwithstanding the manifest Ignorance in which whole Nations have been and still are, of some fundamental Duties of the Law of Nature; and the odious and prodigious diversity of Opinions, which have at all times been in the World on the Subject of Morality and Religion; that, notwithstanding all this, I say, every particular Person has innate Ideas of the Deity, and of Virtue? Nor do I see how this Difficulty can be answer'd otherwise, than by saying; that as Men are naturally provided with * Faculties sufficient to acquire the knowledge, of the Author of their Existence, and of the Duties he expects from them; and to form to themselves thereupon right Ideas: so they may remain in Ignorance, or even run into Mistakes about these Points, if they will not make good use of their Understanding: and this Answer hath nothing in it, but what is most solid. God ^h having endued Man with those Faculties of knowing which he hath, was no more oblig'd by his Goodness, to implant those innate Notions in his Mind, than that having given him Reason, Hands, and Materials, he should build him Bridges, or Houses. To alledge therefore the Abuse, which Men make of the Light of Nature in Matters of Morality, as a Proof that there is no Certainty in it; is as poor Reasoning as that of the Epicureans: who think to subvert true Religion, by setting forth all the Evils, Crimes, and Extravagancies that false Zeal, Bigotry, and Hypocrisy, under the specious Pretence of Piety, have occasion'd in the World. ⁱ Tantum Religio potuit suadere Malorum! But let us only consider this Matter in a different Light, and we shall find this Objection it self furnish us with a considerable Proof, or at least a Prepossession in favour of the natural Evidence of the Principles of Morality; and of that Impression, which there is reason to believe these Truths wou'd make on the Minds of all Men, did they but hearken to Reason. In effect, it appears by History, that those Nations, which seem to have had no sense at all of Virtue, are very few in Number. By the Confession of Mr. Bayle, ^k The most general Rules of Morality have been preserv'd almost every where, and have at least obtain'd in all Communities, where Reason and Knowledge have been at all cultivated. Is there any Nation, ^l (says a very great Orator, and heathen Philosopher,) where Civility, good Nature, and Gratitude are not thought amiable, and had in esteem? And where the proud, the mischievous, the cruel, and ungrateful are not had in Contempt and Abhorrence? It has too been very judiciously observ'd, that ^m No Legislator cou'd ever yet procure Laws, that were entirely bad, to pass: The Managers concern'd in passing such Laws, have either dexterously tack'd 'em to others that were good; or else have had recourse to violent Measures, either to e- stablish, or to maintain 'em; so that the very submission to unjust Constitutions, is even a Proof of the necessity of equitable and good ones. It will perhaps be reply'd, that it is the Profit, which accrues from the Practice of the Rules of Morality, that causes 'em to be generally approv'd and receiv'd into the World. But, tho' this cannot be deny'd to contribute much towards it; yet is it not the only, nor the principal Reason thereof. For 'tis very hard to conceive, that in so many different places, and in all Ages, such Multitudes of every Rank, Condition, and Character, should have given their Consent to these sort of Maxims, merely for the Advantage each Person for himself found therein; so as at the same time to think themselves exempt from all Obligation to observe them, whenever they cou'd Transgress with Impunity. Indeed there has been, and still are too many, without any other Regard for them, than upon that foot; whether it be, because they have accusom'd themselves to do so, in order to satisfy quietly their Passions; or whether because they have suffer'd themselves to be impos'd upon by some ill-grounded Subtilties: but then we see, that the wisest and most sensible part of the World have, at all times, judg'd of 'em quite otherwise. Nay all, whether learned or unlearned, have found in 'em a certain Agreement with, and Conformity to right Reason; and that too more or less distinct, as they have been endow'd with more or less good natural Sense: and in proportion to the Progress each Man has made in Reasoning and Knowledge, he still finds this Agreement become more and more sensible. Men have always distinguish'd the Idea of Duty, from that of Profit; even in those Maxims, where these two Ideas have been most inseparably blended together: the first of these, even when they scarce, or not at all perceiv'd the true Foundations thereof; has still made an Impression, sufficient to form in them such a Conception of it self, as carries with it a peculiar Force and Efficacy; plainly distinct from, and independent of that of the other. Men have scarce ever been able to forbear secretly reproaching themselves, as oft as they had sacrific'd to their Interest the practice of that, which they look'd upon to be their Duty. And it has even been observ'd, that * wicked Men would choose, (were it possible) to enjoy the Fruits of a criminal Action, without committing the Crime it self. If we reflect rightly upon the Matter, it must be own'd, that the gross of Mankind are not so much as capable of comprehending, or seeing to the end of all those prospects of Utility, which a skilful Lawgiver, or profound Philosopher, might have had in view: so that it often happens here, that the Notion of Duty alone makes the Impression; and it is likewise the Intention of the Law-maker, that it should do so; for they well know the great power that this Notion of Duty has over the Minds of Men, and that it in many cases lies level to the Capacity of Multitudes, who have no Idea of the expediency of the thing; which often mounts higher than their pitch of thinking can reach. Hence it has sometimes happen'd, that Religion has been call'd in as an Auxiliary; and the Law-givers have given out, that their Laws were of divine Extraction. After all, this Reply supposes that, which will alone furnish one good Argument, towards the establishing the Solidity of the Maxims of Morality; and that will at the same time show, that they are adapted to all Capacities. For, since the Creator, who no doubt designs that all Men should be happy, has so manifestly and inseparably connected human Virtue and human Felicity; it is clear, that he indelibly requires of every one an exact Observation of the Law of Nature; and consequently, that the Principles and Rules thereof ought to be such, as may be easily known and demonstrated.

^e Mr. Locke, in his Essay on Human Understanding, Book I.

^f This was my Judgment six Years ago, form'd on the Extract in Bernard's Nouv. de la Repub. des Lett. May 1705. I had reason to believe, that that ingenious Journalist had neither weaken'd, or misrepresented in the main, the Reasons of this English Doctor. I have since found it to be fact, having read the Book it self, well translated into French in 1708. But as to my Judgment of the Doctor's Reasonings, I am so far from altering it, that I find my self more and more confirm'd in it by reading that long Digression, where he pretends to establish innate Ideas; and to confute those who deny 'em. The judicious and disinterested will discern, who are most likely to clear the Matter; whether those who go upon Experience, the only way we have to know the Truth; and upon the proper and certain Character of Ideas; which is to make them selves be perceiv'd, where ever they happen to be; or whatever at bottom their Nature may be: or those, who being oblig'd to acknowledge Experience to be against them, do yet advance nothing but Reasons of Congruity; and yet charge others with want of Penetration to see the Difficulties.

S E C T. V.

I Conclude then, with the saying of Strato in the New Dialogues of the Dead^a, whatever the other Party may say of it; that Reason; in all Cases where human Conduct is concern'd, affords Resolutions most clearly decisive. But the Misfortune is, that we don't consult her. And it must be own'd, to the shame of Mankind, that this very Science, which ought to have been the great Business of Men, and the chief Object of all their Search and Enquiry; has in all times been treated with the greatest Neglect and Indifference. * Socrates was astonish'd to see, That when there was occasion to have any one taught the Trade of a Shoemaker, a Carpenter, a Smith, or the Art of Riding; proper Places were never wanting, whither he might be sent, to be made a Master in these sorts of Things: and that, there was every where plenty of such, as knew how to break, and manage Horses and Oxen; whereas, if any one had a mind to be instructed himself in the Rules of Justice, or have 'em taught to his Children or Slaves; there was no place to be found to go to for that Purpose. A considerable time after this Philosopher's Days^b, we find Cicero making the same Complaint: What can be the reason, (says he,) that, since we consist of a Soul as well as a Body, the Art of curing, and preserving the Body in Health, has been so early sought out; and found so useful, as to have its Invention ascrib'd to the Gods themselves: Whereas the Art of curing the Diseases of the Mind, has neither been near so much sought after before, or cultivated and improv'd after, it was invented; nor has it been had in Esteem and Admiration, but by few; whereas on the contrary, it has been even hated and suspected by many? It is, however, no very difficult Matter to discover the Reasons hereof; and 'tis withal highly useful, to give 'em their due Consideration. It is but too certain, that the several Necessities of Life, real or imaginary; the false and mistaken Interests; the Impressions of Example, and receiv'd Customs; the Prevalency of Fashions, and the Torrent of Opinions in Vogue, with the early Prejudices of Education; but, above all, the predominant Passions and Vices; do generally draw off the Minds of Men from a serious Study of Morality; and won't let them apply their Faculties to those Things, which really are their most proper Objects; and on which too really depends their true Felicity. ^c Philosophy (says the Author of the Dialogues, a little before cited, very pleasantly) has no Business but with Men, and not at all with the rest of the universe. The Astronomer fixes his Thoughts upon the Stars; the Naturalist on Nature; and the Philosopher on himself. — But because Men find it troublesome, to have her meddling with their Affairs, and perpetually at their Elbows, checking and regulating their Passions; they have therefore sent her away to the Heavens, there to take an account of the Order and Motions of the Planets; or else they travel her over the terrestrial Globe, and make her examine with the utmost Exactness all that is there to be seen. In a word, they take care always to employ her at as great a distance from themselves as is possible. The few, who have apply'd themselves to the Study of Morality, have done it for the most part in a manner confus'd, and superficial enough; and often so, as even to build upon Principles either entirely false, or obscure and uncertain; either foreign to its proper Business, or mixt up with gross Errors and Absurdities. From whence it comes to pass, that in all Languages, the Terms of Morality, both in common Discourse, and in the Writing of the learned; are such, as have the most obscure, confus'd, indetermin'd, and unfix'd Ideas, of any other Terms whatever. And this might make it be suspected, that the Principles too of Morality are likewise very abstruse; were it not known by the common Experience of all Ages, that Men generally despise the Things which are plain and ordinary, to run after such as are extraordinary and mysterious; and that they either will not know, or will reject even Truth it self, unless she brings some Charm with her to raise their Curiosity; and gratify their Passion for what is marvelous and uncommon. This is what has been judiciously observ'd, and upon the same Subject too, by the famous ^c Confucius, the Chinese Philosopher: I know very well, says he, why the greatest part of Mankind do not follow the great Road of Mediocrity, altho' so easy to find; 'tis because the learned despise it; and because, imagining their Penetration to reach far beyond that Medium, they neglect it as below 'em; love to advance unheard of Principles; and engage themselves in Ways more difficult and dangerous. But it must be acknowledg'd, that it is not so much the Prejudices of the Understanding; as the Illusions of the Heart, and the Tyranny establish'd in the World with relation to Opinions; which form the grand Obstacles to the serious study of Morality: and to the Attainment of a more exact Knowledge of our Duty. Mr. Locke ^f has very well express'd it: It is not to be expected, (viz. that any will very much apply themselves to make Discoveries in Matters of Morality,) whilst the desire of Esteem, Riches, or Power, makes Men espouse the well endowed Opinions in Fashion, and then seek Arguments either to make good their Beauty, or varnish over, and cover their

Deformity. --- Whilst the Parties of Men, cram their Tenets down all Mens Throats, whom they can get into their Power, without permitting them to examine their Truth or Falshood; and will not let Truth have fair play in the World, nor Men the Liberty to search after it; What Improvements can be expected of this kind? What greater Light-can be hoped for in the moral Sciences? The subject part of Mankind, in most Places, might, instead thereof, with Egyptian Bondage, expect Egyptian Darkeness, were not the Candle of the Lord set up by himself in Mens Minds, which it is impossible for the Breath or Power of Man wholly to extinguish. After all this, is it to be wonder'd at, that such, whose Occupations and Distractions of Life, or want of Genius and outward Helps, do not allow 'em to engage in long and profound Meditations; (that is in a Word, the greatest part of Mankind): are found to have generally Understandings so short and narrow, and Ideas so false or so confus'd in Matters of Morality? Altho', as we have already said, every one be by Nature capable to instruct himself therein, as far as his particular Station requires; it has no doubt been always God's Will, that they, who had the greatest Light, and whom his Providence had furnish'd with the greatest Helps; should communicate their Knowledge to such, as were not able of themselves to acquire it so easily; or in so great a degree. But, in order to set in its full Light, this inexcusable Negligence of Mankind, in a thing of such vast Importance; I shall here present the Reader with a short History of the Progress of Morality; and of the manner how it has been cultivated through all the past Ages of the World.

S E C T. VI.

TH E R E are two sorts of Men, who ought to apply themselves in a more particular manner to Morality; (viz.) The publick Ministers of Religion; and the Men of Learning; or those who make it their Profession or Business, to cultivate and improve their Understandings by the study of the Sciences. Both the one and the other are equally oblig'd, as much as in them lies, as well to be instructed therein themselves; as to teach the ignorant: but the Obligation of the former, is more strict and indispensable; than that of the latter.

It is certain, that ^a Morality is the Daughter of Religion, that they go hand in hand together; and that the Perfection of the latter, is the Standard of Perfection in the former. This has been acknowledg'd by a great Emperour and heathen Philosopher. Thou wilt never, said ^b he, do any thing, tho' purely human, well, if thou art ignorant of the relation it bears to Things divine; nor any thing divine, if thou knowest not what Affinity and Connexion it has with Things humane. In Fact, the fundamental Principles of Natural Religion, which must be the Basis of all other Religion; are also the most firm, or rather only, Foundation of this Science of Morality. Without a Deity, Duty, Obligation, Right, are no more, * to say the Truth, than fine Ideas; which may please the Mind, but can scarce touch the Heart; and which of themselves, cannot impose an indispensable Necessity to act or not to act, in such or such a certain manner. The Ideas of Order, Decency, and Conformity with Reason, have in 'em without doubt something real; they are founded on the Nature of Things; on certain Relations most true: and even those who cannot explain 'em distinctly and fully, have still a Sense, a Feeling of 'em, tho' perhaps not altogether so distinct: Our Minds are so fram'd, that they necessarily rest satisfy'd with 'em, as soon as propos'd; and thus it is, that moral Honesty or Virtue has thro' all Ages influenc'd Mankind, in all civiliz'd Nations. But to give these Ideas their full Force and due Measure of Efficacy; to make 'em strong enough to maintain their Ground against Passion and Self-interest; they will require a superiour Being; a Being superiour to us in Power and Might, who has subjected us to a strict Conformity therewith in our Conduct; who has so bound us thereto, that it is out of our Power to disengage our selves, or at pleasure dispense with the Obligation; in a word, who has put us under an Obligation, properly so call'd; to follow each of us the Light of his own proper Reason. This Fear of a Deity, who punishes Vice and rewards Virtue, has so great an Efficacy; that, altho' the fundamental Principles of Religion be much darken'd, by the Intermixture of Errour and Superstition; yet if they are not entirely corrupted and destroy'd, it will still continue to actuate, and have a considerable Influence. The purer these Principles are, and the better they are supported, the more they contribute to the strengthening the Foundations of Morality; and to the clear setting forth its Rules in all their Consequences. But shou'd you make the finest System in the World, if Religion has not its part in it, it will be little more than (as I may say) a speculative Morality; and you will be found to build on a sandy Foundation. This being so, it was natural to expect, that the publick Ministers of Religion, should have made Morality their principal Study; in order to conform themselves to it in all their Proceedings; and to give the People such just Ideas thereof, as might be capable of producing solid Virtue. But they have been far short, in this respect, of acting up to either their Duty, or Abilities. In the Times of Paganism, the Theologers, Disciners, and Priests, who gave out the celestial Oracles, and call'd themselves the Interpreters of the Will of the Gods; took little or no Care to teach Men the Rules of Virtue. And I must needs confess, that Lectures of good sound Morality, in their Mouths, wou'd have but ill suited the monstrous Ideas they gave of the Deity; or those Failings, Imperfections, and even Vices, which they, by an unaccountable Perversion of all natural Knowledge, ascrib'd to the Deity it self. We see therefore the ancient Doctors of Christianity, vigorously reproaching the Pagans with this illegal Divorce between Religion and Morality. They who teach and instruct others in the Worship of the Gods, (says ^c Lactantius), speak not a word of any thing that tends to the Regulation of Manners, and Conduct of Life: They do not so much as make Enquiry of any sort after Truth; but confine themselves wholly to the Knowledge of the Ceremonies of Divine Service; which require only the Ministry of the Body, and in which the Sentiments of the Mind have really no part.---- ^d The Philosophy and the Religion of the Heathens, are two Things entirely separate one from the other. Wisdom or Philosophy has its peculiar Professors, who teach not the way of approaching the Gods: And Religion also has its Ministers, who teach not the Rules of Wisdom. Whence this is apparent, that theirs is neither true Wisdom, nor true Religion. And indeed, as Mr. Bayle has observ'd, "It would be very difficult to ^e prove, that the Priests of Paganism requir'd any thing, besides the exterior or outward Shew of Piety; or that they press'd Amendment of Life upon the People; and denounc'd, that, without a sincere and persevering Repentance and Reformation of all corrupt Inclinations; Vows, Offerings, Processions, Sacrifices, Ceremonies, ordinary or extraordinary, could not appease the Anger of the Gods. It is much easier to prove, that they suffer'd the World to rest under this common Illusion; That it was sufficient to be liberal towards the Gods; and to follow the Formula of Church-Ceremonies. The Satyr of Perseus will serve to convince us of this; where having first thunder'd out against those who make a Bank or Fund of Religion; he immediately calls upon and challenges the Priests, to shew what Gold has to do with holy Things: "Tell me, you who are our Priests, of what Use is Gold in our holy Places? Even just as much, as the little Babies which bridal Virgins offer to Venus. Why do we not offer to the Gods something, which neither the Cotta's, nor the Messala's can present to them, with all their magnificent Chargers pil'd up with the Flesh of their most exquisite Victims? Why do we not offer to them a just, sincere, and generous Heart, deeply imbud with the most lively Sentiments of Justice and Honour? Let me but have this Present to make 'em, and the meanest Sacrifice shall not fail to draw down upon me the choicest Blessings. Does not this insinuate, that that it was the Priests who cherish'd that mercenary Spirit, that Traffick and Trade of Devotion, that reigning Abuse; which made Men so lavish towards the Gods, as to spare nothing in Victims and Offerings; imagining that the Gods, being pleas'd as much as Men, with Presents of Gold and Silver, cou'd not then but grant 'em whatsoever they ask'd?—We cannot tell whether these Priests were learned or not; and whether they had philosophiz'd on the “ Nature of the Gods: But this we have Reason “ to believe; that they had neither Virtue nor “ Probity enough, to persuade Men to place a “ much greater Confidence, in the Purity of the “ Heart; than in the exterior Practices of divine “ Worship; and Disbursements made on account “ of Religion.” The Profit of the Priests wou’d have been too much diminish’d, if Men had follow’d the Maxims of the Philosophers. I shall add to this a gentle Wipe that Socrates gives ’em, in that Dialogue of Plato, which bears the Name of Euthyphro; that is, of him with whom Socrates is introduc’d discoursing; (whose Greek Name answers exactly to another Greek Name more in use with us, called Orthodox; i. e. one that is in the right). He was a Soothsayer, and Socrates seems to reproach in his Person the Priests in general, as well as others of that Stamp; ^e with being too reserved in communicating themselves; and that they did not willingly impart to others their Wisdom; that is to say, their Knowledge, or what they themselves had discover’d. By which in all Likelihood he intends chiefly what relates to Morality; as is intimated by the Opposition he makes between their Conduct, and the Conduct himself observ’d in his Conversations; which ran generally upon that Science: and which tended solely to correct the Errors of Mankind, and inspire ’em with the Love of Virtue. Besides, the very Subject of the Dialogue gives us clearly to understand the false Ideas the Priests had, upon the Subject of Morality; for we there see Euthyphro, who thinks he is doing the finest Action in the World, offering himself as a voluntary Accuser against his own Father; in a Matter too, where he pretends to convict him of no less than Mur-ther. Some perhaps will object to me here, what I have elsewhere shewn in ^b one of my Notes; that, amongst the Heathens, even the common People were not ignorant, that as Virtue was well pleasing; so Vice was odious to the Deity: From whence one might be apt to infer, that the People were beholden to the publick Ministers of Religion for this Knowledge at least.

 But it is very probable, that Principles of this sort were preserv’d among the People, either by ancient Tradition; or by some Remains of the Light of natural Religion; or by both these together: And that, if the Priests did not directly teach the contrary, but did sometimes even recommend Virtue; it was only in general loose Terms, without ever entering into the Particulars requisite for Instruction; which without doubt they were not very capable of doing. But this is sufficient for my Design; which is to shew, that, in the Time of Paganism, the publick Ministers of Religion, who ought to have made it their principal Study, busied themselves about nothing less than this Science of Morality.

AMongst the Jews, it does not appear that the Priests apply’d themselves to this Science: And from the Time that Prophets ceas’d from among that chosen People of God; that is to say, a little after their Return from the Babylonish Captivity; the Doctors and publick Interpreters of the Law began insensibly to corrupt Morality; so far were they from unfolding the true Principles thereof, and drawing out those Principles into all their Consequences; as they might easily have done, with the Help and Assistance of that Revelation, of which they were the Depositories: But being entirely busy’d about their Civil Law, or the Study of Ceremonies; and besides fill’d with carnal Prejudices, and scrupulously attach’d to the Letter of the Law; they either did not at all penetrate into, or else did entirely frustrate and confound the Spirit and Design of the Legislatour. They, on pretence that God, to sute himself to the Weakness of the Jewish Nation, had prescrib’d to ’em a great Number of Rites and Ceremonies; insisted much more upon the Performance of the exterior Worship, and the practical Punctilio’s of Devotion; than the Purity of the Heart and Inclinations, with an exact Conformity, and steady Adherence to the Rules of Virtue; and what was still worse, by their false Glosses, and by their human ^a Traditions, they came at last to destroy entirely several of the most incontestable Principles of the Law of Nature. They invented, for example, a thousand ridiculous Subtilties, to furnish Men with Expedients for eluding the Obligation of the most solemn Oaths, and Promises. Hypocrite, (say the Scribes and Pharisees, whom Jesus for that Reason treats as Hypocrites and blind Guides)

 but whosoever shall swear by the Gold of the Temple, crite* shall swear by the ^{*}Altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the Gift (or Offering) that is upon it, he is guilty: or oblig’d to keep his Oath.

 — *Whilst they paid † Tithe of Mint, and Anise, it self entirely void. Yet the Priests, and the the Benefit of the Church; had the face to maintain, that if any one had made a Vow to God of all that he should be able to give to his Father or Mother; such a Vow was good in Law, and irrevocable; so that after such Vow made, this unnatural, or rather impious Child was, according to them, not only discharg'd from giving any Succour or Relief to his Parents in their Necessities; but even bound in point of Conscience not to do it; on account of the Obligation of this same Vow: Their Decision runs thus: ^d Who-so-ever shall say to his Father or his Mother, what I could have succour'd you withal, be it consecrated to God; he must not succour, that is, honour his Father or his Mother, according to the Commandment. And whereas God, for Reasons founded on the Constitution of the Israelitish Government; had forbidden the Jews to have much Commerce with other Nations; and had even expressly commanded them to exterminate some of 'em. They hereupon entertain'd Sentiments of implacable Hatred and Animosity against all the rest of Mankind: So that the Jew believ'd himself wholly discharg'd from all the common Offices of Humanity^e or Civility^f, with respect to all Foreigners, unless they embrac'd the Jewish Religion; he insisted likewise, that he was warranted by Law to treat 'em in a hostile manner; and that he was not only permitted, but positively commanded to take Vengeance of 'em, whenever it could be safely put in practice; and so far was he from any Possibility of being undeceiv'd in these barbarous and inhuman Opinions of his, by any Instruction he might receive from his Teachers; that all their Discourses tended to nothing so much as to confirm him in 'em. The Pharisees, besotted with the Notions of Judas the Gaulonite; vainly imagin'd, that there could be no Magistrate, unless of their own Nation, and establish'd by the immediate Appointment of God, to whom Obedience was due for Conscience sake; and upon this they founded their particular Doctrine, ^g that it was unlawful to pay Tribute to the Roman Emperour; tho' in peaceable Possession of their Country. ^h And many such-like Things did they, as our Lord Jesus Christ lays to their Charge, in many Places of the Gospel. As for those Doctors, the Jews have had during all the following Ages down to the present Time; these seem to have made it their sole Aim to surpass their Predecessors in this Particular; witness the Extravagancies, detestable Maxims, and impious Notions, with which they have stuff'd their Talmud; and wherewith the Books of their Rabbins do so abound. You may find there, for instance, ⁱ that 'tis the most innocent Thing in the World, to utter all manner of Curses and Execrations against Christians: that it is not so much as a Thing tolerated, for any one to presume to save ^k an Idolater, that's a drowning; or in danger of perishing, by any other Accident: or to do the Office of a Physician to him, tho' he's sure to be well paid for it; unless he have just Cause to fear some hurt to himself, from the Resentment of the Patient, on account of his refusal: In this particular Case, say they, he may assist him, but always upon condition that he be very well paid for his Pains; for it is by no means lawful to do it gratis. Thus you ^l see how these False-Teachers have corrupted the pure Morals of their Legislatour Moses.

JESUS Christ did, thro' the whole Course of his Ministry, incessantly oppose, and utterly destroy the erroneous Maxims, and pernicious Glosses of these Jewish Doctors. He re-establish'd Morality in its utmost Purity; he fully laid open the true Sources thereof; and he gave forth Rules touching the whole Duty both of Mankind in general, and of each Person in particular; they were general indeed, but perfect; entirely conformable to right Reason, and the true Interests of Mankind. His Disciples every where preach'd up this most holy Doctrine; by the Light of which, if well understood and unfolded, a Man may securely direct his Judgment in the Decision of all imaginable Cases. Nevertheless, even in the Time of the Apostles themselves, certain false Doctors, not a few, had crept into the Church; who began to corrupt the Christian Morality, by pretending ^a it was necessary to add thereunto, the Observation of the Mosaic Ceremonies; altho' the Son of God had manifestly discharg'd Men from the Obligation of submitting themselves to that Yoke; a Thing in its own Nature much more proper to draw Men off from the Practice of true Virtue; than either to preserve, or promote it. There were likewise some ^b, who teaching another Doctrine than that of Jesus Christ, gave heed to Fables, and endless Genealogies, which caus'd Questions and Disputes, rather than godly edifying in that Faith, which GOD demands; and in that Charity, which is the end of the Commandments, both of the Law, and of the Gospel; knavish and ignorant Doctors, who understood neither what they said, nor whereof they affirm'd, and who turn'd aside unto vain jangling. Others there were, who ^c despis'd Government; who being audacious and insolent, were not afraid to speak

NO marvel then, if after the Death of the Apostles, and their Primitive Disciples, the Evil grew every day worse and worse. The extreme Fondness and Conceit, which the following Ages grew into, of Fables^a, and Allegories; of a^b false Eloquence, and of the groundless Imaginations of the Heathen^c Philosophers; the profound Ignorance they were in, of the Art of Reasoning justly^d, and of the right Method of expounding the Holy Scripture; the Precipitation with which they acted, in pursuance of the rash Dictates of an over-heated Imagination; the Ambition^e and bad Morals of the greatest Part of the Clergy; more jealous of their own Rights, and more intent upon discussing Points of Discipline, or abstracted Notions of Metaphysics; than diligent in studying themselves, or teaching the People, the Rules of Morality; the dreadful Disorders, and scandalous Divisions, which did so often rend the Church; the gross Frauds and Abuses which from time to time stole into Practice; and which at last oblig'd them to come to a publick Reformation thereof; a Thing always found very difficult even but to undertake, tho' much more so in the Execution; add to these the little Solidity, which we find in the greatest Part of those Works, which are the Remains of Ecclesiastical Antiquity: all this, I say, gives us reason to believe, that the Study of Morality, during all this Interval, notwithstanding the Light of the Gospel; made but little Progress in the World. But, to put this Matter clearly beyond all possibility of doubt, we shall now descend to Particulars.

Who knows not, (says a Minister^f of the Reform'd Religion) that most of the Fathers have not wrote at all upon Matters of Conscience; and that those who have touch'd thereupon, have said nothing to the greatest Part of those Questions, the Determination whereof was of the greatest Importance? In fact, it appears, both by those Books we have transmitted down to us; and by the Catalogues of those that are lost; that the greatest Part of those, we call Fathers of the Church, scarce ever took Pen in hand on any other Subject, besides Matters purely speculative; or concerning the Discipline of the Church. It was but very rarely, if at all, that they handled Points of Morality; and that too only occasionally; and ever in a manner by no means accurate, or methodical. The Sermons, which they sometimes made on this Subject, were so stuff'd with the vain Ornaments of a false Rhetorick; that the Truth did, as it were, ly smother'd under heaps of Figures, and pompous Declamations. And the greatest Part of those moral Reflections, which they scatter'd here and there in their Works, were extracted, by forc'd and far-fetch'd Allegories, from a thousand different Places of Scripture, where the true literal Sense itself made nothing to their Purpose. To be convinc'd of this, we need only read those Collections, which some of the most extravagant^g Admirers of Ecclesiastical Antiquity, have given us of the Thoughts, which appear'd to them, the most beautiful in these Works of the Fathers. Besides, these ancient Doctors, even in their very best Treatises of Morality, perpetually^h confound the Duties of Mankind in general, with the particular Duties of a Christian, precisely consider'd as such; as well as the Principles of Morality purely natural, with those of Christian Morality: on the other hand you shall often find 'em putting too great a Difference between the Man and the Christian; and by pushing this Distinction too far, run themselves into the Absurdity, of laying down Rules that are impracticable. To conclude then with what is a most apparent Proof, of the little Care they had to improve Morality; there is scarce one of them, who has not been guilty of very gross Errors thereupon. Let us but run over the most celebrated of them, and they will furnish us with manifest Examples of what I am saying.

Christian Conduct; but such as abound with Maxims excessively rigid, and far remote from any thing now in practice. It is in truth a confus'd Heap of Precepts without Order, without Connexion, full of Declamation, and dark mystical Allusion; in a word, such as one would expect from an Author, who "writes almost always without either Method or Coherence; and who himself, in another Work, professes to have wrote with design to hide and to confound, as I may say, Things; to the intent, that none but those, who were Men of Ability and Understanding, and willing to undergo the Fatigue of a laborious Application, might be able to comprehend them. There are some Passages in this Pedagogue, which, in the Opinion of Mr. ^p Du Pin, ought not to be read by every body. And as Clement of Alexandria did in the main give Preference to the Philosophy of the Stoicks; so we find, in this Work of his, several of their Paradoxes: For example^q, he maintains, ^r That the Christian, and he alone, is a rich Man; a Paradox very like that of the Stoicks, who said the same Thing of their wise Man. Those Philosophers express'd themselves thus^s: That the wise Man, and he alone, is rich; so that Clement has only chang'd the word Wise, for that of Christian. The Reasons likewise which he makes use of to prove his Thesis, are much the same with those of the Stoicks; as any one may see, by comparing what he says, with the Explication, which Cicero gives of that same Stoick Maxim, in his Paradoxes^t. And when he explains that * Precept in the Gospel, † When they persecute you in this City, flee ye into another; he still reasons upon the Principles of the Stoicks, who deny'd that Pain was an Evil; The Lord, says he, does not enjoin us to fly, as if 'twas an Evil to be persecuted; nor does he command us to avoid Death by flight, as a Thing to be fear'd. And then our Doctor, proceeding to shew the Reason, on which this Permission or Commandment of flying from Persecution is grounded, suggests this; that otherwise we should give occasion to Persecutors to commit Murther: For, says he, the Will of Christ here is, that we should not be any ways aiding or assisting to others in the doing what is evil, &c. It was the Chimerical Idea of a wise Man, according to the Stoicks, to be entirely without Passions: And thus Clement in another place, makes his true^u Christian exempt from all Passions or Affections, even the most innocent; * Excepting those only, which regard the Preservation of the Body; such as Hunger, and Thirst, with others of the like Nature. Upon this Principle, he maintains, That Jesus Christ and his Apostles^v had not any Passions at all;

and that Jesus Christ himself had never any, even the least Impulse of either Pleasure or Pain; That he never had any occasion to Eat; and that, if he did Eat, 'twas for fear of passing for a Ghost. He with equal Prudence too justifies the Idolatry of the Pagans, by saying, ^z That God had given them the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, to the intent, that they should adore 'em; and by that Worship lift up their Minds to God himself. A Professor in Divinity, (A) of the Lutheran Communion, has endeavour'd to vindicate Clement with regard to some of the before-mention'd Errours. But, whoever examines what he has said, will find, that he succeeds no better here, than when he maintains, that the Pedagogue and Stromata are excellent Works, both for their Morality; as well as for their Style and Method. The very Analysis, he himself gives of them, does well nigh furnish out full Proof of the contrary; and shew the little Foundation there is, for those magnificent Encomiums, he is pleas'd to bestow on the Presbyter of Alexandria.

Tertullian, to say nothing here of the Enthusiasm, and overstrain'd Austerities, of the Montanists, by whom he suffer'd himself to be impos'd upon; ^{aa} seems on some Occasions to have stretch'd a little too far, this most true Principle; (viz.) That all, who countenance or assist wicked Men in their vicious Practices, or contribute in any manner to what is sinful, become thereby guilty; and to have put too rigorous an Interpretation on things, that were in themselves justifiable; such as, for instance, ^{bb} the bearing Arms in defence of the Government; the illuminating one's House, and bedecking it with Laurels in honour of one's Prince; the making use of common Expressions, which may chance to have some reference to Idolatry. And this seems to have been the Case, when defending, in his Book of the Garland, the Action of a certain Soldier, who had refus'd to put a Garland on his Head; he maintains, that Christians are absolutely forbid to wear Garlands; as also to bear Arms. He goes so far as to call these Chaplets or Coronets, which Soldiers us'd to put on their Heads, the Poms of the Devil; and a Sin against Nature. When he is declaiming against Plays, he suffers himself to be transported beyond all Bounds, and gives into false Notions; as when he says, That * 'tis the Devil that mounts the Actors on their Buskins, in order to make Jesus Christ a Lyar; who has said, that no one can add one Cubit to his Stature. He will have it, That a Christian cannot in Conscience ^{cc} exercise the Office of a Judge; nor serve as an Executioner of Justice. He seems to maintain, that † one cannot be an Emperour and a Christian at the same time. In his Books of Monogamy, ^{da} and Exhortation to Chastity; he absolutely condemns second Marriages, as a sort of Adultery. He maintains, ^{ca} in his Book of flying from Persecution; that we are absolutely forbidden to fly in Times of Persecution; or to give Money, to avoid being tortur'd. After this, it is not to be wonder'd at, that he condemns Self-defence against an unjust Aggressor, as a Thing contrary to Christian Patience. His Reasons for the Purpose are as remarkably weak; as his Maxim is rigorous, and overstrain'd. He says, ^{} that the Gospel without reserve forbids us, to render Evil for Evil: That it is inroaching on the Prerogative of God, and the Homage due to him; to arrogate to ourselves the Power of Self-Defence, as oft as we shall judge it necessary: That when Jesus Christ says, Judge not, that ye be not judged; he demands and expects a Patience carry'd even to this Point; for who else can be said not to judge another, but he who is so patient, as not to defend himself? Behold, in what a manner Tertullian explains the Scripture; and on what Principles he founds those Maxims of Morality, he is pleas'd to advance.

ORIGEN, in his Homilies, is full of moral Instructions: But they are scarce any thing more than moral Reflections, or the Morals of Scripture Stories, extracted out of the Facts by dint of Allegory; and propos'd in a manner, not very proper to stir up the Affections; or produce in the Mind any rational well grounded Conviction. 'Tis known, that this famous Doctor, by a Mistake gross enough, hastily giving into the literal Sense of these Words of our Saviour ^{ff}; There be Eunuchs, which have made themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake; executed on himself this mistaken Precept, or Advice: and Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, did, before he became his Capital Enemy, admire this Action of his, as an Act of heroic Virtue.

St. Cyprian, "Was in the Marriage-State when he was converted; ^{es} but from that time, even before he was baptiz'd, he confin'd himself to the strict Rule of Continence; as his Deacon Pontius has it: Which shews, that it was look'd upon to be a kind of Holiness to live a single Life. A Notion agreeable enough to the Ideas of Virtue, Men had at that time; which, in many Cases, were as remote from the common Usage of Life, as was the Rhetorick of the same Age; which was then so much the more had in esteem; as the Turn it gave Things was more strange and uncommon: The one being as little fitted to procure the Good of our Neighbour, and of Society; as the other was to promote Perspicuity of Discourse, and furnish the Mind with just Ideas. Cyprian, not content with separating himself from his Wife, did moreover give all he had to the Poor. — The great Conflicts and Struggles he had to go thro' with, on account of this rigid Abstinence from his Wife; were doubtless no small Mortification to him. That the Christian Religion does not enjoin needless or useless Mortifications, is pretty certain: So that the only Thing that remains to be known is, whether we are in any better Condition to serve God, by altogether abstaining from a Thing, the Use of which has in itself nothing criminal, and which we cannot but be still desiring; than when we continue to enjoy the moderate Use of it. But be that as it will; from the Time of St. Cyprian, this new sort of Continency began to be look'd upon as a great Virtue; tho' a thing altogether unknown to former Ages. — ^{hb} There is scarce any thing that St. Cyprian treats of, but in the declamatory Style; and he often expresses the most common Things in such a figurative and affected manner; that, if the Reader be not very much upon his guard, he will be easily led to imagine, that every thing he says is of the utmost Importance. And I may add, that had not this been the true Bent and Cast of his Genius, he could never have taken so much pleasure in the reading of Tertullian; who every where makes this his constant Practice. — ⁱ Amongst the Arguments he makes use of, to persuade young Women to renounce the Vanities of ^{sk} Dress; he says, 'tis running counter to the Will of God, to make use of Paint, as also to black one's Hair; because our Lord has said: ^{††} Thou canst not make one Hair white, or black; and yet, adds Cyprian, ye attempt to surmount a Difficulty, which God has judg'd insurmountable." — An Argument that either proves nothing; or else proves, that 'tis not lawful for us to trim our Hair, or Beards: for the whole Reasoning of St. Cyprian turns on this Maxim ^l: "That every thing that grows naturally, is the Work of God; but whatever receives change, is the Work of the Devil." In his Notions too with respect to Martyrdom, he seems to come very little, if at all, short of the false Ideas, Men had in those days form'd to themselves about that Matter. For he is careful to comfort ^{mm} beforehand such, as having confess'd Jesus Christ, might perhaps come short of the Honour of being Martyrs; because it might possibly happen, that before their Turns came to suffer, the Persecution might cease. — Which shews a Disposition very different from the Sentiments of him, who, when just upon the Point of suffering the Pain of the Cross, ^{||} said: O my Father, if it be possible, let this Cup pass from me." St. Cyprian, in his Tract of the Usefulness of Patience [†], commends Abel very much, for suffering himself to be murder'd by his Brother, without making any Resistance; as it were on purpose to be a Prelude to the Constancy of the Martyrs: Whereby, as on the one hand, he guesses at a Circumstance, of which there is not the least Footstep in the History of Genesis; so on the other hand, he utterly destroys both here, as well as in other Places, the natural Right, that all Men have to a just Self-defence. When ^m he designs to rebuke those who rebel against Bishops, he makes use of an Argument, "Which either proves nothing at all; or else that we ought to pay a blind Obedience to all Bishops, who are but duly elected according to the common Form." In his Answer ^o to a Letter of Florence Pupian, an African Bishop, ^p "He equals Bishops to the Apostles; and maintains, that 'tis an insupportable Piece of Pride, to pretend to judge of them; That Pupian in particular was an insolent Fellow, to refuse to acknowledge Cyprian for a Lawful Bishop, until he should be convinc'd thereof in his own Mind; because then it would follow, that for the six Years that he had been a Bishop, he had been incapable of administering the Sacraments; or of giving Absolution to those he had absolv'd. Thus the Salvation of the People depended on the Validity of a Bishop's Election; and the Validity of that Election depended on his Integrity. — A strange Principle, that render'd the Salvation of Christians so precarious and uncertain; and which annihilated and destroy'd the Effects of all the Virtue and Piety of the People; notwithstanding which they were to be damn'd, if the Bishop prov'd not to be a good Man; or to have been unduly elected.

LACTANTIUS maintains, that ^q a truly good Man can neither bear Arms; nor have any Dealings or Traffick in Foreign Countries. He also absolutely ^r condemns the putting out Money to Interest; and looks on it as a kind of Thievery. ^s He carries beyond all Bounds the Duty of Christian Patience. And establishes this Rule, that † one ought never to accuse any Person whatever, where the Crime is capital; insists too upon its being Homicide, and that without the Exception of so much as any one single Case.

"THERE are but few Principles" of Morality in the Works of St. Athanasius; and those you there meet with, (excepting what relates to the flying Persecution, and the Episcopal Dignity; and to the Defence of Orthodoxy) are never handled in their full Extent." This is the Opinion of a Catholick Writer; who also owns, that the Catechistical Discourses ^u of St. Cyril seem to be a Work compos'd in haste, and without much Preparation.

ST. BASIL, *surnam'd the Great, will have it, * That whoever gives another a mortal Wound, whether he did it as Aggressor, or in his own Defence; is guilty of Murder.* He declares, ^v that it is better to separate the Parties, who have committed Fornication, than to join them together in Matrimony; but however, if they will wed, he is not for hindring them; lest a greater Evil happen. "In that famous Letter to St. Gregory, where he establishes the Rules of a Monastick Life; there is * one for regulating the outward Appearance of the Monks, which seems directly contrary to that of Jesus Christ in the Gospel; Matt. vi, 16, 17. For this Father ordains, † that the Humility of the Anchorite be visible in every part of his external Appearance; That he have a sad and down-cast Look, his Head uncomb'd, and his Cloaths nasty and slovenly. —" In his little Tract, entitled, How to read with Edification the Greek Authors, I find two or three extravagant Maxims. He affirms, ^t that Christians are forbidden ever to have any Law-Suits. He seems ^a to take strictly in the literal Sense, those Proverbial Words of Jesus Christ; || Whosoever shall smite thee on thy Right Cheek, turn to him the other also: And it appears to him, that Socrates did something very like, what is there prescrib'd to us; when he quietly suffer'd himself to be soundly bang'd by an insolent Fellow, who was enrag'd at him. He believes ^b it in no case lawful to swear; and gives us thereupon the Example of a certain Pythagorean; who chose rather to pay Three hundred Talents, that is, about Four hundred and fifty Pounds; than to take an Oath, altho' he cou'd have done it with a safe Conscience.

Gregory Nazianzene ^z is no very methodical Writer. — His Style is excessively figurative, not very correct, and even sometimes hard and uncouth. — "He very much ^{aaa} exaggerates the Boldness of the Arians and Macedonians; who were then as numerous at least as the Orthodox, and did presume to assemble themselves together, and form Churches; outrageous Attempt! and that too, after the Determination of so well regulated a Council, ^{bbb} as had been held but just before!" Gregory too did not comprehend, how his Holiness and his Gravity (for this was the Style in which they accosted their Bishops, and he was then addressing himself to Nestorius) cou'd tolerate the ||| Apollinarian Meetings. — "He conceiv'd, for ||| Antient Hereticks, whose Head was Apollinarius of Laodicea. They pretended that Jesus Christ had not an humane Soul, but that the Word of God, or Logos, animated his Body. That the Flesh of Jesus Christ was not form'd out of the Holy Virgin, but that it came down from Heaven. They also reviv'd the Error of the Millenarians, to which the Simplicity of Papias, a Disciple of St. John the Evangelist, gave Birth. They were in the fourth Century.

“ what reason I know not; that to suffer those “ People to have their Assemblies, was to agree “ with them, that theirs was the true Doctrine; “ even truer than that of the Council; seeing that “ both of them could not be true: as if granting a “ Toleration to any one, was in fact an avowing “ that we believe his Opinion to be true! In short,
 “ he exhorts Nectarius to remonstrate to the Em-“ perour, that all he had done in favour of the “ Church, would signify just nothing; if the He-“ reticks were still allow’d the Liberty of assem“ bling. Thus the good St. Gregory, who was not “ in the least willing, while the Arians were the “ strongest, having the then Emperour on their “ side; that the Orthodox shou’d attempt to do, “ what they then censur’d in the Arians: was for “ exhorting his Successor to forget that good Les“ son. — And whereas † the Emperour Julian, “ adding Insult to Persecution; was us’d, when “ he stripp’d the Christians of their Goods, by way “ of raillery, to say; that what he did was in aid “ of the Gospel, which commanded ’em to de“ spite all those Things; so Gregory, being to an“ swer this, amongst other Things says, that Ju“ lian, acting in this manner, must needs have ima“ gin’d, that the Pagan Gods were well pleas’d to “ see innocent Men despoil’d of their Goods; and “ consequently that they approv’d of Injustice. This “ Answer might have suffic’d: but he adds, that as “ there are some things which Jesus Christ has strict“ ly enjoin’d; so there were others, which he barely “ proposeth to such as shall be inclin’d to do them; “ without obliging any Person whatever to an “ indispensable Performance. Such, according to “ Gregory, is the Commandment to abandon the “ Things of this Life:” Whereby ’tis plain, he “ supposes here a pretended Matter of Advice, to “ voluntarily renounce and abandon our Goods;
 “ and that without any other Motive, but our own “ Free-will and Pleasure: whereas it is a real obligato“ ry Command; but such as then, and then only takes “ place, when the retaining our Goods is incompati“ ble with our Duty; or becomes impracticable, with“ out the Violation of some Precept of the Gospel.

ST. AMBROSE^{ccc} does so run himself beyond all Bounds in his Encomiums on Virginity and Celebacy; that he seems to make it his Business to cry down Marriage: and represent it as a Thing scarce reputable. He says plainly enough, ^{ddd} That before the Law of Moses, and that of the Gospel, Adultery was not forbidden. And loose as he is upon this Article, he appears rigid enough on another; I mean, that of putting out Money to Interest: which he absolutely condemns, in all Cases whatever, * without Distinction. His Treatise of Offices, is a Book which he compos’d to teach Ecclesiasticks their respective Duties. ^{eee} And tho’ the Name of Ministers be omitted in the Roman, and following Editions; yet it is to be found in all the Manuscripts:

and ’tis plain by the Work itself, that St. Ambrose compos’d it for the Use of his Clergy. But tho’ he addresses himself particularly to them, yet he treats of the Duties of Christians in general; which he lays in a more particular manner upon the Clergy. It appears both by the Title, and by the Manner in which he treats his Subject, that his Design was to imitate the Offices of Cicero. But, after all that a certain || Lutheran Divine, who publish’d this Work in Wirtemburgh in 1698, with some Differtations of his own composing, has said; if the particular Principles of the Gospel be but excepted, which St. Ambrose has inserted in this Work of his;
 with the Examples and Passages of Holy Scripture, which he perpetually quotes, tho’ for the most part ill enough apply’d; I shall not flick to affirm, that the Copy comes infinitely short of the Original; both for Purity and Easiness of Style, the Oeconomy of the Whole, and the Disposition of Particulars: as well as for Solidity of Sense, and Justness of Reasoning. For instance, see here the Contents of his first Book. After some Prefatory Discourse upon the Question, when, and in what manner, it is proper either to speak, or be silent;
 he, at Chap. viii, enters upon his Subject-Matter with some Grammatical Remarks; which are not very^{fff} well grounded. In the Tenth Chapter he treats of Decency; the chief Duty whereof he makes to consist in The Art of Governing the Tongue.
 In the Eleventh Chapter he divides all Duties in general into two sorts: the Mean; and the Perfect.
 Amongst the latter, he ranks the Love of our Enemies; Prayers for those who calumniate, or in any other manner injure us; Works of Mercy and Compassion. The xiith, and following Chapters, on to the xviiith, run wholly upon the Subject of a Providence; which he endeavours to establish and defend in the best manner he can; both against the Murmurs of those, who are in this Life expos’d to great Afflictions; and against the Objections of Libertines and Atheists. In the xviiith, and following Chapters, he treats of the Duties of Youth. Having at the end of the xxivith Chapter, spoken occasionally of the four Cardinal Virtues, viz. Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance; he in the xxvith begins to treat of them;
 but in a manner superficial enough; where he himself taking notice of the want of Order in his Discourse, endeavours to excuse, or rather justify it in these Words: ||| Some will perhaps say, that, because from these four Virtues spring all the several sorts of Duties; we ought therefore to have begun with them first. But this wou’d have been conforming myself to the Rules of Art; according to which Duty ought to have been first defin’d; and afterwards divided into its several kinds: Now we purposely avoid subjecting ourselves to these Rules: It is enough for us to propose Examples drawn from the Conduct of our Ancestors, which are neither obscure or difficult to comprehend; and require not the Niceties of a methodical Writer. In the xxviiith Chapter, he without all reason attempts to shew, the Falsity of two of the Functions, which Cicero ascribes to Justice; nor is this the only Place, where he unjustly censures the Heathen Philosophers; by either mistaking their Meaning; or undertaking to confute Things most apparently true. About the end of the first Book, he returns to the Clergy; whose principal Virtues he there gives a Description of: and then concludes with a Discourse, of the inviolable Fidelity requir'd, in the case of Things deposited in trust. Nor does he come to treat of Happiness, till the beginning of the second Book. The same want of Order and Accuracy reigns throughout the whole Work. He there maintains, That^{xxx} a Christian ought not to engage or fight the Robber who attacks him; and lays it down for a General Rule: That it can never be lawful to preserve one's own Life at the Expence of another's. He lays down this General Maxim also; That we cannot lawfully do * a Thing, which we do not find in express Terms permitted and authoriz'd by Scripture: And upon this Principle he absolutely forbids the Clergy all sort of Rallery. It ought not to be wonder'd at, that he condemns (Book I, Chap. 50,) second Marriages: 'tis but what had been done by many before him, as we have already seen.

St. Chrysostome, with the rest of the Fathers, runs into Notions excessively rigid on the Subject of Usury. This same Doctor, speaking of the Expedient, that Abraham made use of, the † first^{hhh} time, for fear of being put to Death, in case he had been known to be Sarah's Husband; sticks not thus to address himself to his Audience: "Youⁱⁱⁱ know, you well know, that nothing is more insupportable to a Husband, than to see his Wife but suspected of having been in the Power of another Man; and^{kkk} yet this just and good Man, you see here, employs his utmost Efforts, that the very Act of Adultery may be consummated.—Thereupon, he bestows very great Encomiums on his Courage and Prudence.—Then he excuses him for having consented to the Adultery of his Wife, upon this Consideration; that Death, not being as yet de- vested of his Tyranny over Mankind, could not but be very formidable at that time.—After this Encomium on the Husband, he proceeds to the Commendation of the Wife; and says, that she very courageously accepted the Proposal; and that she did all that was requisite on her part, to make the Plot of theⁱⁱⁱ Play succeed. Whereupon, he exhorts all Wives to follow her Example; and then emphatically cries out: † Who is he that can forbear admiring this wonderful Readiness to obey? Who can ever sufficiently celebrate the Praises of Sarah, who after so much Continency, and at her Years, was willing to expose herself to^{mm} Adultery; and deliver up her Body to be enjoy'd by Barbarians, that she might save the Life of her Husband?—Nor is the Elogy, St. Ambrose bestows on theⁿⁿ Charity of Sarah on this Occasion, less remarkable. St. Austin too, reasoning upon another Instance of the same Nature,^{ooo} seems to have been under the like Illusion. Is it not a very strange Thing, that such bright Ornaments of the Church as these, with all their Virtue and Zeal, should be ignorant; That it is not lawful either to save one's own, or another's Life, by any any Action that is criminal?

St. Jerome^{ppp} every where inveighs against Matrimony in general, and more especially against second Marriages; and his Invectives are to bitter and violent, that notwithstanding all the Savings and Softnings he has thrown in, quite thro' his Epistle to Pammachius, wrote for that Purpose; one cannot but discover, in every Thing he says^{qqq} on that Subject, an entire Conformity with the Opinion of Tertullian: which has been condemn'd by the Church, as injurious to the Honour of Marriage; and contrary to Holy Writ. ^{rrr} He condemns all Oaths^{sss} without Distinction. He forbids^{ttt} Christians to pay Tribute to Infidel Princes. He advises^{uuu} and approves of the Action of those, who murder themselves, for fear of having their Chastity violated. He often talks of Virginitie, and the monastick State, in such a manner, as to make one almost believe it absolutely necessary to Salvation. Labours, Fastings, Austerities, and other Mortifications, with Solitude, and Pilgrimages, are the Subject-Matter of almost all his Counsels, and Exhortations." He^{xxx} plainly enough gives us to understand, that^{yyy} Jesus Christ has abolish'd the Permission of eating the Flesh of Animals; in the same manner as he abolish'd Divorce and Circumcision. Every body knows, with how much Fury, and with how little Honesty he inveigh'd against Vigilantius; who had wrote against the Worship, which at that time began to be paid to the Reliques of Saints and Martyrs; as also against divers other Practices, the dangerous Consequences whereof, process of Time has since but too plainly shewn us. The little Tract of St. Jerome's against this Presbyter is stuff'd quite full of gross Abuses, and false Reasonings²²²; contriv'd to raise popular Odium against his Adversary, whom he wanted good Arguments to confute.

St. Austin, endeavouring to make an ' Apology for the Complaisance, which Abraham shew'd his Wife, on account of Hagar; pretends, that the Wife can convey to another Woman, the Property which she has in the Body of her Husband; and that the Husband also can transfer to another Man, the Power which he has over the Body of his Wife: and, what is still more surprising, he finds this Paradox on a Passage of St. Paul,² the Meaning of which he for that purpose most wretchedly mistakes. This Father is so bold as to maintain, that every Thing by Divine Right belongs to the Just, or Faithful³; and that Unbelievers have no right to possess any thing: abominable Principle, that entirely destroys at once all humane Society! but behold another of 'em, every whit as detestable; and which alone⁴ is enough to cast an eternal Blemish on the Memory of the Bishop of Hippo: 'tis this, that, after having declar'd it as his Opinion, that Lenity and Charity ought to be the Measure of our Conduct towards Hereticks; he became so beaten with the Contests he had with the Donatists, as to change at once from white to black; and openly maintain, that Hereticks ought to be persecuted, and by Force compell'd to embrace the Orthodox Faith; or else to be utterly destroy'd and extirpated: which certainly is, as a famous Minister amongst the Reform'd observes, a most terrible and inhumane Opinion. There are two of this ' Father's Epistles, that any one may read in French; which were made use of to justify the last Persecution in France: so that St. Austin may justly be said to be, in a manner, the Grand Patriarch of Christian Persecutors. This Instance of Persecution ought to be well taken Notice of; for it will be found not to confine itself to the Bishop of Hippo: and it does alone afford us a most manifest Proof of the gross manner, in which the Christian Doctors have neglected, or rather disfigur'd and corrupted Morality. If ever there was a Position contrary to all the Dictates of right Reason, and natural Equity; to Charity, good Policy, and the Spirit of the Gospel; 'tis, without doubt, this detestable Doctrine of Compulsion, and Persecution for the sake of Religion. And yet, ever since the Church began to enjoy any Quiet or Repose, this has been the common Opinion; which accordingly has been, for the most part, all along actually put in Practice, ⁶ by the stronger Party against the weaker. The Codes are full of Penal Laws against all Sects, but the Predominant; ⁷ and they are the Councils, Bishops, and most eminent Doctors, who have ever been the Solicitors of these Laws; and have honour'd with large Encomiums, Acclamations, Benedictions, and with the most humble Thanks and Acknowledgments; those Sovereigns, who have either made such Laws; or vigorously put them in execution.

St. Leo, in the Opinion of Mr. Du Pin,⁸ is not very fertile in Points of Morality: handles 'em but drily; and in a manner which diverts, rather than affects or moves his Readers.

In the Time of Theodosius the Younger, the Bishop of Susa, the Royal City of Persia, whose Name was Abdas, (or rather Abdaa);⁹ took the Liberty to burn one of the Temples where they worship'd Fire¹⁰. The King, ('twas Isdegerde) inform'd thereof by the Magi, sent for Abdaa; and after a very gentle Reprimand, order'd him to get the Temple, he had destroy'd, rebuilt. But the Bishop could not be brought to do any thing in the Matter; tho' the King threaten'd, by way of Reprisals, to use the Churches of the Christians in the same manner; which he accordingly executed afterwards, on the obstinate Refusal of Abdaa: who chose rather to lose his Life, and expose the Christians to a furious Persecution, than to obey an Order every way just and reasonable. Theodoret, who reports this Story, does * not deny, but that the Zeal, which transported Abdaa to burn the Temple of the Persians, was unseasonable and ill tim'd; but he maintains, that his refusal to rebuild such another Temple, shew'd a Constancy worthy of all Admiration; and of the Reward of the Persian Empire: for, adds he, it is as great an Impiety to build a Temple to Fire, as to adore it. But "there is no one Person whatever, whether Metropolitan, or Patriarch, who can dispense with "this Law of natural Religion; That every one is "bound to make amends by Restitution, or other ways, "for the Damage he has done to his Neighbour. Now "Abdas here, a private Man, and Subject of the "King of Persia, had destroy'd what was the Goods "and Property of another; and in a Case, where "the Thing destroy'd had the extraordinary Privilege of belonging to the Establish'd or Predominant Religion. — And to say, that the Temple which he should have rebuilt, wou'd have "been apply'd to the Service of Idolatry, was but "a lame Excuse; for he himself wou'd not have "employ'd it to that Purpose: neither was he to "have been answerable for the ill Use, which they, "to whom it belong'd, should have made of it. "Is it a valid Reason, for the not returning a Purse "one has stolen, to say, that the Person, from whom "he took it, is a Man that employs his Money in "Debauchery? But besides all this, what Proportion was there betwixt the rebuilding one Temple, without which the Persians wou'd have remain'd as great Idolators as before; and the Destruction of a great many Christian Churches? " — In short, was there any thing more capable "of rendring the Christian Religion odious to all

S E C T. X.

WHAT has been said, is, I think, more than enough to demonstrate clearly; that the most celebrated Doctors of the Church, for the six first Centuries, were but bad Masters, and very poor Guides in Matters of Morality. As I saw reason for this Assertion six Years ago, when this Prefatory Discourse came first abroad;
 so now, in this new Edition, after a second Review,
 I find no Cause to alter my Opinion. Concern for Truth; which must needs over-rule every other Consideration, but that of raising Obstacles to its Establishment; the Readiness that most People shew to be misled by great Names, and Prejudice in favour of Antiquity, more especially Ecclesiastical Antiquity; the inexpressible Injury, that such a blind Respect does to the Knowledge of true Religion, and sound Morality; the Honour, due to the Age we live in, which has, above all others, shaken off the Yoke of ill grounded Authority;
 the Candor and Sincerity we profess: do all require, and oblige us frankly to speak of Things, as they really are; and to judge of these Doctors, who have been dead so many Ages, with the same Disinterestedness and Freedom, as we wou'd of an Author of the last Age; whose Reputation we are under no concern about. As good Protestants, we may and ought boldly thus to act; without disquieting ourselves with what those Men may say or think, who shall esteem it their Concern, to declare themselves jealous of the Honour of the Fathers; and such profound Admirers of all their Productions, as to sacrifice to 'em even the most common Rules of Reason and good Sense: which they themselves wou'd be very loth to have dis-pens'd with on other Occasions. So unhappy are they as to be reduc'd to this wretched Necessity, of judging differently of the same Things, according as they happen to proceed either from the Pen of a Profane, or an Ecclesiastical; of an Antient, or a Modern Author. Nay, we doubt not, but there are many among 'em, who do themselves some Violence on this Account; and tho' they talk like others, yet do not, from the bottom of their Hearts, think so advantageously, as one would be apt to imagine, of the Personal Qualities and Writings, of even the most renown'd of the antient Doctors of the Church. As it would be inhumane to insult Men, who live thus under perpetual Constraint; so we pity them with all our Heart: provided they do not voluntarily seek after, and wan-only embrace all Opportunities, of thus betraying their own Consciences. But, it is very hard to keep one's Temper, when one sees Men, who have here full Liberty to think and speak as they please; and whose Grand Principle is, or ought to be, that the Holy Scripture is the only Rule of our Faith and Manners: when one sees such Men, I say, zealously espousing the Cause of the Fathers; and, not content with being themselves furiously en-gag'd in Maintenance of this visible Relique of Popery; endeavouring also, at any rate, to impose the same Servitude on others; not being able to bear, that any one shou'd declare his Opinion of the Fathers, to be any thing short of theirs; and bitterly inveighing against the living, in order to vindicate the Dead; to whose Memory no other Injury is offer'd, but the not paying a blind Veneration to their mistaken Notions; and wrong Conduct.

Certainly Protestants, whether such by Education or Conversion; who venture to declare themselves such mighty Zealots, and idolizing Partizans for Ecclesiastical Antiquity; were far from considering well of the Matter, when they engag'd in the Maintenance of so bad a Cause: wou'd they but reflect a little, they must soon see, that 'tis what they can never acquit themselves of with Honour. This is evident enough by the Strights which they chuse to be reduced to, rather than quit their Hold; being forc'd perpetually to change the State of the Question; and contradict themselves every Moment: They dare not in so many Words say, that the Fathers were infallible, or that they have not some time fallen into great Errors; but yet still arguing as if they both believ'd it themselves, and expected that others shou'd do so too, they almost perpetually build upon that tacit Supposition; so what they deny in one place, they grant in another; and even sometimes more than is requir'd. In a word, they manage so as to make one believe; that they had, by continually reading, and admiring the Fathers, contracted the same Turn of Thought with them, and entirely form'd themselves upon their Model. By which they themselves furnish us with a new Argument, a viva voce Evidence, for the Judgment I have given of these antient Authors; the Reading whereof does still continue to produce such visibly ill Effects; so that by endeavouring to reinstate them in that too high Esteem, in which Ignorance and Superstition

Superstition had plac'd them; they in the main discredit 'em more, than those, who think they may be justly censur'd on many Accounts; cou'd or wou'd do.

But this is not all; they imitate those Passions also; which are but too plainly visible, both in the Writings and Lives of the Fathers; as far as they are transmitted to us. To come short of their Masters in nothing; they do to Declamation, false Reasoning, apparent Ignorance in Criticism and Morality, and Contempt of Order and Method; add angry Transport, and Invective. They copy after their Originals so well, that they are themselves become great Models: Ill Language is so fluent and natural, that we must do 'em the Justice to own, that in this Particular they perform like Men of great Genius and Ability. Mortify'd at the Sight of a considerable Number of Instances of false Reasonings, and gross Errors in the Writings of the Fathers, collected by several Authors, and that too without much Search or Pains; they, instead of applying themselves, calmly, and by solid Reasons to make it appear, that the Passages cited contain nothing but what is agreeable to Truth and good Sense; which wou'd be a solid fair way of defending these antient Doctors, they so much espouse: instead of this, I say, they think it enough to cry out with disdain; That it is now-a-days the Fashion to attack the Fathers; that Ignorance thinks to make itself considerable this way; That those mighty Antagonists of the Fathers, by their Performances, shew themselves to be Men of but little Judgment and Knowledge. By which They indeed discover themselves to have but a very small Portion of the former; because in this Case, there is no manner of Occasion for that vast Erudition, which they so much pretend to. There is no Necessity of knowing all the Languages both antient and modern; or having read all the Fathers quite through: There is scarce any thing more requir'd, to judge of their Merit, than to dip into the Fathers you have a mind to examine; whether it be the Originals, or any of the vast Number of Translations, which have been publish'd. There are even entire Works, which are nothing but a perpetual Contexture of Impertinencies heap'd upon one another; such, for instance, is the Commentary of St. *Austin on the Psalms. Besides, there is in Collections of Sermons, in Books of Devotion, in Commentaries on the Scripture publish'd in the Vulgar Tongues; an infinite Number of large Fragments and Passages out of the Fathers; which their most zealous Admirers display and set forth, as the very Flower and Choice of those fine and judicious Thoughts, they have remark'd in the reading of their Works. So that any one now may be sufficiently qualify'd to judge, whether the Fathers do justly merit all that Encomium and Zeal, with which they have been extoll'd and defended: a reasonable Share of common Reason and good Sense is here sufficient; and perhaps the Charge of Ignorance was never more impertinent, or worse apply'd than in the present Case; to be sure Men, who bring so loose and rude an Accusation as this; must needs think themselves the sole Proprietors of all the good Sense, as well as Learning in the World: It should seem they are not willing to allow the least Spark of either to any, who do not run into all their Notions, or rather Prejudices, Passions, and Cabals. And what may very well lead one to imagine so, is, to see some of 'em so extremely civil and modest, as to publicly brand with the Name of downright Impudence, the Liberty we take of thinking and speaking otherwise, than they and the Fathers do; on Matters too, where we do no more than follow the common Opinions of Protestants; as upon the Lawfulness of putting out Money to Interest: to see 'em, I say, look down from the Heights of their Self-Sufficiency, with an Air of Pity, on all such, as shall presume to declare, tho' in never so modest Terms; that they have not so high an Opinion of St. Austin, and St. Jerome, as themselves have; as People who, without the least Tincture of Learning, set up for a Character, by running down almost all the celebrated Authors of Antiquity: and then to see 'em, at the same time, tacitly and at the rebound take to themselves the Character of great Authors; which the confus'd hasty reading of a great Number of Books, some good, some bad, must needs have justly entitl'd 'em to; and which we shall never be inclin'd to envy 'em.

But, what is the very Height of Blindness and Passion; our zealous Defenders of the Fathers, not content with the Charge of Ignorance, proceed to call in question, either directly or indirectly, the Probity and Religion of those; who freely set forth both the Good and the Bad in the Lives and Writings of the Ecclesiasticks and Divines of the first Ages: and who believe that they were no more infallible, either in their Morals or their Doctrines, than the Ecclesiasticks and Divines of the present Age. One of 'em scruples not roundly to affirm; That a Man could not fail of having a Veneration for the Fathers, if he had any true Zeal for Christianity: Another of 'em, the very Echo of the former, says; That Contempt of the Fathers, if carry'd to excess, (thus they term the Liberty of speaking one's Sentiments of the Fathers without concern for their Reputation, other than what Truth and Equity permit) that this Contempt, I say, redounds upon the Christian Religion. If the Christian Religion, adds he, has not had for its Propagators, Men of true Piety and Knowledge; what Opinion must Mankind have of it? I confess, were Reasons, which have no other Tendency, but to render the Opinion and Person of an Adversary odious, good Arguments; that this wou'd be one of the best that ever was invented. All that cou'd be said, is, that it might easily be retorted: The Fathers, say you, whom you regard as Propagators of the Christian Religion, must necessarily have been Men of true Piety and Knowledge. But it has been maintain'd and prov'd to you, by a great Number of Instances, that the Fathers have not only fallen into very gross Errors, and been most profoundly ignorant of many Things, which they ought to have known; but further, that most of 'em have, more or less, suffer'd themselves to be led by Passion; so that their Conduct has been found frequently to be such, as is neither regular or justifiable. You make no answer to all this, you do not attempt to refute the Examples and Facts which are produc'd to you, you fairly own the Charge: You do therefore by Implication confels, that the Christian Religion is of no value: You are at bottom some disguis'd Atheist or Deist, who, under the false Appearance of maintaining the Interest of Christianity, by vindicating the Honour of those, whom you regard as the Propagators thereof; are endeavouring secretly to undermine and destroy Religion itself. In vain do you play the Zealot for Orthodoxy, or the Opinions in fashion; which you defend by nothing but odious Parallels, and malign Reflections. In vain do you search into the hidden Secrets of Providence, employ all your Dexterity and Parts in the Explication of 'em; and flatter yourself to have found out new Solutions, which clear those great Difficulties, which have at all times been objected, on account of the Origin of Evil: All this will never hinder one, if he be allow'd to reason in the manner you do against those, whose esteem of the Fathers comes not up to your Liking; from inferring from this same Reasoning of yours, some ill Design on your Part, against that very Religion, you pretend to engage in this Dispute. Heic aliquis latet Error: Equo ne Credite Teucris. I leave it to the Judicious and Disinterested to judge, whether the Consequence is not at least as well drawn on the one side, as on the other. Tho' at the same time we are far from intending to make use of any such Weapons: We freely leave 'em to such, as have no better to make use of; having Charity enough to believe, that this Proceeding of theirs is meer want of Prudence: whilst blinded with Prejudice and Passion, they perceive not the Advantage they give both against themselves, and against the Christian Religion, by what appear'd to them a thundering decisive Argument; proper both to save themselves the Trouble of examining into the bottom of Things; and to throw Dust in the Eyes of the People. But to undeceive 'em, if possible; at least to prevent the Honest and Well-meaning, or such as will not take the Pains to inform themselves, how to distinguish between good and bad Reasonings; from being impos'd upon by this; let us stop a Moment or two, to make its Weakness more fully appear.

First then I observe, that the Apostles alone can properly be call'd The Propagators of the Christian Religion; whom the Holy Spirit did invest with the Gift of working Miracles; ^a and guide into all Truth, concerning Jesus Christ and his Doctrine. Those holy Men did ^b make Disciples among all Nations, according to the Order they had receiv'd from their Master. St. Paul, who strove ^c not to preach the Gospel but in those Places, where Jesus Christ had never been nam'd, lest he should build on another Man's Foundation; declares expressly, That ^d he had fully preach'd the Gospel of Christ, from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum; ^e that is to say, throughout a great Part of the Roman Empire. Tradition has preserv'd ^f in India, and among other barbarous Nations, the Remembrance of the Travels and Miracles of St. Thomas, St. Andrew, and other Apostles. Thus did the immediate Disciples of our Saviour, fill'd with his Spirit and arm'd with his Power, plant almost thro' the whole World the Christian Faith; it was they who laid the unshaken Foundations of that great Work, either by themselves in Person; or thro' the Means of some Apostolical Men, to whom they had communicated the Gift of working Miracles: And the ordinary Ministers of the Gospel, who succeeded them, but without any extraordinary Power, and with Authority infinitely less than theirs; have had nothing else to do, but to cultivate those deep-rooted Seeds, which the Apostles had spread abroad in all Parts, for the Propagation of Christianity; and which, by their own proper Virtue, assisted with the Care of Providence, will always bring forth Fruit even to the end of the World; notwithstanding all, that the Negligence or Malice of Men may, or can do to the contrary.

From whence it already appears, that the Argument we are now handling, even supposing it had any Force in it; will prove nothing in favour of the Fathers: for it is plain, that they were not, properly speaking, the Propagators of the Christian Religion. But let us grant the Fathers, seeing some will have it so, this glorious Title; as what might possibly in some Sense, and in some Measure belong to them: it will yet be the easiest Thing in the World, to ruin at once the Consequence they wou'd draw from thence, in order to shew what they then ought to have been, without ever examining what they really were. We need but only consider this one incontestable Fact; that even the Apostles themselves were for a considerable Time full of carnal Prejudices; and had their Failings too: nor did they at all dissemble or conceal 'em; the ingenuous Acknowledgment whereof serves very much to confirm the Truth of their Testimony, and the Sincerity of their Intentions. Shall we then think it Matter of Astonishment, that the ordinary Ministers who succeeded 'em, and who were not favour'd with any extraordinary Assistance from Heaven; had not all that Exactness of Judgment, and all that Knowledge; had not all that Uprightness, and all that Purity of Heart, which we cou'd wish to have found in them?

These Propagators of the Christian Religion must needs, say they, have been Men of true Piety and Knowledge. But must all, who have, after the Apostles, contributed any thing to the Propagation of Christianity, have been such; or only some of 'em? The first is what they will not venture to say: and if they betake themselves to the latter; I ask, by what shall we be able to know, that this Privilege was reserv'd to such or such, for instance; rather than to others? Shall it be by the Age in which they liv'd? But why must the Fathers of the three or six first Centuries have been Men of true Piety and Knowledge; rather than those of the tenth or eleventh? On the contrary, to argue on the Principle here laid down, it shou'd seem, that, in proportion, as we become more remote from the first Establishment of Christianity; so its Propagators ought to be Men of greater Eminence for Piety and Knowledge; that they may be able still to augment more and more the Progress of this Holy Religion; and supply, what the Proofs of Matter of Fact, which are the very

Basis of its Truth; lose of their Force, thro' Distance of Time, in the Judgment of a vast Number of Persons, who are not capable of examining them, as they ought. Will they say that these Propagators of the Christian Religion, who must have been Men of true Piety and Knowledge, are those very Doctors, whose Writings have been transmitted to us? But why these, rather than an infinite Number of others; who have either wrote nothing; or whose Writings have not come to our Hands? Besides, what do they mean here by Men of true Piety and Knowledge? Will they say, that all the Propagators of the Christian Religion, since the Apostles, must necessarily have had as great a Measure of Piety and Knowledge, in Matters of Religion and Morality, as cou'd at all possibly be? What? must the Fathers have been liable to no Failings, no Passions, no Errours, no Ignorance at all? Was it necessary that GOD should miraculously interpose, to hinder them from being Men as well as others; and subject to the Imperfections of the Age; as well as to the Temptations incident to the Circumstances they liv'd in? If we have not so exalted an Opinion of them, as their extravagant Admirers have; do we pretend to say, that they were all a pack of profligate Wretches; or that there were not some among them, who were, in some measure, Men of Piety and Knowledge? If we maintain, that they were not Men of the most accurate Judgments; that they often made use of bad Arguments; that they were but little vers'd in the true Method of expounding the Holy Scriptures, and explaining the Principles of Morality, which they contain: Do we therefore deny that they retain'd the Fundamentals of Religion, and Morality? If we say, that thro' an Effect of humane Frailty, they have given way, some more, some less, to Passions, and Actions, contrary to the Rules of the Gospel; Do we therefore take upon us to penetrate either into their Hearts; or into the Counsels of GOD? Do we deny, that many of them might, notwithstanding all this, have been truly pious and good Men; that the Divine Mercy might have regarded their good Intentions; and the Sincerity of a general Repentance? Certainly, we leave it to God to judge of that, which we neither can or ought to decide: We reserve to ourselves only the Right of charitable Judgments; to which we shall always rather incline, than to rash Condemnations. But we are not for all that oblig'd to call evil, good: and shall always take the liberty of blaming what is blame-worthy; without paying respect to the Fault, out of favour to the Person: and as we praise and heartily recommend to the Imitation of every body, the good Actions, and Virtues which appear in the Lives of the Fathers of the Church; so we shall never go about to dissemble their ill Actions and Vices; which we cannot but see, when we examine them without Prejudice or Prepossession.

But to come to the very bottom of the Argument in hand; besides, what I have already intimated, and shall hereafter declare, that the Fathers were neither the only, nor the principal Propagators of the Christian Religion, after the Apostles; this Argument contains at most but a Reason of Congruity. Now Reasons of Congruity, which are generally very inconsiderable, and never amount to more than a slight Probability; are altogether ridiculous in a Matter of the Nature with this we are now upon. Have the Fathers argu'd well or ill? Have they fall'n into gross Errours? Have they run into vicious Actions, and Passions? Have they handled Morality with Accuracy, and in its just Extent? These are Matters of Fact, and there is nothing more to be done, but to see whether they are true or not. We have at hand the Tracts and Writings of the Fathers; the History of their Lives: let us read, examine, and then judge. The Question to be discuss'd, is not, in what manner we conceive the Thing shou'd have been; but in what manner it actually has been. For, if the Facts be true, instead of concluding, as they would have us, that the Fathers must, for the Good of the Christian Religion, have been such, as they have represented 'em to us; I shall from thence infer, on the contrary, that there was no Necessity at all for it. To argue otherwise, is to imitate those of the Romish Communion; who, to prove that Transubstantiation is not a new Tenent, unknown to the first Ages; tell us gravely, that this Doctrine could not possibly have been ever introduc'd into the Church at all, had it not been receiv'd from the Beginning. If, with a profound Study of all the Subtilties of the Mathematicks, and the Affectation of being able to talk on all sorts of Subjects, they form no better Judgments of Things; I fear they will give us but a very mean Opinion of Algebra, and that vast * Encyclopedia, which they pretend to value themselves so much upon. Is it not true, for example, that, as early, as the second Century, Victor,² Bishop of Rome, caus'd many Broils, to support his Opinion on this important Question; On what day the Passover ought to be celebrated? And that he excommunicated all the Churches of Asia, because they celebrated that Festival on the fourteenth Day of the Month of March; and not on the Sunday following, as he would have had it? The unshaken Fidelity, with which he adher'd to the Christian Religion; for which he suffer'd, even Martyrdom; had not made him incapable of being transported with Passion about meer Trifles; and of sinning against that Spirit of Peace and Charity, which the Gospel so earnestly recommends. So that St. Irenæus thought fit to write to him about it; and sharply censure his Proceedings. Have you a mind for another Example of a Father of the Church, a Martyr too? Read then the scandalous Contest, which happen'd in the third Century, between St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, and Stephen, Bishop of Rome. The first had got it determin'd in a Council, that all who had been baptiz'd by Hereticks, ought to be re-baptiz'd.³ " Stephen, on the contrary, perhaps incens'd that they had “ come to a Decision therein, without first consulting him; was of a quite different Opinion. He wrote a Letter to St. Cyprian, which is since lost; wherein he rejected and condemn'd the Decisions of the Council of Carthage; communicated all those who had assisted at it; and declar'd, that all, who came over to the Church, ought to be receiv'd without being re-baptiz'd, from what Heresy soever they came: This gave Birth to a sad and grievous Schism between the Churches of Africa, and that of Rome. At that time Pompey, Bishop of Sabrata, a City of Africa, desir'd the Bishop of Carthage to let him know, what was the Opinion of Stephen; whereupon St. Cyprian sent him Stephen's Letter together with his own Refutation; wherein he no more observes the Rules of Patience, which he had laid down in a Book, wherein he treats of that Virtue, than Stephen; who, for his part, had violated them in a most unworthy manner. By which one may see, that the Praises which our Martyr gives to Christians on that Account, in the || beginning of the same Book; where he says, that they never at all extol their own Virtues, at the same time that he is extolling 'em to the Skies; were Praises, which rather inform us what those Men, to whom they are given, ought to have been; than what they really were. He accuses Stephen of having wrote in a haughty disdainful manner; and of many other Things, which were nothing to the Purpose; that he had contradicted himself; and talk'd like an ignorant Fellow, without Parts or Learning. — That he took the Part of Hereticks against the Church, and betray'd it. All this too, with more than ordinary Heat and Passion. And thus in truth does he demean himself in all his Controversies; where he talks of nothing but Discipline and Episcopal Authority, without much shew of Gentleness and Moderation; nor was it indeed the Custom in those days, to manage their Disputes with Temper and Calmness; any more than it is now.”

In the beginning of the fourth Century, ⁱ “ Eleven or twelve Bishops assembl'd together at Cirra, in 305; where they reproach'd one another with enormous Crimes. The greatest Part of them had deliver'd up their Bibles to the Pagans, to avoid Persecution; which a great Number of the honest Lay-Christians had born with Constancy. Others of them had, with their own Hands, thrown them into the Fire. One Purpurinus of Limate, was accus'd, for having murder'd the two Children of his Sister; who, instead of clearing himself of the Charge, sturdily answer'd: For my part, I have kill'd, and I do kill those who are against me. Trouble me no more about the Matter: You know that I value no Man. ^k As soon as ever there were Christian Emperours, worldly Pleasures began to introduce themselves a-pace into the Church; and there was in a little time nothing to be seen, among the Clergy, but Enmities and Divisions. And because the Bishops were become rich and in great Esteem, they † stuck at nothing to compass Bishopricks; which when they had obtain'd, they assum'd to themselves a Tyrannical Authority. These Disorders daily increas'd, till they came to that Height, they have been since seen to rise too; as the Learned Irish Archbishop Usher, shews in the Book, I have quoted in the Margin; by a great Number of Passages out of Authors of Note, who have left us most lively Descriptions of the horrible Corruption of the respective Ages they liv'd in. I have already ^l quoted Gregory Nazianzeme on this Head. Let us join to him Sulpicius Severus, who liv'd in the same Century. He in the first Book of his History, ^m speaking of the Morals of the Clergy of his Time; and having first ⁿ observ'd, that the Tribe of Levi had no share in the Division of the Land of Canaan, as the other Tribes had; that they might be more at liberty to devote themselves to the Service of God: says, That he was not willing silently to pass by that Example; but chose purposely to mention it, as a fit Lesson for the Clergy: For it seems to me, adds he, *that they have not only quite forgot that * Precept, but that they never had any Knowledge at all of it; so great is now-a-days their Thirst after Riches; a Disease which has invaded their Minds, and infected their Spirits, like a common Pestilence! They gape after Possessions; They beautify and adorn their Country-Seats, improve their Lands, and ‡ sit brooding over their Gold: They buy, they sell, and in all things seek after Gain. If there are any among them, who seem to have better Things in view; who are not possess'd of Estates, or engag'd in Traffick; Yet they do that, which is much more shameful and scandalous: They expect Presents without doing any thing for 'em; and dishonour themselves by taking recompences; their Holiness being as it were expos'd to sale.* Towards the ||| End of the second Book of his Sacred History, you may also see the impartial manner, in which Sulpicius Severus relates the Persecution, ^o which was carry'd on against the Priscillianists; where he sharply reprimands the Pride and Cruelty of some Jerusalem, who favour'd the Opinions of the Catechist of Alexandria, had drawn upon himself the Indignation of St. Jerom; he then fell a railing most unmercifully against Origen; whom he had formerly cry'd up to the very Skies; and set himself * violently to persecute the Origenists. Ruffinus, who had been St. Jerom's great Friend, having declar'd himself for Origen; and having alledg'd for his Defence, the Praises which St. Jerom had given him; what does our humble and pacifick Priest do, but immediately write a Book, full of the bitterest Gall and Passion against Ruffinus. The same Spirit reigns in his other Works, where he had to do with People he did not affect. St. Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, was, in the ||| Opinion of Mr. the Abbot Du Pin, “ a Man ambitious and violent; who, “ seeking nothing but to augment his own Au“ thority, no sooner saw himself rais'd to the “ Episcopal Seat, but he expell'd the Novatians, “ by his own Authority; and plunder'd their “ Bishop of all the Goods he was possess'd of.

 “ He attack'd the Jews in their Synagogues, “ at the Head of his People; took away their “ Synagogues from 'em, drove them out of A“ lexandria; and gave their Goods for plunder
 “ to the Christians; grounding himself, no doubt, “ upon that pious and holy Maxim of the Bi“ shop of Hippo; that every Thing belongs to “ the Faithful, and that the Wicked can have “ no just Title to possess any thing. Another “ time St. Cyril fell out with Orestes, Gover-“ nour of Alexandria, on whose Authority he “ was perpetually encroaching: five † hundred “ Monks, in support of their Bishop, one day “ surrounded the Governour, wounded him by “ a Blow with a Stone, and had kill'd him, if “ the Guards and People had not put a Stop “ to their Fury. This cost one of the Monks,

“ who was taken, and put to the Rack, his “ Life; but St. Cyril trait canoniz'd him. A “ famous Heathen Philosophers, call'd Hypa“ tia, was the Victim, which the Partizans of “ the Bishop, immolated to the Manes of their “ Martyr. She was cruelly tore to pieces, be“ cause she was said to have irritated the Go“ vernour against the Prelate.” Wou'd you know what were the Clergy of the fifth, and following Centuries? An Author, who cannot be suspected of designing any Ill to the Fathers, † will inform us. “ The Sects, says he, “ (meaning those of the Nestorians and Euty-“ chians) which sprung up, partly thro' the La“ ziness and Superstition; and partly thro' the “ particular Grudges, Envy, and Malignity of “ the Clergy; gave the finishing Stroke to the “ Spirit of Persecution on account of Religion.
 “ 'Tis † true, this same Spirit of Persecution had “ already appear'd in the World; but had not “ as yet exercis'd its Tyranny, with all those “ Circumstances of Cruelty, with which it has “ been attended since that unhappy Century;
 “ when Divisions arose about Opinions, in which “ there may have been something of reality;
 “ but what however might have easily been a“ greed and settl'd, had but the Spirit of Chri“ stianity presid'd in Ecclesiastical Assemblies. Af“ ter that time nothing was to be seen in the “ East, but Proscriptions, Massacres, Fury, and “ Rage. See what a Bishop of the fifth Cen“ tury, who was persecuted for Nestorianism, “ says thereupon: I pass by † in silence, says he,
 “ the Chains, the Dungeons, the Confiscations, the “ Notes of Infamy, those lamentable Massacres, the “ Heinousness of which is such, that even they who “ have had the Misfortune to be Eye-Witnesses “ thereof, do with pain believe 'em to be true: All “ these Tragedies too are acted by Bishops.— “ Amongst whom down-right Impudence passes for “ Courage; they call their Cruelty Zeal, and “ their Knavery is honour'd with the Name “ of Wisdom. But it still went on increa“ sing, and grew still worse and worse. The “ Emperour Justinian wou'd not be thought “ to have less Zeal, than the Prelates of the “ fifth and sixth Centuries: He thought it no “ Murther, says Procopius, “ to condemn to Death,
 “ such as made Profession of a Religion different “ from his own. All the World saw the dread“ ful Cruelties that were committed in these un“ happy Centuries. They maintain'd Sieges in-
 “ in their Monasteries; they battled it in their “ Councils; They enter'd the Churches Sword

“such as no body understood; not even those who defended them with the greatest Zeal and Obstinacy.” These are the great Lights of the Church; these are the Holy Fathers, which we must take for Men of true Piety, and Knowledge.

But however, what we are principally concern'd about, is the Soundness of their Judgments, the Solidity of their Thoughts, and the Extensiveness of their Knowledge: Give me leave then to make a Parody; and apply to the Fathers some Verses of a Modern * Satyrist, whom France has not long since lost.

*Qu'on vante en eux l'honneur, la foi, la probité, Qu'on prise leur Candeur & leur sincérité;
Qu'ils aient eu quelque fois une humeur débonnaire,
On le veut, j'y souscris, & suis prêt de me taire:
Mais que comme un modèle on vante leurs Ecrits,
Qu'on les fasse passer pour de fort bons Esprits, Comme aux Rois des Auteurs, qu'on leur donne l'Empire,
Ma bile alors s'échauffe, & je brûle d'écrire, &c.*

Which may be English'd thus.

Extol them, if you please, for Probity,
For Honour, Candor, Faith, Sincerity;
Let 'em good-natur'd too sometimes appear,
'Tis granted all, and I am silent here:
But that their Works, and they shou'd make pretence,
To be the very Models of good Sense,
That they of Writers shou'd as Sovereigns reign,
My Choler rises, and I can't contain,
But must let loose my Rage in the Satyrick Strain.

The Examples, which I have already produc'd, of the gross Errors, and wrong Notions of the Fathers; what I have said of Books, where may be found an infinite Number of mean trifling Thoughts, quoted with great Applause, by the over-sfond Admirers of those antient Doctors of the Church; the great Number of Passages of the same kind, which y divers Authors have occasionally remark'd and criticiz'd: All this might very well serve to excuse me the Trouble of producing any more at present. I shall nevertheless here give the Reader a small Sample, by which he may be able readily to judge of the Turn of Spirit, and manner of thinking, which, in those Times, grew most prevalent.

Justin Martyr, in the fifth † Chapter of his first Apology, says, ^z that bad Demons did formerly appear, that they committed Adultery with Women, and corrupted Boys, &c. And all this founded solely upon the sixth Chapter of Genesis, Ver. 4. misunderstood. The most antient Fathers, have also one after another, given out this Opinion, for certain Truth; as a Learned Editor ^{aa} of this Father has observ'd. Justin ^{bb} finds the Sign of the Cross in Sail-Yards, Masts of Ships, Ploughs, Mattocks, &c.

St. Irenæus, in the Judgment of Photius, has ^{cc} corrupted, by foreign and weak Arguments, the Simplicity, and exact Verity of the Doctrines of the Church. “Can any thing, ^{dd} for example, be more insipid, than the Reasons, he makes use of to prove that there are four Gospels, viz. because there are four principal Regions of the World, East, West, North, and South; or because the Edifice of the Church is founded on the Gospel, and there must be four Columns to support an Edifice? Theophylact does not succeed much better, when he says, that it must be so, because the Gospel teaches us the four Cardinal Virtues; or because these Gospels contain Doctrines, Precepts, Promises, and Threats. And don't the five Books of Moses contain the same Things? St. Maximus and Theophanes seem to have succeeded still worse, when they said, that there are but four Gospels, because there are but four Elements. It was justly observ'd by Mr. Fabricius, that had there been five, three, or an hundred Gospels, they cou'd not have wanted as good Reasons to prove, why they were neither more or less. Such wretched trifling Stuff as this, is a Disgrace to humane Reason: It might perhaps pass in Conversation, where one does not always maturely weigh and reflect upon every thing that is said; but when one finds it seriously wrote; in Works too compos'd for the publick View, and to be left to Posterity; the least one can do, in my Opinion, by way of resentment, to Authors, who have oblig'd us to read such Things; is freely to disapprove and censure 'em.

St. Cyprian ^{ee} quotes at every turn, when he is upon the Matter of Ecclesiastical Discipline; the Passages out of the Old as well as New Testament, where-ever there is the Latin word Disciplina, without having any regard to Circumstances. See the Reasoning he makes use of against Lucian, (Presbyter and Martyr of Carthage, who was willing that those shou'd be receiv'd into the Peace of the Church, who had sunk under Persecution, without obliging them to pass thro' all the several Degrees of Penance:) *The * Lord having said, that they should baptize all Nations in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that their past Sins are forgiven 'em in Baptism; he (meaning Lucian) not knowing either the Commandments, or the Laws, ordains Peace and Pardon of Sins to be given in the Name of Paul.* But how easy is it to see the infinite Difference, between the Pardon which God grants to Sins committed before Baptism receiv'd in his Name; and the remitting of some Ecclesiastical Punishments by the Authority of a Martyr, who gives order for so doing? — In his Treatise of the Unity of the Church, he maintains, that the Indivisibility of the Church was typify'd by our Saviour's Garment without Seam. — He says, ^{es} that we ought to be liberal to the Poor, because as by Baptism we obtain Pardon for all the Sins, that were committed before Baptism, in virtue of the Blood of Jesus Christ; so by giving Alms we expiate those that are committed after. — Endeavouring to destroy the frivolous Pretences, which are sometimes alledg'd by way of excuse, for not giving of Alms; he mentions, among others, the Excuse of those, who say that the Multitude of their Children will not suffer them to be so liberal, as they cou'd wish to be: To which he replies thus; that the more Children we have, the more we ought to give; because we have the more Sins to purchase Redemption for, more Consciences to purify, and are to deliver the Souls of a greater Number of Persons.

St. Jerom, ^h “Who recommends Celibacy, as much as he possibly can; and who, according to the Custom of Orators, wou'd make any thing pass for a Reason; makes use of this fine Argument against Jovinian: Celibes, says he, quod celo digni sunt, inditum nomen; They have given 'em that Name, because they are worthy of Heaven.” If you wou'd see an Heap of Sophisms, and poor wretched Arguments, which prove nothing, or else prove that Marriage is in itself criminal; you need only read the Remainder of that Book against Jovinian, and that which he wrote against Helvidius; ⁱ where he strenuously opposes second Marriages: In this last Book, he prides himself, in having play'd the Rhetorician and Declaimer: Rhetoricati sumus, & in morem Declamatorum paululum lusimus.

In another Place, ^{kk} he makes it his Boast, that he wrote with great Precipitation, and without giving himself the Trouble to bestow much thought upon his Commentaries: and is accordingly found frequently contradicting himself. He has the Assurance to own in plain Terms, ^l that in his Polemick Works, he had no other Aim, but to get the better of his Adversaries; without the least Concern, whether what he advanced were true, or false. He supports himself by the Examples of Origen, Meibodius, Eusebius, Apollinaris, and other Apologists for the Christian Religion; who, as he says, us'd the same Method against the Heathens; making use of very doubtful and precarious Reasons; and maintaining, not what they thought, but what the Interest of the Dispute requir'd. Nay further, he pretends, that in so doing, he did but imitate Jesus Christ, and ^m St. Paul, who maintain'd, as he wou'd have us believe, the Pro and Con, just as it suited their Purpose.

The great St. Austin alone might afford us Matter enough, to furnish out a large Volume of Trifles and Impertinencies: I shall content myself with producing only two Instances. In explaining that Passage of Genesis, Chap. iii, Ver. 14, where the Latin Version, which he us'd, reads with the Septuagint, Upon thy Breast, and upon thy Belly shalt thou go, and Dust shalt thou eat, all the Days of thy Life: By ⁿ the Breast, says he, is meant Pride; by the Belly, the Lusts of the Flesh; and by that which follows, Dust shalt thou eat, Curiosity, which extends only to Things temporal and terrestrial. By Curiosity, he means Avarice: And thus it is he draws his moral Reflections from Scripture. His remark on the Title of the Psalms is very pleasant. “The ^o Transcribers it seems, did not use to put before the first Psalms, Psalms primus, as they do now-a-days, because they did not probably think it at all necessary; since there cou'd be no Mistake, it being at the Head of the Book, and follow'd by the second Psalms: But this wou'd not serve St. Austin's Turn, he was for a Reason much more mysterious:” † As this Psalm, says he, introduces God himself speaking, so for this Reason it has no Title, for fear lest otherwise something else shou'd be preferr'd before the Speech of God; or lest he should be call'd the first, which is not call'd the first, but one: And therefore it neither cou'd nor ought to have a Title; for fear lest if it had had the Title of the first, it might have been believ'd to have been the best, by its numerical Order only; and not by its Authority. Or else, adds he, as has been already said, for fear, that it might have been believ'd, that the Psalmist had preferr'd something else before the Speech of God, had he put a Title before this Psalm; for if it had been call'd the first, that might have been understood to mean, preferable to the rest. And therefore, concludes he, to the end that we may manifestly see, how much this Psalm is distinguish'd above the rest, it is the only one that has no Title. "Reconcile, if you please, the Conclusion with the Premises.

As I am quite tired with copying so much of this tedious, and injudicious Stuff; so there is more than enough of it, to set in their true Light the Characters of the Authors in question, and to let the Reader see ex ungue Leonem. I have design'dly pitch'd upon Examples, which had been already remark'd and produc'd by others; and are extant in Books most common and easy to be had. By this we may see, with what an ill Grace it is, that our zealous Defenders of the Fathers, require us to take it upon their Word, that they were Men of true Piety, and Knowledge; against so many and so notorious Proofs, which demonstrate, even to Eye-sight, that their Virtues were for the Generality, far from being any way considerable; and at the same time accompany'd with very great Imperfections; and some of 'em much to be suspected of Hypocrisy: and for their Knowledge, that it was commonly false and confus'd; that they had a much greater share of Imagination, than of good Sense; that they were destitute of many Helps, which were necessary to the augmenting and perfecting that Knowledge, they were Masters of; and that they even neglected * those Helps, which they actually had, or might have procur'd; and that consequently their ^{pp} Knowledge must needs have been very narrow and confin'd: in a word, that the most able amongst them, are in nothing comparable to the good Authors of ours, or the last Age; for either Solidity, Style, Order, or Method. And now, after all that has been said of their Writings, is it possible that any one can seriously look upon the Fathers, as Men of great Knowledge and Judgment? A Man of the greatest Knowledge and Judgment in the World, I must own, may be mistaken, and may give into some false Notion; but then it must be a Notion, that has at least some Plausibility, and this too is what will not often happen: but I shall venture to affirm, that a Man of tolerable good Sense will never be guilty of those Extravagancies, which we see the Fathers, almost all of 'em, have run into. None but those, who are capable of saying as silly Things themselves, or who are strangely blinded by a Spirit of Party; cou'd so much preach up the Authors of such arrant Trifles. But to their great Mortification, we do not now live in an Age, that will passively submit to such Treatment: The Publick is no longer to be impos'd upon by such sort of grave Affirmations as these, void of all Proof; and at the same time contradicted by an infinite Number of decisive Reasons, fairly expos'd to the publick View of the World. 'Tis a most ridiculous fond Conceit, to imagine, that, without having so much as attempted to disprove Facts, Facts so clear and certain as those which have been alledg'd; it is enough to salve all, to produce such a pitiful Reason of Congruity as this; (viz.) If the Christian Religion had not for its Propagators Men of true Piety and Learning, what opinion must we have of it? As we are under no Obligation to account for the Conduct of God, either for what he does, or what he does not do; for what he permits, or what he directs, according to the secret Methods of his Providence: so, instead of saying; such or such a Thing is contrary to the Designs of God, or to his Attributes; therefore God could not have done or permitted it; I think, (and I have all the Reason in the World to think so) that we shou'd rather argue thus: God has done or permitted such or such a Thing; therefore there is nothing in it contrary to his Designs, or to his Attributes: altho' it may not always, in our weak and narrow Understandings, be clearly reconcilable with the Views, and infinite Perfections of that Sovereign Being. But however, as he has not forbidden us to enquire after, and with due Reverence to propose, the Reasons he might have had, not to interpose in an extraordinary manner, to prevent certain Things; so, if we wou'd a little exert the Faculties of our Souls upon the Subject-matter of the Fact in question; we might easily discover enough, both to satisfy ourselves, and to stop the Mouths of those, who wou'd have God always to act according to their Caprice. If "after the Apostles themselves, we find nothing, "but what is very mean and confus'd in that first "Rise of Christianity; it was probably, as Mr. ⁹³ Le Clerc has very well remark'd, "so order'd, to "the end that it might not be said in future Ages, "that there were in those days Men able enough "to form such a Religion as Christianity, and to "forge supposititious Books for its first Authors; "since there is nothing to be seen after them, "that comes up to their genuine Writings: Not "only none of the Heads of the several Sects, "which sprung up at that time; but none even "of those who profess'd to follow the Apostles, "as their sole Guides, have produc'd any thing, "that comes near that manner of writing, which "is seen in the Works of those holy Men. There is "too withal in that manner of writing of theirs, so "much unaffected Plainness, and native Sincerity, "if I may so say; that we may from thence most "clearly discern, that what they tell us, is not "of their own Invention; but the real Dictates "of Jesus Christ; and of that Spirit, which he "had confer'd upon 'em." Certain it is, that, considering the Books of the New Testament with respect to the reasoning Part; not one of the Fathers, take 'em as they really were, wou'd ever have been able to compose Works, full of that good Sense, which so visibly reigns throughout the Gospels and Epistles of the Apostles. It may also be said, that God, in permitting the Fathers of the Church to be so unaccurate in their Writings; and oftentimes so irregular in their Conduct; was willing to shew, that the Christian Religion, which was to continue to the end of the World; both can and will maintain itself by its own Efficacy; maugre all the Ignorance and Wickedness of those, who ought to have been its chief Supporters. And shou'd this be deem'd to imply any thing; that is really contrary to the Wisdom of God, or injurious to the Christian Religion; it may be prov'd, by the same Principle, that there ought not to have been, under Christianity, Ages of universal Ignorance and Corruption, especially amongst the Clergy; and such too, as in fact those Ages were, which preceded the Reformation: and thus our zealous Defenders of the Fathers will have every whit as good a Foundation to maintain, contrary to the Faith of all History; that those Ages were not such, as they are generally believ'd to have been. But entirely to put to silence such, as are not asham'd to urge this wretched Argument; which, whatever Light 'tis view'd in, affords not the least Colour of Reason; I shall take occasion to add in a few Words three or four Reflections. The first is; that neither Jesus Christ, nor his Apostles have any where said, or in any wise given us to understand; that those, who next after them might be look'd upon as the Propagators of the Christian Religion, were to be Men of true Piety, and Knowledge. So very far from that were they, as to prepare us for the Expectation of just the contrary. The Parable of the Tares sow'd by the^r Enemy; and that of the^s Net that gather'd of every kind; do plainly enough shew us, that in the Christian Church, the Wicked were to be very much intermix'd with the Good; insomuch that these latter were not to have the Ascendant, or make a better Figure in it than the others. Our Lord hath foretold the Divisions, which the Ignorance, the vain Subtilties, the Temerity, the Presumption, and Passions of these Propagators of his Religion would produce in the Church. And St. Paul assures us, "that there must be Sects, to the end that those who should be worthy of Approbation, might be made manifest;" (that is to say) that a Mind free from Prejudice, and which judges not of things by Appearances; might be able to distinguish who were the Men, that did in good earnest devote themselves to Truth and Virtue. When the Apostles are telling us what was to happen in the Church, they^m express themselves in such a manner, as gives us all the Reason in the World to believe, that the Clergy were not for the Generality to be Men of the greatest Piety, and Understanding: In the very Days of the Apostles, there were Men of turbulent Spirits, and false Teachers; against whose Temerity and Seduction those holy Men were oblig'd to oppose themselves. There was even at that time to be seen a Diotrephes,^{xx} a Man both vain and ambitious; who presum'd to prate against St. John, with malicious Words; who treated as Hereticks, and excommunicated, those whom the Apostle held for Brethren.

^{pp} The Erudition of even those, who pass'd for the most learned, was very common, and cost them little or no Pains; as Mr. Bernard has very well observ'd in his Repub. des Lett. March 1699, p. 259.

The second Observation I have to make is; that, in the first Ages of Christianity, as well as in those that follow'd after; the Men most applauded, and who bore the greatest Character in the Church, were not always those, who had the greatest share of good Sense; or were the most eminent for Learning and Virtue. It was not for the most part^{yy} then, any more than it is now, Merit, which serv'd to raise Men to the highest Dignities of the Church. Thus, notwithstanding that Corruption both of Judgment and Manners, which reign'd, more or less, thro' every Age; it is not to be doubted, but that there were, both amongst the People, and Clergy too, Men of more Sense, Knowledge, Moderation, Justice and Piety; than these, whose Names and Writings have been transmitted down to us with so much Pomp and Ostentation. Let the Reader judge, to which of the two, the Name and Title of Propagators of the Christian Religion, does most properly belong; whether to these we do, or to those which we do not know; the others having made it their Business both to prevent their making any Figure while they liv'd; and to hinder their Memory from being handed down with advantage to Posterity. Amongst these latter, some out of Fearfulness; others thro' Prudence, or the Impossibility which they saw there was of succeeding; declin'd the entering into Contests, with Men more powerful than themselves: and if any one prov'd so hardy as to make head against those Doctors, who had gain'd the Admiration of the Populace; he soon found there was no good to be got by it: Witness the Affair of Vigilantius with St. Jerom.

I observe in the third place; that we have no other occasion, with respect to the Interests of the Christian Religion, for the Writings of Ecclesiastical Antiquity; than as they furnish us with historical Evidence, of what has pass'd; and been believ'd in the time of each Writer. This is in express Terms acknowledg'd, by an Author whom I have already quoted: When^{zz} the Protestants, says he, consult the Fathers and the Councils, they make no other use of that Study, but to learn the History of their Doctrines, and to search out the first Beginnings of Errour; so far are they from looking there for the Foundations of their Faith. Now after this to come and cry out, that all is lost, if we have not a profound Veneration for the Fathers; and but venture freely and impartially to speak our Minds of them; is plainly ridiculous. The very Divisions, which their Ignorance, Passions, and vain Subtilties have produc'd in the Church; contribute not a little to assure us, that no considerable Corruption has crept into the Text of the Holy Scriptures; since it is plain, had it been so, that the opposite Party wou'd not have fail'd to have openly reproach'd the other therewith.

My fourth and last Observation is; that, notwithstanding the great Inaccuracy of the Fathers, which has often caus'd 'em to commit considerable Errours; notwithstanding that strange Fancy they had for vain Subtilties, which made 'em neglect Things of much greater Importance; notwithstanding all this, I say, the Fundamental Doctrines of Religion and Morality have still been preserv'd amongst Christians; even in^{aaa} the most dismal Ages of Darkness and Vice. And tho' several Falsities have been added to, and mix'd with these Fundamentals; tho' they have not been fully explain'd, and drawn out into all their just Consequences; this is no way the fault of the Gospel. But Providence has at length highly justify'd itself, if I may so say, in the Eyes of all those, who wou'd otherwise have preposterously laid to its Charge, the Neglects and erroneous Judgments of Men. God has rais'd up a Set of Men, who have introduc'd a better manner of studying and reasoning. We improve daily in rightly expounding the Holy Scriptures; and in solidly handling Morality. A true Relish for found Knowledge and wholesom Literature begins to appear; and gives us reason to hope, that they will both in due time make a considerable Progress; notwithstanding the Efforts of those, who are labouring to bring us back to the Primitive Food of Husks and Acorns. And an Age may perhaps come, wherein the Fathers of the Church, together with their fond Admirers; shall be generally had in no greater Esteem, than they can fairly merit.

But it is time to put an end to this long Digression. I thought it necessary once for all, utterly to destroy the only Subterfuge which these boasted Defenders of the Fathers had left. We shall now pursue the Thread of our History of Morality. After what has been said of the little care taken by the Doctors of the Church of the six first Centuries, to cultivate it; it wou'd be superfluous to run over the following Ages; where-

THE Light of the Reformation, 'tis true, did in a great Measure restore, amongst Protestants, Purity both of Doctrine and Practice. But yet it cannot be truly said, that even the Reformers themselves, and their Successors, have always exactly pursu'd the true Spirit of Christianity; and of the Reformation. Was not that horrible Tenent of Intoleracion, or Persecucion on account of Religion, maintain'd by two Treatises, written for that very purpose; the one by Calvin, ^a and the other by ^b Beza? and did not Calvin actually put these his Principles in practice, in the Case of Servetus? are there not at this day Numbers, who, after having for many Years, and in divers Manners, themselves felt the dire Effects of Intoleracion; cannot yet be brought to make this explicit Declaration; that all Persecucion, or Vexation whatever, whether great or small; direct or indirect; on account of Religion, is in truth no better than downright Tyranny? Have we not seen some of 'em, bold enough to ascribe the Progress, Christianity has made in the World, to this way of converting Men; by expressly maintaining, that ^c Paganism wou'd have subsisted to this day; and that three Fourths of Europe wou'd have been still Pagans; had not Constantine and his Successors employ'd their Authority to abolish it. Are not ^d others for reviving that pernicious Maxim of St. Austin; that in Ignorance and Corruption, augmenting still more and more, did at length rise to such a Pitch, as that there was hardly to be seen, especially among the Clergy, the least Spark of good Sense or Virtue left. Not to mention that vast Number of ridiculous Superstitions, that prodigious and amazing Idolatry, which had entirely defac'd Christianity; there were besides a thousand detestable Maxims establish'd, worthy only of the gross Darknes of those unhappy Centuries. The Bishop ¹⁵ of Rome made himself to be regarded, as one invest'd with Power to depose all such Kings, as he shou'd judge to be Hereticks; and to absolve their Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance. Every one knows to what excess Indulgencies ¹⁶ were carry'd. An Italian call'd ¹⁷ John Giglis, or Des Lis, (De Liliis), who was made Bishop of Worcester by the Authority of the Pope; receiv'd from him at the same time the Power to pardon all sorts of Crimes; and to permit any one to retain the Goods of another, howsoever acquir'd; provided part thereof was given to the Commissaries of the Pope, or to their Substitutes.

“ here we find ourselves for ever lost and undone, for the neglect of a Duty, which we cou’d never hear the least Word from you about. You have suffer’d us to approach the Holy Table, without forewarning us, that we came thither unworthily, and there receiv’d our own Damnation; if we did not first entirely empty both our Hands and Coffers of all our unjust Gains. You have indeed preach’d up to us the Mercy of God: You have also press’d us to implore it with the most affectionate Devotion, and the most lively Hope; but without saying one Word of the Impossibility of obtaining the Effects thereof, if we obstinately continu’d in our Injustice, and consequently in Impenitency; which all most certainly do, who restore not that which they have unjustly acquir’d. In a word, ’tis you who have let us remain ignorant of these capital Truths, whilst we might have profited by them; ’tis you who are the Cause, that we learn’d ’em not till now, when they will only serve to render us inexcusable; and convince us that we now most justly are, and for ever ought to be most miserable.” Mr. Ostervald, Minister of Neuchâtel in Switzerland, makes the like Declaration: take it as reported, by a third ^s Minister, which is Mr. Bernard, the learned and judicious Continuator of the Novelles de la Republique des Lettres. The Ignorance, says he, of the Duties of Christianity, is both very general, and very great. There are some of them which vast Numbers have never thought on. The Author here instances in the Duty of Restitution; and tells us, that Mr. La Placette having some time ago publish’d a Treatise on that Subject, the Book was look’d upon as very singular, and for its Subject new and curious; and that some there were, who treated this Doctrine of Restitution, as a Doctrine entirely novel, and withal too rigid. — There are some too, who pretend, that Points of Morality ought not to be urg’d too far; that some Indulgencies ought to be made to humane Nature; and at the same time rigidly insist upon Points of Doctrine; and on such too oftentimes, as are of very little Importance. Some also have proceeded so far, as to say, that it is even dangerous to insist so much upon Morality; and that it is a Mark of Heresy so to do. Divines have likewise had the Assurance to publish Books, wherein they seem to have made it their Business, to decry good Works. Is it to be wonder’d at then, if the People, who are committed to the Care of such Guides, do not give themselves much Trouble about the Practice of them? — The Doctors appointed to instruct the People in Religion, “ fall out with^l one another about unprofitable Questions; so that while the Pastor is taken up in his Closet or in the Pulpit in confuting an Adversary, that perhaps he has never seen; or in combating an Errour utterly unknown to his Flock; his Sheep go astray, his Auditors become confirm’d, as to their Morals, in the most capital Errours; and deeply engag’d in vicious Habits and evil Courses.” Here you have the Depositions of unexceptionable Witnesses. And I wish it cou’d be said, to the Honour of those, against whom these Imputations have been but too justly brought; that they begin now to open their Eyes, and alter their Course. But, alas! it is much to be fear’d, that the greatest part of ’em will for some time continue still prepossess’d with this Notion, so contrary to the Engagements of their Ministerial Function; that a flaming Zeal for speculative Doctrines, which cost ’em not much Pains to acquire; and in maintaining of which they find their Account; will exclude ’em the Labour of entring deep into the serious Study of Morality: which will require much profoundⁱ Meditation; and Knowledge, beyond the rate of Common-Place-Book Learning. It would be a good Point gain’d, if they would but let them alone, who are to the utmost of their Power striving to do that, which they themselves were oblig’d to do. But their Predecessors have set ’em an Example; and they will by no means degenerate. Who was it, I pray, that introduc’d in the last Age, the methodical Study of the Law of Nature; that first attempted to give the World a System of this so vast, and necessary a Science? Was it any of the Ecclesiasticks, or Professors of Divinity? No: ’twas the illustrious Grotius; whose Memory wou’d on this very Account, be for ever bless’d amongst all sincere Lovers of Truth and Virtue; tho’ he had not otherwise gain’d an immortal Reputation, by the many Pieces he has wrote of another Nature; all excellent in their kind. — Yet no sooner did that admirable Treatise, of the Right of War and Peace, appear in the World; but the Ecclesiasticks, instead of returning thanks to the Author for it; every where declar’d against him: And his Book was not only put into the Expurgatory Index of the ^k Roman Catholick Inquisitors, (which is not so much to be wonder’d at;) but many, even Protestant Divines, labour’d to cry it down. And thus it far’d too with Mr. Pufendorf’s Book of, The Law of Nature and Nations. The Jesuites of Vienna caus’d it to be prohibited^l; and many Protestant Divines, both of Sweden and Germany, did their best, to make this excellent Work share every where else the same Fate.

MORALITY, being thus slighted, and almost banish’d out of the World by the publick Ministers of Religion; took Sanctua’y amongst the Laicks, or undignify’d

Men of Letters; who gave it a much better Reception. Let us now see in what manner these latter have treated it; and what has been the Progress it hath made in their Hands. It may very reasonably reasonably be suppos'd, that, notwithstanding the Simplicity and Ignorance of the first Ages of the World, as to what concern'd Arts and Sciences purely speculative; those Fathers of Families, who were Men of good Senſe and Probity; did not fail to ^a teach their Children betimes, together with the Principles of Religion, those Maxims too, that were the most important in Morality; as far as they had been made known to them, either by their own proper Meditation; or by ^b Tradition, deriv'd to 'em from the first Parents of Mankind. These Instructions, however imperfect, and immethodical they may possibly have been; might well enough suffice for those Times; especially before Corruption had come to that Height, at which it afterwards arriv'd. But when Depravity of Manners had defac'd the true Ideas of Religion and Morality; and the Fathers were become as negligent in instructing their Families, as their Children prov'd stubborn and unteachable; then had the clearest and most common Principles of Virtue been in a manner, entirely extinguish'd in the World; had there not been a Set of Men, who apply'd themselves, in a very particular manner, to the Improvement of their natural Reason, by the Study of the Sciences: and it was out of their Schools that ^c the most celebrated Legislators have proceeded; to whom Communities have been beholden for all the Order and Decency they have ever had amongst them; and for all the Tranquillity they ever enjoy'd: ^d Men more worthy of Admiration, and immortal Praise, than the greatest Conquerours.

As the Eastern Countries were the first peopled; so 'tis from thence that the most general Notions of Morality, and the other Sciences spread themselves thro' the World. The Greeks, with all their Vanity, were forc'd to own themselves ^e Debtors for these Notices to those, they call'd Barbarians; chiefly to the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Persians. But all that we know of the Sentiments of these ancient Eastern Nations, we have from the Greeks themselves; who have sometimes mix'd their own Opinions with those they reported; and give us at best but a slender Account, of what the Sages of the East taught, in the Subject of Morality. This more particularly appears by the Works of two Learned ^f Philosophers; who have collected with great Care, all that is to be found thereupon, in the Writings of the Ancients. — The System, we have given us of the Doctrine of the Chaldeans; is nothing but a heap of Notions in Physicks, or Astrology, Metaphysicks and Pneumatology; mix'd up with abundance of superstitious, mystical Allusions; and ridiculous Fancies. I have here set down All I have been able to remark, which can any way be refer'd to the Science of Morality; which is as follows: You ought to make haste, (these are Maxims, taken from a Collection entituled, The Oracles of the Chaldeans; and that they were actually couch'd in the Style of Oracles, will instantly appear, by the Sample I am about to give,) You ought to make haste to ^h approach the Light and Rays ⁱ of the Father, from whence your Soul was sent you. — Lift up entirely all your Eyes on high, and do not abase yourself towards this gloomy World, under which there lies an Abyss, never to be trusted, and an ^k Hell, surrounded on all sides with Mists and Clouds, &c. — Seek ^l Paradise. — Seek the Channel ^m of your Soul, and from whence, and from what ⁿ Rank, you are become a Slave to the Body, that you may be able to return to that Rank, from whence you are descended, by joining Practice to Holy Discourse. — Do not aggravate your Destiny. — Preserve your frail Body for the Practice of Piety. — Nourish yourself with the Hope of that Fire, ^o which is in the Country of Angels. — Do not defile your Soul, do not debase it, do not yourself make it depart from you, lest in departing from you, it find nothing: The Souls of those who are separated from the Body ^p by Force, are the most pure. — O Man, who art a Creature

^h That is to say, to do all you can, to return to the Place from whence your Soul is descended down here below; for they believ'd the Pre-existence of Souls.
ⁱ They meant by that, the Spaces that are above the Moon, which they conceiv'd to be all shining with bright Light. This Light was, in their Opinion, an Emanation from the Father, or Sovereign Divinity. See hereupon Stanly, and the Notes of Mr. Le Clerc, on the Chaldean Oracles.

^p That is to say, by the Effect of an exterior Force. They thought, as did the Disciples of Plato, that they ought not to depart out of this Life without the Permission of God. See Mr. Le Clerc, on this Verse.

of a most daring Nature, take not into thy Mind the vast Dimensions of the Earth; for the Plant of Truth is not upon the Earth. Do not measure the Sun by the help of collected Rules: He moves by virtue of an eternal Decree, and not for thy sake. Trouble not thyself about the Course of the Moon, and the Motions of the Stars, nor about the Noise of the Moon: She holds her Course by an Effect of Necessity. — The expanded Wing of Birds that fly in the Air, never tells Truth. I do not trouble myself at all about Sacrifices, or Entrails; they are all Mockeries, and the vain Supports of Fraud and filthy Lucre. Fly these Things, you who are to open the sacred Paradise of Piety, where Virtue, Wisdom, and Equity dwell in conjunction. The two last Sentences do plainly enough condemn judicial Astrology, and^a Sacrifices too, if not absolutely, at least the Prefages, which were drawn from the Entrails of the Victim; as well as those from the Flight of Birds: and yet these Things were highly in vogue amongst the Eastern Nations; and chiefly amongst the Babylonians and Assyrians. In the other Oracles, which would have been unintelligible to an ordinary Reader, without the short marginal Notes; which I have been oblig'd to add as a Key to some Places; they condemn Self-Murder; and recommend continual Meditation on the Rewards and Punishments of another Life. It remains to be consider'd, wherein they made those Duties to consist, which were to be practis'd in order to propitiate the sovereign Deity; and to assure to themselves a State of Bliss after this Life ended. In what has been hitherto collected of the Doctrine of the Chaldeans, there is no mention of any thing besides an exact Observation of certain Rites and Ceremonies, whereof Sacrifice is the most considerable; by means whereof they fancied themselves capable, of maintaining Correspondence with the Celestial Beings; of raising the Soul above the Power of the Passions; and even healing the Diseases of the Body; as well as those of the Mind. These Ceremonies they call'd the Works of Piety. They, who perform these as they ought, say they, cease to be troubled with any Evil whatever; they acquire thereby all sorts of Virtues; they become good and virtuous Men; they are set free from their Passions, and unruly Inclinations; they are purify'd from all Impiety and Prophaneness. On the contrary, those who neglect, or do not rightly perform them; are deliver'd up as a Prey to their Passions, depriv'd of all Commerce with the pure spiritual Beings, and become like to those evil Genii, with whom they converse; and who push 'em on to the Practice of all manner of Vice.

^a Mr. Le Clerc believes, we ought to read with Pfellus, σπλάγγων τιμαί: So that these Words shou'd not condemn Sacrifices, but only Divinations by the Entrails of Victims.

NOR are we much better inform'd as to the Morality of the Egyptians; nor tho' we should even admit for genuine, those visibly spurious Writings, which pass under the Name of their ^a Hermes, or Mercurius Trismegistus. 'Tis well known, that the Learned of that Country were ^b very much addicted to Enigma's, Symbols, and Hieroglyphicks; which render'd their Doctrine obscure and impenetrable to all, who were without a particular Key to it. So that it was almost impossible, for it ever to be transmitted to us; especially if we consider, with what care they conceal'd their Mysteries from all, who had not been initiated therein. However there is a certain Fragment still remaining, by which we may form some Judgment of the principal Heads of the Morality of the Egyptians; 'tis the Form of a kind of Funeral Sermon, pronounc'd by some Funeral Officer; wherein he thus delivers himself in the Name of the Deceas'd^c: I have religiously serv'd, during my Abode in this World, the Gods which my Forefathers had made known unto me. I have ever honour'd those who procreated my Body. I have never committed Murther. I have never been guilty of

*Breach of Trust. Nor have I ever committed any other Crime that is inexpiable. Those Remains we have preserv'd to us by ancient Writers, of the^d Laws of the Egyptians; the Establishment whereof is ascrib'd to their famous Hermes, or Mercurius Trismegistus, Counsellor of State to Osiris, one of their first Kings; do likewise give us reason to conclude, that the Sages of Egypt apply'd themselves as well to Morality and Politicks; as to the Study of the speculative Sciences. There are notwithstanding certain of those Laws, which do not rightly quadrate with some of the most evident Maxims of the Law of Nature. The Daughters alone, for example, were oblig'd to nourish and support their Parents; whilst the^e Sons were entirely excus'd. They also made a Difference to the Prejudice of the Mother, between the respect due to her from the Children, and that which they ow'd to their Father; which they founded on this false Notion^f in natural Philosophy: that the Mother contributes nothing to the Production of the Child, besides the furnishing it with a Lodging, as I may say, and Nourishment during the Time of her Pregnancy. Whereupon a very ingenious*

THE Doctrine of the Persians, was much the same with that of the Chaldeans, their Masters, as some pretend, from whom they receiv'd it. The manner, in which they educated in Persia, the Children ^a of their Kings, and their young Noblemen; gives us all the reason in the World to believe, that they diligently apply'd themselves to Morality and Politicks. At ^b the Age of fourteen, the young Prince was put into the Hands of those, who were call'd the Royal Preceptors. Who were four of the most Eminent for Birth, and Character, that cou'd be found in all Persia; they were chosen in the Vigour of their Age; the first past for the most wise, the next for the most just, the third for the most temperate, and the fourth for the most valiant. The first taught him the Magick of Zoroaster, Son of Oromazus; in which was comprehended all the Worship of the Gods: He also taught him the Laws of the Realm, and all the particular Duties of a good King. The second taught him to speak the Truth always, tho' it made against himself; The third taught him never to suffer himself to be overcome by his Passions; to the end that he might continue always free, and always a King; by ever maintaining as absolute a Sway over himself, as over his Subjects. The fourth taught him to fear neither Dangers, nor Death; for, by subjecting himself to fear, from a King he becomes a Slave. A Learned English Author ^c, who was Master of almost all the Oriental Languages, and even of the Dead Language of the Zend; (for so it was the Persians call'd the Books of their famous Zoroaster, or Zerdusht;) publish'd, some Years since, a Latin Translation of a Piece in Verse; which is itself but a Version, into the Modern Persian, of part of the Books of that antient Legislatour. They who have read that Abridgment, call'd Sad-der, will, I'm persuaded, readily subscribe to the Judgment of a Learned Journalist ^d; who says, that there are, amongst several good Precepts of Morality, many superstitious, and trifling Things; I have in my Notes ^e on Mr. Puffendorf reported part of these Maxims; which are indeed highly conformable to Reason. And here the Reader has the most considerable of the rest. (viz.) If you^f will be holy, and save yourself, you have two Rules to practise: The one is, that if in this World, you love Paradise better than any other Thing whatever, do not possess yourself of the Goods of another; for Paradise is worth more than all the Things of this *World; because this World is only as it were the Space of five days; whereas Paradise is as it were an infinite Duration. And if the Possession of Paradise be most agreeable to you, set not your Heart on these poor Things: Remember to do good to every one, for Acts of Goodness are excellent Works in this Life. Do then unto Men the same things, that you wou'd they shou'd do to you. The other Rule is, to offend no body with your Tongue; but to promote, by your Humanity and good Nature, Society amongst Men.—Do^g your Endeavour to follow Truth, without any Adulteration; seek it with care, for it will make your Soul perfect: Of all the Things which God hath created, there is none better than Truth.—Have^h no Commerce with a Prostitute: do not seduce the Wife of another, tho' she tickle your Heart, and tho' she lay Snares for you. --- Do not offend your Father; ⁱ who hath brought you up; nor your Mother, who hath carry'd you nine Months in her Womb; nor the Priest, who hath taught you the Maxims of Goodness and Virtue. --- When your Parents command you to do anything, rise up cheerfully to obey them. ^k Instruct your Children; and then be it known unto you, that all the good Actions, which they shall do, it shall be as if their Parents had done 'em themselves. --- He that lives in Ignorance, knoweth neither God nor Religion. The Reasons, with which these excellent Maxims are accompany'd, are not always very solid; and there are some of 'em even ridiculous. They say, for example, that a Man ought not to debauch his Neighbour's Wife, because, ^l if after it the Husband approaches his Wife, he committeth a Sin, as much as if he had to do with an Harlot. They say farther, that ^m who's ever hath had to do with a Whore, shall lose for forty days, his Understanding, Knowledge, and Discernment; nor shall be able to conduct himself, &c. In another Place ⁿ, they advise to marry betimes; because, say they, Children are as a Bridge at the last Judgment; so that they who have no Children at that day, cannot pass over into the Mansion of Immortality; But must remain on this side the Abyss, which separates it from this World. It must nevertheless be acknowledg'd, that they do not fail frequently to alledge the general Motive of the Rewards and Punishments of another Life; which Zoroaster taught, with a kind of Resurrection; tho' he has upon that occasion vented a thousand gross and absurd Conceits; as may appear by reading Mr. Hyde's Book.*

SECTION XV.

AFTER having spoke of the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, and the Persians; I must, before I pass on to the Western Nations, say something of the Indians, and Chinese. What some Authors have related concerning the manner of living us'd by the Indian Philosophers, whether they are call'd Brachmans, or Germans, or Gymnosophists; (for there were several Sects of them, which are not sufficiently distinguish'd by the antient Authors, who speak of them:) What, I say, is related concerning their (A) sad and solitary Way of living; and of their superstitious Austerities, in which the Modern Bramius (B) have but outdone 'em; plainly shew, that there was a great deal of Caprice and Folly in their Principles and Maxims. However, as Strabo reports, they believ'd the Immortality of the Soul, and a future Judgment; (C) as far, says he, as it has any relation to Piety and Holiness. And it appears, by a Conversation, related (D) by Philostratus, which Apolonius had with one of the Gymnosophists of Ethiopia; that their Notions of Justice were right enough. As for the Chinese, whose Opinions and Customs were unknown to us till these latter Ages; the celebrated Mr. Leibnitz assures us, * that, in Matters of Morality and Politicks, the Learned of that Country far exceed ours here in Europe. Perhaps this Encomium may be some what over strain'd; but however this at least is certain, tho' * Mr. De St. Evremond be never so much of the contrary Opinion; that there are a great many most excellent Things to be met with in the Books of Confucius, (or Cum Fu Cu): who, not to mention the Divine Honours which have been long since paid him in that Country; is so much esteem'd for his Philosophy, that there are in every City publick Schools, where his Works are expounded; and where one must study some time, before he can be admitted into any Post in the Government. I will now give my Reader a Taste of his Principles. " All that, which is the Celestial Part of Man, we call the Rational Nature; what is conform to Nature and Reason, we call the Rule: as we do Morality, or the Institution of Virtue, the Re-establishment of that Rule, by the Application thereof to ourselves, in the Government of our Passions. This Rule, being essential to the Rational Nature, neither can, nor ought to be separated one single Moment from Man; for if it cou'd be separated from him at any time, it wou'd not then be the Rule, nor the Reason, which Heaven has given us. (Confucius, or Cu Su, no doubt meant by this, that to cease to be rational, is to cease to be a Man; since they add:) This is the reason why the Man of Integrity keeps so diligent a Guard upon himself; and is so watchful even in Things, which do not appear to the Eye; such as are the first and most minute Motions of the Heart: and that he governs himself with so much Precaution also in Things, which are not to be distinguish'd by the Ear; to the end, that whatever he does, he may never swerve from the Rule of right Reason; which he always carries imprinted on his Soul. The Passions being essential to Nature, or rather being Nature itself; the Man of Integrity applies himself to govern, and keep 'em under the Restraint of right Reason; (but not to suppress or extinguish 'em:) For Joy, the Attendant on Good, and Grief, on bad Successes; Sorrow for the Loss, and Pleasure in the Enjoyment of any good; before they come to be reduc'd into Act, are term'd Medium, or reputed to be in a State of Mediocrity; being as yet indifferent with respect to either Redundancy, or Deficiency. But when they have pro-

duc'd their Effect, and that Effect agrees with the Light of right Reason; 'tis then call'd Union or Agreement between Reason and the Passions; whilst the Passions still keep the Medium, they are look'd upon as the main Spring of the Universe, and the Foundation of all good Actions; and, when they are conformable to Reason, they are call'd the Rule of the Universe, and the Royal Way of Mankind. --- " There are four Rules, which a Man of Integrity endeavours to observe: Scarce one which have I observ'd as I ought: 1st, To pay the same Obedience to my Father, which I require from my own Children. 2^{dly}, To have the same Fidelity to my Prince, that I expect from my own Servants. 3^{dly}, To have the same respect for my Seniors, that I look for from those, who are my Juniors. 4^{thly}, To have the same Zeal for the Interest of my Friends, as I myself expect at their Hands; and to endeavour as much to be beforehand with 'em in all manner of good Offices, as I wou'd desire they shou'd do on my Account. A Man of Integrity puts these Virtues in practice every Day, and every Hour; without Artifice, and without Disguise. He is prudent and circumspect in all his Discourse; and if he has in any thing come short of his Duty, he never rests, till he has supply'd what was wanting. If he finds a Torrent of Words come upon him, he is very careful how he gives 'em utterance; because he will be always seen to sute his Actions exactly to his Words; and his Words to his Actions. A Man of Integrity is always content with his Lot, he always lives in a manner suitable to his present Condition; and never wishes for any thing, that is not proper for him. As he seeks only to make himself perfect, and demands nothing of other Men, he is never displeas'd or angry with them; and never murmurs either against Heaven or Earth. When he is unfortunate, he complains not of the Injustice of Providence; he imputes not to other Men, his own Defects; nor does he accuse them of being the Authors of his Misery. He is like an Archer, who lays all the fault upon his own Hand, when he has mis'd his aim. --- " I do not see of what use a Man can be in the World, who is without faith; unsincere in his Words, and unsteady in his Promises. Of what use is a Chariot without a Beam; or a Wheel without an Axle-tree?" One may judge by this Sample, of the Accuracy of Thought, and profound Meditation of this Chinese Sage. The Instructions which he gave to Ngai-cum King of Lu, concerning the Art of Government, " contain most admirable moral Reflections; which do not merely consist of indetermin'd general Notions; but of particular Instructions, adapted to all the several Occasions, and Junctures of Affairs, which can befall a Prince: insomuch, that it may very well be said without Exaggeration, that there is more to be learn'd from this small Book of Confucius, than from the vast and numerous Volumes of some of the Fathers of the Church. But there arose since his Time another Philosopher, whose impious Notions at length prevail'd; and have continu'd to this day to be the Opinions most commonly receiv'd. His * Disciples have an exterior Doctrine, which they preach to the People, to retain them, say they, in their Duty; and which consists in teaching, that there is a real Difference between Good, and Evil; just, and Unjust: and that there is another Life, where every one shall be punish'd or rewarded, according to that which he hath done in this. But their interior Doctrine, which is only for the initiated; is upon the upshot a kind of Spinozism; which at once entirely expunges both Religion, and Morality.

* He calls him (Tom. 5, p. 69.) the most tedious Moralists he ever read. His Sentences, adds he, where he is intelligible, are below the Stanzas of Pibrac; where he is obscure, he is above the Apocalypse. But a Man of the Character of St. Evremond, might be tired with the reading a Book of Morality; and yet that be no Prejudice to the Merit of the Book. Not that there are not as well bad, as good Things, in what has been publish'd of Confucius's Works; and we may very well subscribe, or come pretty near the Judgment of Mr. Gundling, Professor at Hall in Saxony, in his Book call'd Hist. Phil. Moral. Part 1, cap. 5, Sect. 5; of which the first Part only has been yet publish'd, as I think, which treats of the Oriental Philosophy; printed in 1706.

WE come now to the Grecians, whose Opinions we are much better acquainted with than those of the Eastern Nations, whose Disciples they had first been; though they afterwards became Masters to all the other Nations of Europe. They set themselves to extend, and, in Process of Time, did in Fact considerably improve that Stock of Knowledge, they had imported from abroad: And hence it is, that the farther we look back into Antiquity, the more we trace amongst the Greeks, the Notions and Manner of teaching of the Eastern Nations. Thus it comes to pass, that the Morality of the most ancient Grecians consisted in Enigma's, Apologues, and Sentences, not much unlike the Proverbs of Solomon. There had been, before Æsop, whose Fables are so much celebrated, many other Authors in that Sort of ingenious and instructive Fictions. Plutarch, speaking of Pittheus, Grandfather, on the Mother's Side, to Theseus, who liv'd about the Time of the first Judges of Israel; says, That the Science then in Use consisted chiefly of Sentences, and moral Sayings; such as those which gain'd Hesiod so much Esteem, in his Work entitled, Works and Days. Amongst the Sentences of that Poet, adds he, this is one; which is ascrib'd to Pittheus: Let the Reward thou promisest to thy Friend, be a competent Reward. These Sentences were generally put into Verse after the Eastern Manner; which serv'd to help the Memory, and give the Precepts a more lively Turn. There is now extant an Elegiack Poem of Theognis of Megara, under the Title of Sentences; where you have abundance of good moral Reflections. Homer too we find, with the other less ancient Poets, but more especially the Tragedians, full of Precepts; sometimes direct, sometimes indirect; scatter'd too all over Works, which were principally design'd for Diversion, rather than Instruction. But they must be read with Judgment and Caution; for the good and the bad lie there both blended together: For which Reason Plato banish'd them his Republick; and Plutarch wrote a Treatise purposely to inform Youth, with what Precautions they were to be read. But to say nothing of the absurd Ideas they give of the Deity; we find there, amongst some few Instances of Virtue, many Characters extremely vicious; which they are so far from exposing as they ought, to the Horrour and Detestation of their Readers; that on the contrary, they are frequently set forth as the very Patterns of Virtue. AS there are some moral Sentences, which are most true; and some most noble Sentiments: so likewise there are some Thoughts mean enough; and moral Reflections too, which are false and ill-grounded. Let any one read what Theognis says concerning Poverty, and the great Care we ought to take to avoid it; and he will be forc'd to own, that no Miser could have said more. Hesiod says: For my Part, I would neither myself be just amongst Men, nor would I

Holl.* An ancient Philosopher, nam'd Eratosthenes, did long ago advance this Proposition, which does at present do much scandalize the Grammarians and extravagant Admirers of Antiquity: Ποιητῶν γὰρ ἔφη πάντα σοχέσθαι ψυχρογῶνας, οὐ διδασκαλίας, which are the very Words of Strabo, who vainly endeavours to refute them, p. 28, & seq. Ed. Amst. 1707. & p. 15, D.— Ed. Casaub. Nor is it likely, that what Madam Dacier says thereupon, in her Preface upon Homer's Iliad, p. 67, & seq. Edic. Paris, will make Men quit this Opinion of theirs, who have not devoted themselves to the idolizing of Antiquity. Perhaps too this new Version, done by so able a Hand, will not a little prejudice the Original, in the Judgment of those who have not toil'd much in studying it, notwithstanding the Care Madam Dacier takes at every Remark to cry out, This is admirable! this is divine! as if she had some Distrust, that without some such Advertisement, the great Beauties of Homer would not be perceiv'd. Perhaps too it were to be wish'd, for the better understanding this Poet, that his learned Interpreter had made use of the Remarks of other learned Moderns; and that she had not sometimes so faithfully adher'd to the ancient and common Latin Version. For Instance, lib. 1, vers. 76, she turns, εὖ δὲ σύνθεο, Assurez moi, &c. for prenez y garde, Consider well what you engage me in: as it is well expounded by Mr. Bos, Obser. Crit. c. 29, p. 125 — Vers. 132, ἐπεὶ δὲ παρελεύσεαι, Vous ne pourrez me surprendre; instead of, Vous n'échapperez pas, You shall not avoid what I have resolv'd to do; as Mr. Grævius has corrected the common Version, in his Notes upon Hesiod, Theogon. vers. 613. and this Correction has been followed in the small Edition of Weslein, published in 1707; and which might have been very serviceable to Madam Dacier. Vers. 410, ἵνα πάντες ἐπαύρωνται βασιλεῖσι, the Latin Translator has ridiculously put, Ut omnes fruantur rege: Madam Dacier translates, Afin qu'ils jouissent tous de la sagesse de leur roi; and thereupon she makes a very subtle Remark, which she might have spar'd, had she translated Afin qu'ils soient tous punis pour leur roi, according to the true Exposition of Mr. Grævius, upon Hesiod, Erg. vers. 240; follow'd by the last Latin Translator, in the Edition of Weslein. I shall mark but one Place more, Vers. 178; where Agamemnon says to Achilles, Ἐὶ μάλ' αὖ κερτέρος ἔσσι θεός; πῦρ ἐστὶ τῶν ἰδίων. Sic tu es, tantum lant, d'où te vient ta valeur? n'est-ce pas Dieu, quite l'a donnée? It should be turn'd, N'est-ce pas une Divinité; that is to say, The is your Mother, as appears by Vers. 280. But our Admirers of Homer, and other Pagan Authors, will, whatever it costs, find in them those Ideas, which are peculiar to the sacred Writers.

⊖ I apply to the Poets in general, what Mr. Le Clerc says of Hesiod, in the Extract inserted amongst the Additions of the Journal de Trevoux, Edit. Holl. Tom. 1, p. 262.

 " to pass. He must have liv'd but a very little " while, or taken but very little Notice of what
 " pass'es amongst Men; who imagines, that the " most virtuous are generally the most esteem'd:
 " And the Man who expects to see any such " Thing, will find himself wretchedly mista" ken. Let him but consult Seneca's Book of " Providence; the excellent Preface to it by " Mark Anthony Muret; and the Notes of se"veral learned Commentators on that Book;
 " and he will plainly see, that the Misery
 " which attends Virtue; and the Prosperity of " Vice, if we consider this Life only; have " always been the constant Subject of Lamen"tation and Complaint. Yet Hesiod, more " than once, makes the Adherence we owe to " Virtue, * depend on the Riches and Pro"sperity which accompany it. Such Discourses " were very proper to persuade Men, that Virtue is but a mere Piece of Cunning, to be made " use of whilst successful; but to be thrown " aside, whenever there is any Probability of " its being hurtful; that is to say, for the most " part. -- Can any Thing be more flat and low,

 " than to say, as ' Hesiod does; that if we make " a Feast, we should invite none but our Friends,
 " and not our Enemies; and that we ought to " love them only, that love us; and not to visit
 " any, but those from whom we receive Visits?"
 Much of this kind is to be found in all the Poets; with whom 'tis the commonest Thing in the World to hold pro and con, without affording the Means of distinguishing between the good and the bad. This may be seen in the Collection of Stobæus; where you may be stor'd with Passages out of the Poets, that will serve to maintain both Sides of the Question, upon several moral Subjects. But our proper Business here is with those, who make it their Profession to instruct, and not to divert. Let us run over the most celebrated of these, as they lie in order of Time.

PYTHAGORAS, ^a the Disciple of Thales, and of Pherecydes of Seyros, and Founder of the Italick Sect; considerably ^b advanced the Science of Morality; yet it still continu'd to be but a Collection of particular Precepts, under Covert and Obscurity; unattended with either Reasoning, or Proof. Aristotle speaks of him as ^c the first who attempted to treat of Virtue; and Horace says, ^d That he was no mean Author on the Subjects of natural Philosophy, and Morality.

Before his Time, those who excell'd in the speculative and practical Sciences, and were distinguish'd by an exemplary Life; were call'd Sages, or wise Men: which, according to the Style of the Greeks, ^e meant the same with what we now-a-days term learned, or literate Men. Pythagoras however, finding something too assuming ^f in this Title, took another instead of it; by which he signified, that he did not think fit to arrogate to himself the actual Possession of Wisdom, being only an humble Enquirer after it; and therefore he gave himself the Appellation of Philosopher, or Lover of Wisdom: a Name which has been ever since given to those, who make it their Business to study Natural Science and Morality. ^g Pythagoras bent his useful Labours to reform, and instruct the World. His Eloquence could not but be very powerful, when his Instructions had so great Effect, as to make the Inhabitants of a very large Town, deeply plung'd in Debauchery, entirely quit their luxurious Way of living; and betake themselves to a Life of strict Sobriety and Virtue. He prevail'd even with the Ladies to part with all their fine Cloaths and Ornaments; and to present 'em as an Offering to the principal Deity of the Place. --- It was his special Care to correct the Abuses committed in the ^h Marriage State; without which he thought neither publick Peace, Liberty, a good Form of Government, or any the like Things, for which he labour'd with very great Zeal, could make the People happy. --- ⁱ His Affection for the publick Good of Mankind, made him resolve to carry his Instructions to the Palaces of the Great. --- He had the good Fortune and Glory of having form'd Disciples, who prov'd some of the most excellent Legislatours; such as Zaleucus, ^k Charondas, and others. He had travell'd ^l very much in the East; more especially among the Egyptians, the Persians, and the Chaldeans; from whence he brought many of his Notions, with his Method of Teaching; for he deliver'd his most excellent Precepts under the Vail of Symbols and Enigma's; and there is but but too much of the Mystical in the greatest Part of his Principles of Morality; even those of 'em which are the most clear. He had two Ways of Teaching; the one for Strangers, which was obscure und enigmatical * : the other for Initiates, which was open and instructive. It is not certainly known whether he ever publish'd ° any Thing in Writing; but certain it is, that we have now nothing of his extant. The little Poem, call'd, the Golden Verses of Pythagoras, was compos'd by one of his Disciples; which some affirm to be Lyfis; others * Empedocles. I shall here give the Reader a general Account of his Notions, as far as they relate to Morality. He believ'd the Unity of a supreme God; whom he conceiv'd to be of a ° Nature impassible; and which falls not under the Cognisance of the Senses, but is Invisibile, Incorruptible, and solely Intelligible. As he made great Use of Arithmetick, or the Science of Numbers, to expreis his Thoughts by; he said that Virtue, Health, Friendship, every Thing that is good, and even God himself, were nothing but Harmony. 'Tis well known, * that he had his Opinion concerning the Transmigration of Souls, from the Egyptians. Notwithstanding which h. speaks of Hell, and the Pains of another Life; in which ° he is not very consistent with himself. " Nothing in the World can be " more admirable, and Christian-like, than what " he says of the main Design and Aim of our " Actions and Studies: For he held, that the " Study of Philosophy ° tends to bring Men " to a Resemblance with God. --- His Doc- " trines contain'd * two Parts; which may very " well be compar'd to the Purgative, and Uni- " tice Ways; about which our Quietists * have said so many fine Things. --- The Acqui- " sition of Truth was, in his Opinion, the " only Way to become like God: But the " Way to discover Truth, is to search after " it with a Soul that is purify'd; and has sub- " du'd the Passions of the Body. The Fol- " lowers of ° this Philosopher taught, that a " Man perfects himself three Ways: First, by " conversing with the Gods; because, during " such Commerce, he abstains from every evil " Action; and thereby makes himself like the " Gods, as far as such a Thing is possible. " Secondly, by doing ° good to others; for " this in God, is one of his Properties; in " Man, the Imitation of him. Thirdly, by " departing out of this Life. The most ex- " cellent Endowments Heaven ever conferr'd " on Men, are, according to Pythagoras °, " those of speaking Truth; and doing good " Offices: These two Things, say the Pytha- " goreans, nearly resemble the Works of God." This ° Philosopher very earnestly recommended Sobriety, and Moderation in all Sorts of Pleasures. He forbids ° " the leaving this World with- out express Order from our General, that is, God; who has given each Man his Post here. But, when we are call'd upon to quit this Life, he would have us do it with a good Grace, and without any Concern for the Loss of the Pleasures of this World; all which he signi- fies to us by this symbolical Sentence: " ° Not to return back again, when we are once enter'd upon our Journey. " Another of his Symbols or- dains, not to pass the Equilibrium of the Ba- lance; intimating, that the Rules of Equity and Justice ought exactly to be follow'd.

ANAXAGORAS, the first of the Ionick Sect, (if we except Thales,) who acknowledged for the original Cause of the Universe, an infinite Spirit; was nevertheless generally look'd upon as an Atheist: because he said, that the Sun was nothing else but a Globe of Fire, and the Moon but an Earth; that is to say, because he denied, that there were spiritual Substances join'd to these Planets; and consequently that they were Deities. "Before ever the Gospel had taught Men, to renounce the World and its Riches, in order to travel the more expeditely the Way to Perfection; there had been Philosophers, who saw, and were so fully perswaded of it, as to have actually put it in Practice; by the ridding themselves of their Estates, that they might have nothing left to incumber, or divert them from the Study of Wisdom; and a serious Enquiry after Truth." Thus says Mr. Bayle: But as he seems here to attribute to the Gospel, according to his wonted Custom, overstrain'd Notions of Morality; so he extols a little too much the Conduct of these ancient Philosophers; in which there was more of Ostentation, and a mistaken Notion of Disinterestedness, than of true Wisdom: for we may make a good Use of our Riches; nor is the entire relinquishing of 'em necessary, to a more close Application to the Study of Truth and Virtue. But, be that as it will, Anaxagoras, after having convey'd all his Patrimony to his Relations; applied himself wholly to the Study of Nature, without in the least meddling or concerning himself with the Publick; which occasion'd his being ask'd, whether he had no Concern for his Country: His Answer was admirable; the Christian Philosophers could not have made a better: Yes, said he, pointing to the Heavens, I have an extraordinary Care for my Country. Another Time one ask'd him, To what End he was born? To contemplate, replies he, the Sun, the Moon, and the Heavens. And accordingly he plac'd the Sovereign Good, or the chief End of humane Life, in Contemplation; and in that free State of Mind, which Contemplation produces. --- He thought the Conditions of Life, which appear'd least happy, to be the most so; and that those, who taste the Sweets of true Happiness, were not to be look'd for amongst the Men surrounded with Riches and Honours; but amongst those, who till a small Spot of Ground; or who, void of all ambitious Cares, apply themselves to the Study of the Sciences. --- He was the first, who suppos'd the Poems of Homer to be Books of Morality; where Virtue and Justice are explain'd by allegorical Stories.

Archelaus, the Scholar of Anaxagoras, apply'd himself chiefly to the Study of Natural Philosophy, as his Predecessors had done; but withal engag'd something farther in the Business of Morality; though he prov'd not over-orthodox on that Subject: for he held, that humane Laws were the Origin of all moral Rectitude; that is to say, that he own'd no such Law as the Law of Nature; but admitted of positive Laws only; and consequently believ'd, that all Sorts of Actions are in their own Nature indifferent; and that they become good or bad, according as it shall please Men to establish such or such Laws." I cannot say, whether what has been alledg'd be exactly conform to the Sentiments of Archelaus: But certain it is, that Socrates, his Scholar and Successor, had quite different Ideas of the Nature and Foundation of the moral Part of humane Actions. Perhaps it may be in this Case, as it is with respect to the Imputation of another Opinion to this same Philosopher; which, in the Judgment of a most able Person, appears not to be well verify'd: But be this as it will; let us now pass on to his Scholar, who, in every Respect, much excell'd his Master; and under whom Philosophy took a quite different Turn.

" thyphro of Plato *, that all the Impiety laid to his Charge was; that he had openly condemn'd all the Fables concerning their Gods, in which wicked and impious Actions were attributed to them; although he had at the same Time own'd inferior Deities; as may be seen by several of his Discourses. --- The People indeed concluded, that those Fables could not be rejected, without denying, at the same Time, the Deity of those, to whom they related; in which they reason'd better than Socrates: for, in fine, the only Knowledge they had of Jupiter, and the rest of their Gods, was no other than what they had received by Fable, or oral Tradition; and if that Tradition was to be look'd upon as impious or false; then it must necessarily follow, that the whole of what was said, concerning the Gods of Athens, ought to have been rejected. That there is a God, might then as well as now be believed, without admitting those Fables: but how could it have been ever imagined without them, that there was a Jupiter, a Saturn? &c. The natural Idea of a Deity, which is absolutely incompatible with Vice; made Socrates overlook this Inconsequence in his Principles. Nothing can be finer than what he says of " divine Providence; and his Maxim upon Prayer, is worthy the Light of the Gospel. " When he pray'd to the Gods, he only ask'd them in general Terms, that they would give him good Things; because they knew better than we do, what Things are truly good; and he said, that they who ask'd either Gold or Silver, or sovereign Power; made as absurd Requests, as if they had ask'd to game, or to fight, or desir'd any Thing else, that might easily turn to their Prejudice. Let us now see what his Sentiments were concerning the Law of Nature. There are °, said he, certain Laws which are not written; these are the Laws which are universally receiv'd throughout the World: But nevertheless Men did not make them; for all Men could not assemble themselves together in any one Place; neither could they all speak the same Language. They ♯ were therefore made by the Gods: for in the first Place, it is ordain'd for all Men to worship and adore the Gods. It is also commanded every where, and to every Man, to honour his Father and Mother: and that Fathers and Mothers should not marry with their Children. No one ever violates with Impunity, adds he, any one Law establish'd by the Gods. There are Punishments which inseparably adhere to the Crimes committed against these Laws, which Punishments it is impossible to escape; whereas a Man may easily ward against the Severity of humane Laws, after he has transgress'd 'em; either by concealing, or defending himself by open Force. --- To do good to them, who have done good to us, is also an universal Law. If any sin against this Law, they are sufficiently punish'd for it; since their best Friends will thereupon abandon them: and then they will be oblig'd to betake themselves to those, who have an Aversion to them. For are not those, the best Friends, who do us good Offices, when we make use of 'em? But if he, who has receiv'd Favours from them, proves unthankful, does he not draw upon himself their Hatred by such his Ingratitude? And yet, as he finds it to his Advantage to keep himself in their good Graces, will he not still continue constantly to court and sue to them with the greatest Application? --- When I consider, that each Law carries with it the Punishment of him, who transgresses it; I easily perceive it to be the Work of a Legislatour more excellent than Man. The Gods never make any Laws which are unjust: on the contrary, other Legislatours, beside the Gods, can scarce make any that are just. It may easily from hence be judg'd, what were the Principles of Socrates. Many of the particular Consequences, he drew from them, may be seen in the Memoirs of Xenophon; who seems to have mix'd nothing of his own, with the Discourses of his Master, which he there reports. This great Philosopher makes use of a very poor Argument, to shew that Incest with a Father or Mother is contrary to the natural, or divine Law: " For they, says he, who give themselves up to these unlawful Embraces, must needs have but very pitiful Children.

Besides the Works of Xenophon, we have still extant some * Dialogues by Eschines the Philosopher; and a little Piece of another of Socrates's Scholars, call'd † Cebes. This last is a most ingenious Picture of human Life, wherein the Method and Genius of the Master may be seen, as well as in the Dialogues I just now mention'd. All the several Sects of Philosophers, who have appear'd in the World since Socrates †, have been desirous to have him for their their Chief; and have endeavour'd to bring their Sentiments and Notions to those of this great Man. We shall now say something of the most celebrated Founders of Sects, who came out of his School; and we shall begin with him, who was the most celebrated, and the only one, except Eschines, whose Writings we have now left.

S E C T. XXI.

PLATO, as well as Eschines, “the better to keep up the Appearance and Air of their Master’s, that grand Restorer of Morality; prefer’d that of teaching by Dialogue, to any other Method. For as it is the most diverting, in that it does, as it were, set before the Reader the very Scene of Affairs; where he sees all the Parties concern’d in Action: so it does, I may say, better carry on the main Design, which is to persuade and instruct; for it is more animated, and has all the Force of a judicial Proceeding, where the Parties on each Side of the Question are fairly admitted to make their Defence, as fully as they are either willing, or able to do; so as that the Victory, which the one gains over the other, can be no farther disputed; at least when the Dialogue is compos’d by an able Hand; and one who is sincerely engaged in the Search after Truth.” This is the Sentiment of Mr. Dacier; who has undertaken to translate our Philosopher into the French Tongue. But since all Capacities have not either the Attention, or Penetration requisite to discern, amidst the Jumble of Arguments pro and con, what is the real Opinion of the Author; Plato, in my Judgment, would have done well to have modestly declar’d himself at last; and have let the Reader see, what upon the Upshot appear’d to him the most probable.--- Thus the ingenious Dialogist of our Days, who has given us the new Dialogues of the Dead; never fails to put into the Mouth of the last Interlocutor that speaks, such Sentiments as contain the Design and Result of the whole Dialogue; the Want of which Precaution has drawn this Reflection upon Plato; that in his Books the Reader, who finds nothing there laid down as certain, is always left in Suspence. But Cicero, whose Reflection this is, does him Justice in another Place; where he exempts him from the Number of those, who maintain’d, that nothing could be certainly known. And it appears, by a beautiful Passage in his Phaedo, that this Philosopher was, as well as his Master, in many Things well fix’d and determin’d in his Opinions; and that, “if he seems not positively to affirm any Thing in his Writings, ’tis because he entirely follows Socrates’s Manner of Disputing; and is in every Thing careful to avoid the magisterial Air of the Sophists, and Dogmatists; who asserted every Thing in a peremptory Manner; taking almost always simple and bare Appearances, for indisputable Truths.” He accordingly there introduces Socrates speaking in this Manner: Is it not a most deplorable Misfortune, that though there are Reasons true, certain, and most obvious to the Apprehension; there should nevertheless be found a Set of Men, who, after having refus’d to lay hold of them; and having been present at some of those frivolous Disputes, where every Thing appears, sometimes true, sometimes false; come at length to doubt whether it be so or no: and instead of laying the Blame of those Doubts on themselves, or their own Want of Skill and Application, they at last throw it on the Reasons themselves; and then peevishly pass the rest of their Lives in vilifying and setting at naught all Reason whatever; and thereby utterly deprive themselves of all Truth, and Knowledge. It has been observ’d, that there are four particular Persons, in whose Mouths Plato generally puts his real Sentiments; viz. Socrates, Timæus, the Athenian Host, and the Stranger of Elea.

And tho’ there are some particular Dialogues, which treat more expressly and particularly of Morality, than the rest; yet that Science is diffus’d thro’ all his Works; and whatsoever Subject he is upon, he seems to have always an Eye to that. His Principles, as far as I have been able to collect ’em from his Writings, may be reduc’d to these following Heads.

The

The End and Aim of all humane * Actions is some Good; and there is ' a sovereign Good, a Good by way of Excellence; which every Soul parts after. This sovereign Good must needs be " perfect, self sufficient by itself; and such, that whoever comes to know it, cannot but most ardently seek the Possession of that alone; without the least Concern for any other Things, but such as are made perfect by these Goods, which have some Relation thereto. But this can only be found in " that infinite Being, who is the Parent and ° Cause of all other Beings; who not only gives to ° Things knowable, whatever they contain of Truth; and to intelligent Beings, the Faculty of knowing them: but is also the Author of their Existence and Essence; being himself alone all Essence, both in respect of Time, and Power. Without the Knowledge, and Possession of this Good, all other Things are unprofitable. And ho' all Men desire it', and have some Sense of it; yet do they not sufficiently know what it is: nor can they arrive at a thorough Knowledge of it, either by their own Meditation; or by any certain and invariable Information from others. For which Reason there are but very few Men', who arrive at Happiness in this World; and none who can obtain it in Perfection. All the Happiness we can possibly attain to here, amounts to no more, than the Enjoyment of a Good, which is only ' the Production of, and Emanation from that sovereign Good; or bears the nearest Resemblance to it: This Good, which may be compar'd to the other, as Light and ° Eyesight to the Sun, which may be truly said to resemble the Sun, but not to be the Sun itself; this Good, I say, is Knowledge and Truth; which * produce Holiness and Justice, by which we are, as far as 'tis possible, united, and made like, to = God: and also the Love " of that superlatively excellent Being; from whence results a Pleasure that is pure "b, virtuous, and without Remorse. If the Soul retires pure, unshilly'd by any Contagion of the Body; as not having willingly had any Commerce with it, but on the contrary, having, as it were, always shunn'd it, and been always recollected within itself, by continual Meditation; that is to say, by truly philosophizing, and effectually learning how to die; (for Philosophy is a Preparation for Death :) if the Soul, I say, retires in this Disposition, it goes to a Being like itself; to a Being divine, immortal, and replete with Wisdom; where it lives in the Enjoyment of marvellous Felicity; exempt from all its Errors, Ignorance, and Fears; from all those Passions, and Affections, which once tyranniz'd over it; and from all the other Evils attending humane Life: and leads a truly celestial Life with the Gods " to all Eternity "d. So that, besides the most glorious and most certain Rewards, that good Men receive in this World "e, both from God, and Governours of a State are no more, than fff Ministers of the Law; that wherever the Law bears Sway, and the Magistrates are its Slaves; there we see flourishing Towns, and the greatest Plenty of all those good Things, we expect from the Bounty of the Gods: but, on the other hand, where the Magistrate is Master, and the Law his Servant and Slave; there nothing can be expected or hop'd for, but Ruin and Desolation. He maintains, that those Laws sss, which tend only to the particular Interest of the Legislatour, and not to the publick Good, are not really Laws; but the Dictates of Faction, Tyranny, and Injustice.

 In a word, 'tis his fix'd Opinion bbb, that all Politicks, which tend to make the governing Part powerful at the Expence of the Subjects; and which make all the Virtue of a Sovereign to consist in securing, and increasing his own Power; leaving Justice, Patience, Goodness, Fidelity, and Humanity, as Virtues fit only for Slaves, to be practis'd by the Subjects; are no better than downright Tyranny: and that the End and Design of true Politicks, is to make the whole Body of the Subjects live sociably together, like Brethren, in the happiest Manner possible; without Poverty, without Riches; according to the Rules of Justice and Sanctity." Plato, having laid down these general Principles, enters upon particular Expedients; of which he gives us a considerable Number, for the regulating of the publick religious Worship, the Choice of Magistrates, Marriages Divorces, the Education of Children, Wills, Guardianships, War, and Peace; with the other principal Affairs of Civil Life. But "there is, in his Politicks, a very considerable Defect ccc;
 for in order to banish, out of the Government he is forming, all Manner of Proprity; he ordains Community, not only of Goods, but also of Wives and Children.

 -- This Community is so far from conducing to the End its Legislatour proposes; that on the contrary it effectually prevents the Attainment of it; and intirely frustrates the Design of his whole Establishment. For instead of uniting the Minds of his Subjects, it sets 'em at Variance; dissolving at once all the Relations, and most sacred Ties of Nature; and trampling under Foot all Law, Religion, Honesty, and Decency. -- Aristotle has strenuously oppos'd this Maxim, in his second Book of Politicks; and Plato himself abandons it in his sixth Book of Laws; where he restores to the Marriage
 State, all that he had before taken from it.
 Besides this, there is another Defect, concerning the Education of Women; whom he destins to the same Employments as the Men; and calls 'em to the Command of Armies, and the Government of States." Let us add, that, by his Manner of speaking of those, whom the Greeks call'd Barbarians ccc; he seems to have retain'd the false and presumptuous Ideas of that Nation; who, forgetting the natural Equality of all Men; pretended to have a Right, to treat all other Nations, as their Enemies by Nature, against whom they might securely exercise all Manner of Hostilities. Another very considerable Blemish, is his Pretence; that nothing ought ever to be chang'd in the Religion we find establish'd; and that but to think of any such Thing, was the highest Pitch of Extravagance and Folly. A Maxim which can have no other Effect, but to keep up Superstition and Ignorance in the World; and for ever exclude Truth.

S E C T. XXII.

ANTISTHENESE, another Scholar of Socrates, founded the Sect of the Cynicks; and had, amongst others, the famous Diogenes, for his Scholar. What an ingenious modern Writer has said of Diogenes, may be generally apply'd to the Philosophers of that Sect. "That they were of the Number of those extraordinary Persons, who run every Thing in to Extremes, without excepting even Reason itself; and who verify the Maxim, * That there is no great Wit without a Spice of Madness." They had learn'd from Socrates, that Morality was the most useful of all the Sciences; and what deserv'd our greatest Care and Application. From this most true Principle, they absurdly concluded; that Logick, Natural Philosophy, Geometry, Musick, the liberal Arts and Sciences; in a word, every Thing that did not immediately relate to the Science of Morality, was to be despis'd, and intirely thrown aside. The fundamental Maxim of their Doctrine was, to live in Conformity to the Rules of Virtue; which is sufficient to make Men happy. But the Consequences, they drew from thence, were in some Things too rigid; and in others too remiss. The Gods, said they, have need of nothing; this is their proper and natural Condition: Those then who stand in need but of a few Things, do the best resemble them. To procure to themselves then this happy Independancy; and to shew with what an utter Indifferency they look'd upon Riches, Pleasures, Honours, and the Approbation of Men; they pretended, that we ought intirely to renounce all the Conveniences of Life; and voluntarily reduce our selves to the most extreme Poverty: And they accordingly pursu'd this Maxim of theirs in their Manner of living: A long Beard, a Cloak, a Staff, and a Wallet, made up the whole of their Attire, Equipage, Goods and Chattels. Diogenes, for his Part, would have no other Habitation but a Tub; his Wooden Cup too; when he came to find he could drink out of the Hollow of his Hand, was thrown away. Antisthenes said, he had rather lose his Senses, than be sensible of Pleasure. They thought themselves entitied freely to make use of any Thing that came in their Way, without troubling themselves whether they had the Owners Consent, or not; which Practice of theirs they justify'd in this Manner. All Things, said they, belong to the Gods: But the Sages are Friends to the Gods, and all Things are common among Friends: Therefore all Things belong to the Sages. They laugh'd at all humane Establishments, believing themselves bound by no other Law, than the Law of Nature; of which they had very false and imperfect Notions. Upon this Principle Diogenes made no Scruple of coining false Money. He maintain'd that all Women ought to be in common; and that the Laws of Marriage were but a vain Subjection. According to the Opinion of these same Philosophers, there was nothing that a Man ought to be asham'd of: They publickly, and without Reserve, trod under Foot all the Laws of Decency, and Modesty. A learned German not long since, maintain'd; That they had never advanc'd this Paradox, had it not been to remove from themselves the Abuse of those, who, making the Whole of Virtue to consist in external Decency, did under this beautiful Vail conceal the most enormous Practices. "If this be so, (says an ingenious Journalist in his Remarks thereupon) their Design was good; but their Means stark nought: For, as a certain Lady, who did not always fol-

“ lew her own Maxim, has handsomely ex-“ press’d it,

C'est un méchant moyen d'enseigner la Vertu, Que de la faire voir par le portrait du Vice.

It is but a bad Way of teaching Virtue, to illustrate it by vicious Images. But let us see how they argu'd the Matter: ‘There is not, say they, any Harm in dining: Therefore there is none in dining in the Middle of the Market-Place. It is just and lawful to carefs one’s own Wife: Therefore ’tis just and lawful to carefs her before all the World. But, as Mr. Bayle has very well observ’d “, “ this is but the poor Fallacy, “ a dicto simpliciter ad dictum secundum quid. “ ’Tis as if one should say: It is good to drink “ Wine; therefore it is good to drink it in a “ Fever. These Men knew not, that many “ Actions are not good but in certain Circum- “ stances; so that the Absence of those Cir- “ cumstances may make that a bad Action, “ which otherwise might have been a very “ good one. To lend a Friend Money to pay his Creditors, is a very laudable Action: “ But to lend it him, to be drunk, or to game “ with, is a bad one. Some Actions are essen- “ tially bad, and can never become good, how- “ ever circumstantiated; but there are others, “ which are sometimes good; and sometimes “ bad, according to the Time, Place, and other “ Circumstances, in which they are perform’d. “ --- The Difficulty then may be reduc’d to “ this single Question: Whether a Man ought “ to be oblig’d, to perform conjugal Duty in “ publick View?” I am surpris’d to find this celebrated Author, whose Words I have borrow’d, making the Cynicks to triumph; as if Reason alone was not sufficient to demonstrate, that their Impudence is vicious, and contrary to the Maxims of the Law of Nature. “ It “ may be objected, says he, to Diogenes, that “ the Sense of Shame, in Cases of this Nature, “ is a natural Sentiment; so that to be without “ Shame on these Occasions, is to do Violence “ to Nature itself. But, to this he will an- “ swer; that was this Sense of Shame a real “ Dictate of Nature, the other Animals too, “ who so faithfully follow the Impulse of Na- “ ture, would seek for dark Holes and secret “ Recesses, to perform this Work of Genera- “ tion in: The contrary of which is most ap- “ parent. At least, this would be universally “ true as to Men, that they in such Cases al- “ ways seek out the darkest and most obscure “ Retreat; which is also * false. --- It will “ here be reply’d to Diogenes, that it is suffi- “ cient, that all civiliz’d Nations are subject to “ this Sense of Shame. --- To which he again “ will make this Return; that the Nations we “ are pleas’d to call barbarous, have much less “ deviated from the Rules of Nature; than “ those, who have, with their refining, and “ Subtily of Thought, so vastly multiply’d

“ the Modes and Forms of Decency and Ci“ vility; and in short, since the Law of Na“ ture is not subject to Prescription, it is both “ right and lawful, at all Times, and in all “ Places to return back to the Observation of “ it; without having any Regard to the arbi“ trary Yoke of Customs and Opinions, how“ ever, or wheresoever establish’d.” These are the Reasons which Mr. Bayle puts into the Mouth of Diogenes. I have no Design to engage myself in the Dispute; this being no proper Place for it. I shall content myself with shewing in a few Words, that all these puzzling Subtilties of Diogenes, are capable of a very easy and obvious Answer. First, he assumes a false Principle; to wit, that the Maxims of the Law of Nature are founded on an Instinct, common to all Animals; every Impulse whereof is irresistible: And yet Mr. Bayle has himself justly set at nought those moral Reflections, which are drawn from the Conduct of brute Beasts. Secondly, Neither is it necessary, that all Men should have innate Ideas of Virtue; and still less, that they should universally follow them in their Conduct. What I have already said, is sufficient, in my Opinion, to make Diogenes change his Battery. So that, thirdly, I shall now grant, as much as he pleases, that the Sense of Shame, with regard to Actions in themselves lawful or indifferent, is not a natural Sentiment: But I shall maintain, that humane Institution may have Force enough, to make such kind of Actions vicious and criminal; when attended with proper Circumstances. My Reason is, because Men are born to live together in Society, and consequently to be complaisant one towards another; not unreasonably affecting Sin-gularity, but avoiding to give Offence to any Person whatever; as far as it can be done without Breach of their Duty, or bringing on themselves some considerable Detriment: in a word, to have all the Respect imaginable for one another, and more especially with Relation to those Things, that are authoriz’d by an estab-lish’d Custom. Fourthly, There are three Sorts of Modes or Customs, in the Practice of which, Civility and Decency are made to consist: Some, which are exceeding troublesome, and without any Foundation: Others, which are but little or not at all inconvenient; and which may be dispens’d with, as well as the former; without giving Offence or Scandal to any one; or occasion to fear any ill Consequence thereupon:
And lastly such, the Violation whereof is liable to very great Inconveniences, and, on this Account, have the Character of Impudence affix’d to the Contempt of ’em. I conceive, that no Man can be oblig’d to subject himself to the first Sort, any farther than his own Interest, or Condition of Life do necessarily require it.

S E C T. XXIV.

ARISTOTLE^a, the moſt celebrated of all Plato's Scholars, founded the Sect of the Peripateticks. He was the firſt of the antient Philoſophers, who gave us a methodical System of Morality; at leaſt of thoſe, whoſe Writings we have left. Father Rapin^b, ground- ing himſelf upon a Paſſage of Cicero; inſiſts, that the Morality of Ariſtotle, has the ſame Foundations, the ſame Principles, and the ſame OEconomy, with that of Plato; and that, if the latter is leſs ſimple, and has more of Splendour and Ornament^c; the other will be found to be more ſolid, and better connect'd. But I know not how to reconcile this, with what he him- ſelf owns, in another Place; where he ſays^e, That Ariſtotle's Morality is too humane, and too much confin'd within the Bounds of this Life; that he ſcarce propoſes any other Happineſs to Man, than that of civil Life: Whereas the Morality of Plato, is more noble and ſublime; is a Preparative to a Life more pure and perfeſt. And indeed, Religion has no Share in the System of Ariſtotle^f. Beſides that 'tis not yet a ſettled Point^g, whether he believ'd the Immortality of the Soul; he makes no Men- tion of Providence but by the By; and in ſuch a Manner too, as ſhews him not to be thoroughly perſuaded of it. If the Gods, ſays he, at all concern themſelves with human Af- fairs, as 'tis probable they may; 'tis juſt and reaſonable to believe, that they are pleas'd with that in Man, which is the beſt, and the moſt like to themſelves; (and ſuch is the Underſtand- ing:) That they reward them, who love and cultivate this Part of themſelves; as taking care of that, which is dear to the Gods: and moreover, as leading good and honeſt Lives. This Philoſopher makes frequent Mention of a Plurality of Gods; and when he talks of Demons, which he does more ſparingly; he ſpeaks of 'em as intelligent Beings, united to the Stars. However, he acknowledges, as well as Plato, his Maſter; but one only Principle, which he calls the Immovable Spirit, which moves all Things. In his Sys- tem of Divinity, there are four principal Articles: The firſt is, that, tho' every Thing is not eternal, yet ſomething there muſt be that is incorruptible: otherwiſe all Things might return to their primitive Nothing. The ſecond is, that the Deity is an immate- rial Subſtance. The third, that his Under- ſtanding comprehends in itſelf every Thing that is intelligible. The fourth, that God be-

“ being * inmoveable, all his Action is included “ within his own Effence, (or is the same with “ it).-- So the Religion of Aristotle, may be re“ duce'd to thesetwo Heads: That there is a Deity, “ which includes all Nature; and that there are “ besides inferiour Gods'. As for all the rest, he “ look'd upon it as fabulous, and the additional “ Inventions of Men; fram'd and establish'd up“ on politrick Views. --- He * introduces Na“ ture, acting as an Instrument of the supreme “ Cause; not as a Machine set a-going by the “ necessary Effect of Mechanism; but as car“ rying on certain * Ends, tho' to her un“ known.” In his Ethicks, this Philosopher explains well enough the Principles of humane Actions; treats too of the particular Virtues, in a Manner much more distinct, extensive, and methodical; than his Master had done. But not enough to make us say, with one of his extravagant Admirers; that ° it is the most exact, regular, and compleat System of Morality in the World. The Jesuit too, whose Words these are, does himself confess elsewhere †, that there is something of Order want- ing in Aristotle's Ethicks; as well as in his Log-ick. The Reader will be able to form some Judgment thereupon, by the short Analysis, which I am now going to give him of that Treatise of Morality, which pass'es for Aristotle's Masterpiece; I mean that which he has entitled, by the Name of his Son, Nicomachus.
 After the Introduction, where our Philosopher says, amongst other Things; that † the Sovereign Good, which is the ultimate Scope of † Morality, and of all humane Actions; is no other than Beatitude, or Felicity: he shews, that this sovereign Good does not consist † either in Pleasures, or Honours, or Riches, or even in Virtue; or in † that Idea of Good, of which his Master Plato speaks; and which the Scholar seems not rightly to have understood. The Beatitude then in Question, according to his Definition is †; the Action of the rational Soul, perform'd according to the most excellent and most accomplish'd Virtue, in a perfect Life; that is to say, throughout the Course of a long Life:
 For, adds he, as one Swallow, or one Day, makes no Summer; so neither will one Day, or a short Space of Time suffice, to make a Man happy.
 He then goes on to * explain this Definition in a very verbose and confus'd Manner; and after some incident Questions, begins to † treat of Virtue in general; which he thus defines; * A laudable Habit, which perfects both the Subject in which it resides, and its proper Action, or Business. He † divides it into intellectual, and moral Virtue: The intellectual, which resides in the Understanding; and the moral, which has its Seat in the rational Appetite, or Will. The first † is acquir'd and corroborated chiefly by Study; so that it requires both Time and Experience: The other is produc'd by Custom, or Practice; from whence it has its Name. Here, according to Order, our Author should have enter'd upon his particular Account of intellectual Virtue; which, as Aris- totle himself owns, is the † principal Source of all moral Virtue: This Philosopher however has thought fit to begin with the latter. After having prov'd, that it is † neither a Passion, nor a Faculty of the Soul; he defines it to be:

 “ an Habit of Acting with Choice; which con“ sists in a certain Mediocrity with regard to us, “ determin'd by Reason, according to the Judg- “ ment of a prudent Man. So that, according to him, what constitutes the Essence of moral Virtue, is a Medium equally distant from two op- posite Vices; whereof the one errs through Ex“ cess; and the other through Deficiency. And this as well with regard to the Actions; as Passions. Let us stop a little at this Principle, which is the Basis of Aristotle's System, in his Explication of the Virtues. “ It is certain, “ there are some Virtues, whose Office it is “ to moderate the Passions: but this (as † Gr- “ tius observes) arises not from any essential “ Property belonging to all Sorts of Virtues;
 “ but 'tis because right Reason, whose Max“ ims Virtue constantly pursues; teaches us,
 “ that there are some Things wherein a Me- “ diocrity ought to be observ'd; whilst in o“ thers, it encourages us to push forward to “ the utmost of our Ability. We cannot wor“ ship God too much; for Superstition con“ sists not in exceeding the just Bounds of di“ vine Worship; but in the perverse Man“ ner of Worshipping. A Man cannot have “ too earnest a Desire for eternal Happiness;
 “ nor too great an Apprehension of eternal “ Misery; or exceed to a Fault in his Aversion “ to

“ to Sin “. --- One cannot, says a more modern Author ff, love his Country too well; tho’, to save that, he loseth his Life. A Man may be resolutely patient unto Death; so that it is not the Mediocrity of Resolution, which makes the Virtue; nor the Extremity which makes the Vice; but the one being with, the other without, Reason. Saving a Man’s self, or suffering, if with Reason, is Virtue: If without it, is either Softness; or Obstinacy. ’Tis true, Virtue stands, for the most Part, between two Vices; yet is it hereby no more defin’d, than an honest Man, by living between two Thieves. Therefore the Nature of Virtue is better express’d by Proportion; as it also is, elsewhere, by Aristotle himself. For they are both of them founded in Truth. And as in Proportion, there is the Equality of a double Ratio; so also in Virtue, viz. between the Acts, and the Objects of the Mind. For as Perception is to the End; so is Resolution to the Means. This Proportion is seen, even in penal Justice; whose Acts ought to be proportion’d to the Crimes punish’d. --- gg We need only consider what Aristotle says, with respect to Justice; and the Falsity of his Principle of Mediocrity, so universally taken, will be apparent. For not being able to find, in the Passions, and their subsequent Actions, a Pair of Vices in the two opposite Extremes of Excess and Deficiency; he was forc’d to seek for both in the very Things themselves; about which Justice is conversant. Which is blifting the Genus; a Fallacy which Aristotle justly censures in others. Besides, tho’ in some Circumstances, where a Man, either with regard to himself, or those who depend upon him, is oblig’d to make the most of what belongs to him; it may indeed be a Fault to take less than his Due: Yet there can be nothing in it contrary to Justice, properly so call’d; for that consists only in the not invading the Property of another. Much such another Mistake as this, is his denying, that Adultery and Murder, when the mere Effects of Lust and Anger; are, properly speaking, Acts of Injustice. And yet nothing is more certain, than that the very Essence of Injustice consists in violating the Rights of another. Nor is it of any Moment upon what Motive this is done; whether out of Avarice, Sensuality, sudden Passion, mistaken Pity, or Ambition; the usual Sources of all Manner of Injustice. Nay, ’tis the proper Business of Justice, to arm itself against all the Charms, and Efforts of the Passions; in order to prevent those Breaches they would otherwise make in the Laws, which are to support human Society. --- And again, ’tis hh in Consequence of this false Principle, that he found himself oblig’d to make Liberality and Fragility to be but one single Virtue; whereas they are in Fact two different Virtues: that he opposes two Extremes to Truth, which are not equally contrary to it; that is to say, Boasting, and false Modesty; and at length is reduc’d to the Necessity of imposing the Name of Vice upon Things, which either have no Existence at all; or have nothing in ’em, that is any way vicious; such as the Contempt of Pleasure and Preferment; and Insensibility of the Passion of Ang.r.” Let us now return to the Analysis, we have undertaken, of his System of Morality.

In explaining the distinguishing Character of the Habit, or Disposition, belonging to moral Virtue; I mean the Property of acting with Choice and Deliberation; Aristotle takes Occasion to treat of voluntary and involuntary Acts in general; and what he says on that Head, is for the most Part well enough digested. He after that enters upon a particular Account of the moral Virtues; and begins with Fortitude, which he defines to be: “ a Mediocrity between Fear and Boldness, but chiefly in regard to the first of these two Extremes: So that, according to him, a Man of Courage, is properly one, who is not afraid to expose himself to an honourable Death; or to any of the Dangers that lead to it. He had before, in the ⁱⁱ general Enumeration of all these Virtues he specifies in, oppos’d to this Virtue, on the one hand, Stupidity; or the Security of those, who are apprehensive of nothing; a Disposition, says he, which has no proper Appellation; and Audacity or Foolhardiness: And, on the other hand, Timorousness or Cowardice. Here he warns ^{mm}, against the confounding true Fortitude, not only with the senseless Fury of those, who kill themselves to be deliver’d from Poverty, or some Misery, which they are not able to bear; and which rather deserves the Name of Weakness and shameful Cowardice; but also with five other Things, which seem to have some Resemblance with this Virtue. Such is, First, Civil Valour, or that of Subjects; who expose themselves to Danger in View of the Honours and Rewards promis’d by the Laws: or to avoid the Penalties they threaten. Secondly, The forc’d Bravery of Soldiers, and all such as are compelled to meet Blows and Dangers, at the Command of superior Officers; who threaten to punish them if they ^{hh} Grotius ubi supra. Sect. 44. Grotius has in his Notes undertaken to refute this Criticism of his Author, upon the Notions of Aristotle. For if we examine well what he says we shall only find, that he is one of those, who are resolv’d, cost what it will, to defend every Thing the Ancients say; and supposing him in the right in some Things, yet Aristotle has at least given just Cause for this Criticism, by needlessly expressing himself in a Manner so obscure and confus’d.

they disobey their Orders. Thirdly, The Heat of Anger ⁸⁸; which, by a sudden Motion and Impulse, common both to Man and Beast, pushes on the offended Person to make an Assault upon those, from whom he has receiv'd Blows, or any other Injury. Fourthly, the Presumption of those, who confide in their own Strength; which they have often made Proof of with Success. Fifthly, The Security of those, who fear nothing, because they know no Danger.

Temperance is, according to Aristotle ⁸⁹; a Mediocrity in respect of the sensual Pleasures of Taste and Feeling; and in some measure, in respect of Grief too: in as much as the temperate Man grieves not to see himself depriv'd of Pleasures; whereas it causes great Trouble and Vexation to the Intemperate. He owns that an utter Insensibility as to Pleasure, which he makes one of the opposite Extremes of Temperance; is a ⁹⁰ Thing scarce ever known in fact; as being contrary to the very Frame, and Constitution of humane Nature. There are two Virtues which concern the Use of worldly Goods or Riches; that is to say, ⁹¹ of Money; and whatever else is capable of being priz'd by Money. The first, which he calls Liberality, has for its Object moderate Wealth; and it consists in preserving a just Medium ⁹², as to giving or receiving; but more especially as to giving. The Vices opposite to it, are Avarice, and Predigality. The other Virtue, which he calls Magnificence, regulates the Use of great Riches; but it consists only ⁹³ in giving, or expending. Its vicious Extremes, are, on the one hand, a sordid Parsimony; and on the other, a ridiculous and mistaken Profuseness.

Aristotle then particularizes a Couple of Virtues, which concern the just Medium to be observ'd, with relation to Honours; the one is ⁹⁴ Magnanimity, or Greatness of Soul; which consists in believing ourselves worthy of great Honours; and in pursuing 'em, when we really deserve 'em. He opposes to this Virtue, on the one hand, an unbounded Ambition, or Vain-gloriousness; which makes us believe ourselves worthy of, and aspire to, great Honours, although we do not in any wise deserve them: On the other hand, a Meanness of Soul, that hinders us from knowing our own Merit; and makes us deprive ourselves, either wholly, or in Part, of those Honours, whether great or small, of which we are worthy. Thus this Philosopher makes that Disposition of Mind a Vice, which is, if not the same with Christian Humility; at least a Thing in itself very innocent. He goes still farther; and maintains, that this ⁹⁵ Indifference for Honours, which he imagines to be more common, than excessive Ambition; is also worse, and more opposite to Magnanimity. The other ⁹⁶ Virtue, which has for its Object small Preferments or Honours; has ⁹⁷ no fix'd Appellation.

He afterwards treats of the Virtue, that preserves a just Medium, with respect to Anger; viz. ⁹⁸ Mansuetude or Mildness; which consists in being never angry, but where there is sufficient Cause; and with such only as deserve it; and in a Degree too proportionable to the Nature of the Fact; on proper Occasions only; and no longer than is reasonable. The vicious Extremes are, on the one hand, unreasonable Transport of Passion; on the other, an Indolence, that takes every Thing without the least Resentment. So that, according to our Philosopher ⁹⁹, the Contempt of Injuries is a Vice; and Revenge a Virtue: The first, the Property of a servile Spirit; the other, that of a noble and generous Soul. There are three Virtues, which take Place in Conversation, or in the common Business of Life. The first, which may be call'd Affability, or a reasonable Complaisance

Clois.* Tom. 3. p. 334, — that Mr. Grew, reading Aristotle too hastily, charges him with a Contradiction, from which 'tis no difficult Matter to clear the Philosopher. I doubt not but he had in View this Chapter, tho' he cites the Tenth, where is nothing to his Purpose, either in mine, or any of the former Editions. It appears by the Extract here given, that Aristotle is far from pretending, that Courage belongs to the Faculties, destitute of Reason. Neither is the other Passage more exactly cited: For Aristotle does not speak of Courage in particular, but of Virtue in general: Ἡ δὲ ἀρετὴ πάσης τέχνης ἀκριβοῦς καὶ ἀμείνων ἐστίν. declare *, in his Politicks; all those Nations, that have not enter'd into Treaties of Alliance, to be in a State of War with one another. And if we may take Plutarch's Word † for it, he advis'd Alexander to behave himself as a legal Prince towards the Greeks; and as a despotick Master towards the Barbarians; to regard the former, as his Friends, and Domesticks; but to treat the latter as so many Beasts or Vegetables. Aristotle after this pass'es on to intellectual Virtue, whose Function has for its Object  Truth: he divides it into five Kinds; to wit, Science, Art, Prudence, Intelligence, and Wisdom. By Science, he understands * demonstrative Knowledge; that is to say, a distinct Perception of necessary Consequences, flowing from Principles certainly true; or from Truths eternally such. Art, * is an habitual Knowledge of the Rules, which right Reason prescribes, for the performing of any Operation; or for the accomplishing any Work, which the Agent was at Liberty to do, or leave undone. Prudence, is the Habit of discerning  what is, or is not conducive towards the governing ourselves according to right Reason, in all the Affairs of Life. Intelligence , is the Knowledge of those first Principles, which want not Demonstration; because they are self-evident. Wisdom *, which is compounded of Intelligence, and Science; consists in the Knowledge of the Principles and Demonstrations of those Things, which are most excellent. I might here make several Observations on these Divisions; and the Method, in which Aristotle explains those Virtues, which he treats of under distinct Heads. But this will require a larger Discourse; they who will give themselves the Trouble to examine into the Matter, will easily discover the Defects of this Work. The Author proceeds to treat,  in a more particular Manner, of the Characteristicks, and several Functions of Prudence. After which he speaks of those moral Habits, which are imperfect; that is, of Dispositions  towards Virtue, or Vice: and to these he refers, on the one hand , Continency and Patience; on the other, Incontinency, and Impatience. On this Occasion he enters upon the Subject of * Pleasure, and Pain; which are the two grand Springs of the whole Movement of the Soul. From thence he pass'es on to Friendship ; which is, says he, either a Virtue , or a Concomitant of Virtue; and is besides, a very necessary Ingredient to the Happiness of Life. He defines it , a mutual Benevolence, whereby Persons desire the Prosperity and Happiness of each other; and on all Occasions give reciprocal Demonstrations thereof. It is founded, continues he, either † upon Profit, or Pleasure, or Virtue: but 'tis the last only that forms solid and perfect Friendship, which is only to be met with among good and virtuous Men; while Interest and Pleasure can at best but produce some slight Sort of Union amongst the Bad and Vicious. Aristotle 2 divides Friendship, as to its Subjects, into that which is between Equals, and that which subsists between those, whose Condition is unequal; or, where there is some sort of Superiority in the one over the other; as, between a Father, and a Son; the Aged, and the Young; a Man and his Wife; a Sovereign, and his Subjects, &c. He then proceeds to the Resolution of divers Questions relating to Friendship; and prescribes Rules for the better Cultivation and Improvement of it.

In the tenth and last Book, he returns 3 to his Subject of Pleasure and Pain; which he handles a little more at large, than he had done before. He concludes with that of Beatitude; which he divides into Contemplative, * and Practical. The latter, which he makes to consist in the Exercise of those moral Virtues, he had been treating of; is, in his Opinion, less excellent than the other: which he grounds, amongst other Reasons, upon this; that † Contemplation, as it is accompanied with a purer, and more solid Pleasure; so has it but little Need of the borrow'd Aid of external Things; which are much more requisite requisite for the obtaining the other sort of Beatitude: and for that the Practice of moral Virtues, does not at all comport with the Condition of the Gods; who yet enjoy perfect Felicity.

This is the Summary of his ten Books of Ethicks to Nicomachus. Aristotle does little more than repeat, and extend the same Principles, in his two Books of grand Morals; and in his seven Books address'd to Eudemius. His Politicks are founded upon very near the same Principles with those of Plato; but apparently more ample, methodical, accurate, and, in general, better proportion'd and adapted to the Constitution of humane Affairs: Not that they are compleat neither; for these too have their Defects. There are several Matters handled in a very superficial and confus'd Manner. This Philosopher, as well as his Master, seems to have had too much in View, the Grecian Forms of Government. Nor does he seem to have just Ideas of the natural Equality of Mankind; and by some of his Expressions, he gives Occasion to believe, that he thought some Men to be by Nature design'd for Slaves. He is against bringing up Children that happen to be born with any bodily Infirmity; and thinks, should the Laws forbid the exposing Infants; Women should be made to miscarry, when they find themselves with Child, after having had a certain Number of Children, answerable to what the Interest of the State requires; for, adds he, when we say that such a Thing is lawful, or unlawful, it ought to be understood with respect to Beings, that have Life and Sense. Thus this vast Genius of Nature, this Philosopher, for whom such Numbers have so great a Veneration; proves to be grossly ignorant of, and without any Scruple treads under Foot, one of the most evident Principles of the Law of Nature.

SECTION XXV.

ARCESILAS, one of the Successors of Plato, founded a new Sect, call'd the Second, or Middle Academy, to distinguish it from that of Plato. His Doctrine consisted in making a Doubt of every Thing; in arguing both for, and against all Manner of Questions, without ever coming to any Determination; and in maintaining, that there was no one Thing whatever that could be certainly known, or comprehended. So that, this Sort of Philosophy, apparently tends, to the utter Subversion of all the Precepts of Morality: For, whoever affirms, that there is nothing certain, and that all Things are incomprehensible; does at the same Time declare it to be uncertain, whether there be any such Things as Virtue and Vice. Cicero, who was an Academick, but a moderate one; has acknowledg'd the Justness of this “ Topicks for Declamation, and Raillery; he “ admitted such a Degree of Probability, as “ might serve to determine a prudent Man, “ which Side of the Question to take, in all “ such Matters as concern’d the Actions of “ Civil Life. He plainly saw, that without “ this, he could never answer the most odious “ Objections; nor clear his Principles from the “ scandalous Charge, of bringing Men to a “ most shameful State of Inaction, and Quiet“ tism. All Things consider’d, it amounts to “ the same Thing, to say, That there is not “ any such Thing as Truth; or, That there is,

 “ but that we have no Rule to distinguish it from “ Falshood.” Thus it is that Mr. Bayle is pleas’d to express himself. I shall not give myself the Trouble to examine; whether there ever has in Fact been such a Person in the World, as one seriously perswaded, that it is impossible for a Man certainly to distinguish, for Instance, whether he be asleep, or awake;
 or to discern a real Difference between Madness and sound Sense; or to be positively assur’d, that there is a Sun, Moon, Earth, Men, and Animals; that the Whole is greater than any of its Parts: And whether we may not say, with the Author of the Art of Thinking;¹ that the Pyrrhonists are a Set of Liars. But one Thing there is, which to me appears incontestable;
viz. that this Spirit of universal Scepticism, utterly destroys, and overturns the very Foundations of all Religion, and Morality. Nor do I know any Books more dangerous, for Men to read, who have not accustom’d themselves to an accurate Way of Thinking, and discerning between Truth and Falshood; than those, whose Authors make it their whole Business, to accumulate Difficulties against the most evident Truths; without ever resolving them, or preventing the fatal Impressions thereof, by a clear and rational Account, of what may and ought to be held as certain, notwithstanding such Difficulties; which, however considerable, yet can no way lessen, or hinder the Cogency of such direct Proofs, as are really convincing. ’Tis true, the ancient Scepticks did not indeed deny, but that a Man ought to conform to the Customs of his Country; to practise the Duties of Morality; and in all such Cases to be determin’d upon ² probable Grounds; with- out insisting upon, or expecting, absolute Certainty.
 But then, as Mr. Bayle himself owns, they ³ did, under Pretence of only opposing the Reasons which the Dogmatists urg’d for the Existence of a Deity; in Effect, undermine the Doctrine itself. Their Way was, first to promiſe, that as for themselves, they pretended not to be singular in any Thing; but that following the common Course of Life, they, without being admitted to any particular Sect, held that there were Gods, worshipp’d ’em, and ascrib’d to ’em a Providence; but for the rash Reasonings of the Dogmatists about these Matters, ’twas what they could not submit to: Whereupon they promiſ’d their Objections; which were usually such, as did, by disproving a divine Providence, at the same Time destroy the Existence of a Deity. As to Morality, there is no doubt to be made, but Pyrrho ⁴ taught, “ that the Honesty and Fur-“ pitude, Justice and Injustice of humane Ac“ tions, were intirely dependent upon humane “ Laws, and Custom.” Carneades ⁵, after having one Day made an admirable Harangue in Praise of Justice; did the very next shew, that it was only a mere empty Name; opposing it at the same Time more strenuously, than he had before defended it. Thus however excellent, those Maxims of Morality, which the Academick and Pyrrhonist give out for Precepts, may be in themselves; yet in their Mouths, they can amount to no more, than empty Sounds, unprofitable Rules, Propositions advanc’d without any Foundation, and in flat Contradiction to their own proper Principles; this too, notwithstanding their Conduct and Demeanour be otherwise never so regular, and unblameable. According to Carneades, the chief End, or supreme Good, of Man, consisted in the Enjoyment of, what he call’d ⁶; the natural Principles; that is to say, in satisfying the Desires of Nature; without giving one’s self any Trouble or Concern about Honour and Virtue. The Pyrrhonists propos’d to themselves, by Means of their ⁷ Suspension of Af- sent; to keep the Mind in such a State of Tranquillity, as should effectually prevent their receiving any Uneasiness, on account of establish’d Opinions; and likewise in such a State of absolute Indifferency for all Manner of Things, as should keep them from setting their Hearts too much upon any one Object; or troubling themselves too much about any Contingencies whatsoever.

S E C T. XXVI.

EPICURUS*, Cotemporary of Arcefilas, and chief of the Sect that bears his own Name;^b admitted these two Principles of the ancient Atheists: "That there is no other Substance besides ^c Body; and, that Body hath nothing else belonging to it but ^d Magnitude, Figure, Site, and Motion, without Qualities.---" However he profess'd the Belief of a vast Number of Gods.--- He plac'd them in certain Spaces which he call'd ^e Intermundane; which he believ'd to be void, and to lie between the several Worlds, of which, according to him, the Universe was made up. He held ^f, that the Sovereign Felicity of the Gods, consisted in having nothing to do; and in being free from all Manner of Care.--- And tho' they did not, in his Opinion, any way intermeddle in the Concerns of Mankind; and tho' Men had nothing either to hope or fear from them; yet, said he, they ought to have some Worship paid 'em, on Account of the Excellency of their ^g Nature, and Felicity. There needs not much Penetration to discern, that all this Divinity of Epicurus was but mere Chimera; since 'twas directly contrary to the Principles he himself had laid down; by which he acknowledg'd no other Beings, but such as were made of Atoms; and consequently corruptible. But Gods he gave out there were^h; out of pure Policy, and to avoid the Odium which an avow'd and open Atheism would otherwise have drawn upon him. For which Reason Pofidonius, the Stoick, said ⁱ, that Epicurus believ'd no Gods at all; and that it was to avoid Odium, that he said what he did of the immortal Gods.--- He introduces,

"says ^k Cicero, by way of Ridicule, transparent Gods; Gods which might be dissipate with a Puff of Wind; dwelling as it were between two Worlds, for Fear of being some Time or other buried in their Ruins. But let us suppose Epicurus to have been never so ferocious in these Matters; yet, with ^l Gassendus's good Leave, he will still nevertheless be an Atheist for all that; as long as it shall appear, that he held the World to be form'd without the Disposition of any^m Agent; or the Concurrence of a blessed and immortal Being; and that the Universe, with all the intelligent Beings therein, ow'd their Original to the fortuitous Concourse of Atoms.---" The God of this Philosopher is, in his System, like a Piece of Building without the Clear; and which may as well be suppos'd not to be at all, without making any Alteration therein." Yet, with all these his impious Principles; Epicurus has nevertheless given us a System of Morality, in many Things, just and beautiful enough. "His Doctrineⁿ touching the Sovereign Good, or Happiness, was very liable to be misunderstood, which prov'd of ill Consequence; and in effect brought an ill Character upon his Sect: But the Doctrine was in the main a very rational Doctrine; nor can it be denied, taking the Word Happiness in the Sense he us'd it; but that the true Happiness of Man consists in Pleasure.---" Almost all the ancient Philosophers, who have treated of humane Happiness, fix'd their Notions upon something external; which is what has occasion'd amongst 'em so great^o a Variety of Opinions: Some placing the true Happiness of Man in Riches, some ^q See Augustin. de Civ. Dei. Lib. 19, cap. 1. — Tom. 5, col. 1137, C. — & c. Here Mr. Baile cautions us not to believe what so many tell us, viz. that, according to Varro, there were 288 different Opinions about the Nature of the Sovereign Good. 'Tis only a Piece of Pleasantry of that learned Roman.

“ some in Science, some in Honours, and others “ in Virtue, &c. It is plain, they fix'd the “ Idea of Happiness to --- that, which they “ thought capable of producing in us a State “ of Felicity; without ever telling us what that “ State of the Soul is, in which its Happiness “ consists. Epicurus has not run into this Mistake. --- He said, that Man's Happiness consists in his being at Ease, and under the actual Sensation of Pleasure; in a word, in Contentedness: This no way proves, the Placing of the Happiness of Man in good Cheer and Venery; for these can at most be but efficient Causes; which make no Part of the Matter in Question. When an Enquiry into the efficient Causes of Contentedness, comes to be the Matter in hand; you will then find the very best of 'em mark'd out to you: On the one hand, you will find such Objects as are best fitted for the Preservation of a good Constitution; on the other, such Occupations as are most proper to prevent Uneasiness of Mind: You will then find preferib'd to you Sobriety, Temperance, and a resolute Opposition to all those tumultuous and unruly Passions, which out the Soul of its State of Happiness; that is to say, of that sweet Composure and Acquiescence it has in its present Condition. These were the Pleasures in which Epicurus made the Happiness of the Soul to consist. An Outcry however was rais'd against the Word Pleasure; these who had been before debauch'd and corrupted, made an ill Use of it; and the Enemies of the Sect took Advantage of all this; thus the Name of an Epicurean became extremely odious. All which is nevertheless merely accidental; and may as well betay any other Doctrine.” Thus it is that Mr. Bayle justifies the fundamental Principle of Epicurus. It must however be acknowledg'd, that, (tho' Epicurus in the main might reason well, in keeping to the general Idea of Tranquility, or Contentment of Mind,) yet he neither taught true Happiness; which is the End of Morality, and the Object of all humane Desire; nor solid Virtue: And that 'twas even impossible for him, in pursuance of his own Principles, so to do. It is certain, that the Soul of Man thirsts after perfect Happiness; which, 'tis evident, beyond Contradiction, can never be attain'd to in such a Life, as this we Mortals lead on Earth*. All the Happiness we can reasonably aspire to here below, is an agreeable Tranquility of Mind; produc'd by the View of that perfectly happy State, which we hope to enjoy after this Life ended. “ If Men (I make use of Mr. Lock's own Words) in this Life only have Hope; if in this Life they can only enjoy; 'tis not strange, nor unreasonable, that they should seek their Happiness by avoiding all Things that dis“ ease them here; and by pursuing all that de“ light them; wherein it will be no Wonder “ to find Variety and Difference. For if there “ be no Prospect beyond the Grave, the Infe“ rence is certainly right, Let us eat and drink,

 “ let us enjoy what we delight in, for we know
 “ we shall die.” Thus most of the antient Philosophers, not grounding their Morality upon the Supposition of the Immortality of the Soul; and looking for their Summum Bonum in this Life; did vainly enquire, “ Whether it “ consisted in Riches, or bodily Delights, or “ Virtue, or Contemplation? And they might “ have as reasonably disputed, whether the best “ Relish were to be found in Apples, Plumbs, “ or Nuts; and have divided themselves into “ Sects upon it. For as pleasant Tastes de“ pend not on the Things themselves, but their “ Agreeableness to this or that particular Pa“ late, wherein there is great Variety; so the “ greatest Happiness consists in the having those “ Things which produce the greatest Pleasure;
 “ and in the Absence of those which cause any “ Disturbance, or any Pain. Now, these to dif“ ferent Men, are very different Things” Since therefore Ep. curus expressly maintain'd, that the Soul dies with the Body; and made this too his Reason he us'd, to “ recover Men from the Fear of Death; he could not promise more than a Happiness of short Duration; and his Morality must in the Nature of it be the Concern of this Life only. In this he no way contradicts his Principles; and Mr. Le Clerc has very justly observ'd, that his * Morality has two enormous Defects; Defects too, which make the laudable Precepts it contains, of little or no Effect; whatever may be said by those, who have undertaken his Apology, to the contrary. The first is, that its End propos'd being only the Attainment of an easy and quiet Life; it can engage us to pursue its Maxims upon no other View, but the present Advantage, that accrues from that Manner of Life it prescribes. We ought not to be covetous, for Example, according to Epicurus, and Hirace, (a Sectary of his,) because Covetousness cannot make us happy in this Life; as the latter has in many Places made appear. This being then an establish'd Principle, put the Case a Man should find himself under a Government, where Vice was rewarded, and Virtue punish'd; what must he do? Suppose a Man liv'd in Japan, and that a considerable Party there treated the Superstitions of that Country, as ridiculous, and pernicious to Society; and that himself also was of their Opinion: If the Emperour of Japan should raise a Persecution against all of that Persuasion, ought he too with the rest voluntarily to suffer Persecution? No certainly, according to Epicurus; for, in his

* See Diog. Laert. Lib. 10, Sect. 127. — 128, — & seq. Et Ed. Colon. p. 790. & seq. Notwithstanding this favourable Interpretation of the fundamental Principle of the Morals of Epicurus; this Principle is nevertheless dangerous to Civil Society. “Opinion, Virtue is of no Estimation but for the present Advantage it brings with it. As to the Supposition, that Vice may be rewarded, and Virtue punish’d; ’tis by no Means the Supposition of an Impossibility; ’tis what is actually practis’d throughout the greatest Part of the World. Thus all the Arguments drawn from the present Advantage, which is found in the Exercise of Virtue, are very weak, especially if they stand alone; and it is highly probable, that had the Athenians offer’d to have treated Epicurus, as they did Socrates; the first would not have thought it an Honour to die a Year for his Philosophy, as the second did; who, when they would have hinder’d him from Philosophizing, answer’d, That it was better to obey God, than Man.” We have even at this Day some of the Maxims of Epicurus; among which there is one, wherein that Philosopher expressly says, That ’ Injustice is not evil in itself; and if we ought to refrain from doing wrong to another, and from violating the Laws which forbid it; ’tis purely thro’ Fear of being discover’d, and expos’d to Punishment; for, adds he, tho’ we may have escap’d a thou- sand Times, we cannot always be assur’d, that what has been committed in the darkeſt Corners, and with the greateſt Privacy, will not, before we die, come to the Knowledge of the Miſters of Juſtice. “ The second Defect in the Morality of Epicurus is, that, in what Manner soever that Philosopher liv’d towards the latter End of his Days; he did not prohibit certain Pleasures, which most certainly do disturb humane Society; and would cause infinite Disorders, if all Men were of his Opinion. Horace may, in Mr. Dacier’s Judgment, be esteem’d a “ rigid Epicurean; and yet his Writings are full of the Marks of a Licentiousness, which one would not care to call by its true Name: And if he exclaim’d against Adultery, for Example, as he does in his second Satyr; ’twas only on account of the Danger there was “ in being surpriz’d with a married Woman. This is likewise conformable to the Maxims of his Master; who was against the Enjoyment of that Pleasure “, which brought with it more Harm than Good; as he also would have deprecis’d the Virtue, which would have brought upon him too much Trouble and Vexation.”

ZENO the Cypriot, of Citium, Cotemporary of Epicurus, founded the Sect of the Stoicks; a Sect directly opposite to that of the Disciples of Epicurus, his Cotemporary *. The Stoicks imagin’d the World to be an Animal; whereof the supreme God, they said, was the Soul, or the active Principle; and Matter, the passive Principle. That eternal intelligent Being, which produc’d all Things, and directs them by his Providence; was, in their Opinion, “ nothing but a fiery Substance; or, as it were, an operative mechanic Fire; whereof some Parts animated Plants, Beasts, and Men; whilst

“ other Parts, more subtil and elastic, made the Gods in the Sun, and Stars.” They paid religious Worship to these inferior Deities; but they believ’d, that the Gods themselves, the supreme God only excepted, would one Day be destroy’d by Fire, with the rest of the World; which, in their Opinion, was to undergo several Conflagrations; each whereof would happen after a certain Period or Revolution of a fix’d Number of Years. They held, that the Souls of Men were, after Death, reunited to that subtil Air, from whence they had been taken; but they believ’d ‘em em 'corruptible; and made 'em to subsist no longer, at farthest, than the Conflagration of the World; nay, some of 'em did not allow even this Privilege, but to the Souls of their Sages. They * acknowledg'd an inevitable Destiny or Fate; to which they subjected the Gods themselves, without excepting even their supreme Deity. "Nor has there ever been, "amongst all the Philosophers', yet extant, "any who have spoke in stronger Terms of the "fatal Necessity of Things; or who have more "magnify'd " the Liberty of Man, than the "Stoicks." These Principles, I must own, are monstrous; and the several Philosophers of that Sect have, each in particular, added thereto some new Absurdities. However, bating some certain Things, nothing can be more beautiful than their Morality, consider'd in itself; which, by only correcting a few of its Maxims, with some small Difference in their Explanation; might be easily reduc'd to a System of Morality, very near approaching to that of the Gospel; to that, I say, which alone is entirely conformable to the Dictates of right Reason.

The great and fundamental Principle of the Morality of the Stoicks is, *That we ought to live * conformable to Nature*; and that the sovereign Good of Man consists in Virtue; which is nothing else, according to them, but ° a Life conformable to Nature; for, say they, Nature leads us to Virtue. By this Nature °, some of 'em meant directly the Constitution of the humane Nature; or that Light of Reason, by the Help of which we discern what is truly suitable to our State and Condition; others meant, universal Reason, or the Will of God; which forbids us every Thing, that is contrary to our natural Constitution; and prescribes to us every Thing that is agreeable thereto; and others again, meant both these join'd together. They said, That a Justice, as such, is not from the Institution of Men, but from its own Nature; as is also Law and right Reason; and that the Difference of Opinions, that prevail among Philosophers, ought not to discourage us from the Study of Philosophy; for, if that Reason was of Weight enough to divert or dissuade us from any Thing, we ought to leave the World; there being nothing in it, about which Men are not divided in their Opinions. They consider'd the World as ° a Kingdom, of which God is the King; and as a Total, to the Interest and Utility of which, every Person, as a Part thereof, ought to concur, and direct all his Actions; without ever preferring his own private Advantage to the common Concern. They believ'd, they were ° born, not every one for himself alone; but for the Good of humane Society: this was the distinguishing ° Character of their Sect; this the Idea they ° gave of the Nature of Justice and Honesty. There was never any Sect of Philosophers, who so well understood, and so strongly press'd those indispenfable Duties of Humanity, which Men, precisely consider'd as such, now lost, call'd Chrystippus; where he says, that what was born of the Earth, returns to Earth; and that which had an atherial Origin, returns to the Celestial Poles. But, as Mr. Le Clerc has very well observ'd, Eibl. Choj. Tom. 6, p. 244.— Et seq. that Poet had other Ideas, than those of the Stoicks; and believ'd the Immortality of the Soul. Euripides repeated the first Words of those Verses, in another Tragedy, which is now lost; whereof Cicero has given us a Translation; Reddenda est terra terra.— Trif. Quæst. Lib. 3, Cap. 25.— Edit. Græc. and not Trif. Quæst. Lib. 2, as Mr. Bayle has cited it, in his Dict. Art. Amphiarvus, p. 208, Col. 2.— Rem. (K.) There is another Fault too, in this Article, but chargeable upon the Printers of the Edition, he made use of. He criticises, p. 208, col. 2.— upon Anax. as if, in turning the Passage of Euripides, reported by Plutarch, (Conol. ad Apoll. p. 110.— 111.— Ed. Wich. Et 192.— Steph.) he had render'd the Words, 'Ο παρὰ τῷ ποιητῇ Ἀνακρέωνος, by Amphiarvus en un poëte: but in the fine Edition of Genev. in Folio, 1604, by J. Stoer, I saw it was, as it should be, en un poëte, p. 251, A.— And 'tis likely that the other correct Editions read so too. 'Tis so Edit. ibid. An. 1627, p. 251, A.—

“ the ⁱⁱⁱ Soul our first and principal Care; “ to honour it, as the most excellent Part of us; “ to have nothing so much at Heart ^{kkk}, or in “ so great Esteem, as Virtue and Honesty; ne- “ ver to suffer our selves to swerve from our Du- “ ty ^{lll}, as far as we can attain to the Know- “ ledge of it; either through the Desire of Life, “ much less of any other Thing; ^{mm} or through “ the Fear and Dread of Torments or Death, “ much less of any Damage or Loss whatsoever.”

This is the beautiful Side of the Morality of the Stoicks; and it must be further acknow- ledg'd, to their Praise, that they stopp'd not at general Notions; and indeterminate unapply'd Maxims: But on the contrary, to judge of the Matter only by those few Writings, we have left us by the three Persons above mention'd, with the Fragments of others, and the Writings of those who have reason'd upon their Principles; it may be truly affirm'd, that of all the Philosophers of Antiquity, they are the Men, who have gone the farthest into the Particulars of Morality; and have the best apply'd its general Precepts to the several States of Life; and the different Exigences of humane Affairs. Aristo of Chios, who thought it sufficient to estab- lish ⁿⁿ in general the Nature of true Wis- dom; and to shew wherein the sovereign Hap- piness of Man consists; without entering into any particular Explication of the Duties be- tween Husbands and Wives; Parents and Chil- dren; Masters and Servants: This Philosopher, I say, who departed a little from the Sentiments of his Master Zeno, form'd indeed a kind of Sect, but it did not last long: And Seneca has prov'd against him, that particular Precepts, as well as Maxims, or moral Reflections couch'd in short lively Sentences; are extremely useful. Aristo said, it was the proper Business of Peda- gogues, and ^{ooo} Nurses, and therefore ought to be left wholly to them. A fine Reason indeed, answers ^{ppp} Seneca: as if the Sage was not the Pedagogue of Mankind! “ Chryssippus even con- “ descend'd to give short ^{qqq} Precepts about “ the Education of Children: which as it is a “ Thing in itself of no small Importance to “ Mankind; so this Condescension of Chryssippus “ cannot but deserve Commendation.” But ha- ving done Justice to the Stoicks, as to what we find laudable; let us now see what there is to be found in that Sect which may be justly es- teem'd blameable. I have nothing to say, as to the Vanity, Hypocrisy, and bad Lives, that several particular Philosophers of that Sect have been charg'd with; These are personal Faults, and extend not to their Doctrines: and I shall here, as I do every where else, only consider the Opinions, as they are purely and simply in themselves. The Idea then, which the Stoicks form'd of Virtue, how magnificent soever it may at first appear; is, in some Respects, if rightly consider'd, not altogether just, or com- plet; not intirely founded on its true Prin- ciples; nor exempt from Errour. Virtue, say they, is the sovereign Good; nor is there any other Good besides Virtue: The Sage is still ^{rrr} happy, tho' in the Midst of the most cruel Torments. But, besides that Virtue is only the “ efficient Cause of Happiness, and not Hap- piness itself; they laid no Foundation, in the Hopes of another Life, for the Recompence and Consolation of Virtue: nor indeed could they, as not properly acknowledging the Im- mortality of the Soul; or at least ^{sss} speaking of it but in a very confus'd and ambiguous Manner. Inasmuch, that Brutus, who was a Stoick, seems ^{ttt} not to have been so much out, as some would imagine, in those dying Words of his ^{uuu}: Wretched Virtue, how have I been deluded in thy Service! I thought thee a real Good, and as such have I always devoted myself to thee; but thou, alas! art only an empty Name, a Phantom, an abject Slave expos'd to the Insults of Fortune. And in truth, if the Idea of Rewards and Punishments in another Life, be not join'd to the Practice of Virtue; “ both “ Virtue and Innocence may be rank'd ^{vvv} in “ the Number of those Things, on which So- lon has pronounc'd his definitive Sentence: “ Vanity of Vanities, all is Vanity! To rely “ upon Innocence, would be to lean on a bro- “ ken Reed; which will not fail to pierce the “ Hand, that rests upon it. God, as he is “ the Disposer of Events, the grand Almoner “ both of good and bad Success; has here on “ Earth, made Virtue and Innocence no less “ subject to his general Laws; than Health and “ Riches.” Besides, to say that a Man who suffers for a good Cause, is really happy, altho' he hath no Reward to expect after Death; is to advance a Proposition equally contrary to right Reason, and to every Sentiment of Nature. But this is not the only Thing on which the Stoicks form'd extravagant and chimerical Ideas. Every one knows, what ^{zzz} a Jest the World has made of their Sage;

Sage; ¹ whom, on the one hand, they deed of even the most innocent and moderate Passions, nay, in a Manner, of Humanity itself; whilst on the other, they made him to vie Happiness with the very Gods themselves. They held all Sins to be ² equal.
 They said, that, Virtue excepted, all other Things were indifferent ³; that is to say, neither good nor bad; but of these indifferent
Things, some were eligible, and others rejectable.
Mr. and Madam Dacier have undertaken the Apology of the true Stoicks, on all these Heads. ⁴ “If these Philosophers, say they,
 “have mix’d something of Austerity with the “Sentiments of their Master Socrates; ’twas
 “not so much the Effect of a Savage and mo“rose Disposition; but rather an Expedient, “which Prudence suggested to them: for be“ing well acquainted with the natural Imbe-“cillity, and Supineness of Mankind; they “have thought fit, in prescribing Rules of “Duty, to press them to a greater Degree of “Perfection, than they are capable of; that so
 “by exerting their utmost Endeavours to come “up to their Precepts, they might at least “come to fix in a State of Mediocrity; as “Trees which stand bent one Way are set “right by a contrary Flexure. Thus when “Zeno, for Example, said, that all Crimes were “equal; his Intent was to reclaim Men from “an unhappy Opinion, which they are but too “apt to give into; that provided they keep “clear of Crimes of the first Magnitude, they “are not oblig’d to be so much upon their “Guard against the lesser or more venal Trans“gressions; now his Design was to persuade ’em, “that the least Sin, if neglected, becomes in“curable; and that in the Eye of God, who is “the very Essence of Purity; there can be no“thing found in us, that is sinful, but what de“serves Death; unless we disarm his Justice by “a due Atonement and Repentance: But then “comes a Chrysisippus, who grossly mistaking this “Precept; maintains, that there is no Diffe“rence between the Stealing of Cabbages out “of a Garden, and the committing of Sacri“lege; between the cutting one’s Father’s “Throat, and the killing of a Capon; which “two Actions he will have to deserve one and “the same Punishment: This indeed is so far “from restraining; that it rather encourages “and prompts Men to the Commission of the “greatest Enormities. When Zeno said, that “the Sage ought to be void of Compassion;
 “his Aim was to shew, that the Sage does not “confine his Beneficence to those Succours alone, “which Pity and Compassion extort from him;

“but thinks himself oblig’d to aid and assist “his Neighbour, though he be under no such “Emotion: Though a Chrysisippus shall take “Occasion from hence, to break asunder all “the Bands of Society; and trample under “Foot that merciful Disposition, which is one “of the most essential Characters of the Deity.
 “When Zeno said, that the Sage relies on him“self alone for all Things; he only meant to “shew, that our true and real Happiness could “not depend on the Actions of other Men;
 “and to encounter the supine Laziness of those,
 “who, on Pretence of committing themselves
 “to Providence, expect every Thing imme“diately from God; without ever seeking to “obtain his Favour, by their own honest En“deavours and Industry. Besides, as he taught, “that the Soul was a Part of God, nay, God “himself; so this Precept, that Men ought to “rely on themselves for all Things, was in Ef“fect the same as to say; that we ought in all “Things to rely on the Providence of God,
 “that governs us. But then comes a Disciple “of his, full of Ignorance and Pride; and in“tensely perverts this Precept, by drawing from “it this pernicious Consequence; That the “Sage is above even God himself; and is, in“dependently of that sovereign Being who “created him, the sole Author of his own Hap“piness. Of almost the same Nature are all “those other Passages, which have at any Time “been made Use of to bring the Doctrine of “the Stoicks under Odium and Discredit.” Not to examine, whether these Expositions are as well grounded, ⁵ as they are ingenious; or whether they do not rather favour of a Commentator, extremely prepossess’d in Favour of his Author, and in general of all Antiquity; and whether too they are not worthy of those,
 who, to enhance the Merit of the antients, and keep up their Characters; make ’em to be as enlighten’d as the Prophets and Apostles; find out very great Beauties in the most insipid and ridiculous Passages; and wreat the Sense of the clearest Expressions, even to the expounding figuratively the Metempsychosis of Pythagoras: I shall content my self with taking Notice of two Things, which to me seem incontestable:
 The one is, that rigid and over-strain’d
 Maxims are not at all proper to inspire true Notions of Virtue; and so far is the demanding more of Men than their just Duties, from being the proper Method to induce ’em to a due Performance thereof; that Experience plainly shews us, that to require too much, is the ready Way to obtain nothing at all. The other is, that ’tis the Part of a true Philosopher to reject, especially

pecially when he is treating of Morality, all such Maxims as are ambiguous, or subject to Misconstruction. So that, even supposing that these Maxims in Question are capable of the Mitigations contended for by those, who are so bent upon justifying the Antients, what 'ere it cost; yet we cannot fairly avoid censuring the Paradoxes of the Stoicks; together with their vain Subtleties, ⁶ their concise and rough Stile, their Affectation of new coin'd Words, their frequent Logomachies, the Contradictions ⁷ charg'd upon 'em, and their Opinion as to obscene Terms; which ⁸ they insist, may be made use of without any Manner of Scruple. Nor is this last Particular to be much wonder'd at in Men who contend, as the Stoicks do, that all Women ⁹ ought to be had in common among the Sages. There were also some among them, who maintain'd, that ¹⁰ the Cynicks Way of living was the shortest Cut to Virtue. Chrysisippus ¹¹ taught, that there was no Harm in committing Lucess with one's Father, Mother, Son, Daughter, ¹² Brother, or Sister; or in feeding upon human Carcasses. What the ¹³ Stoicks said about the Love of beautiful Boys; is at least liable to very odd Constructions. In fine, these Philosophers believ'd, that their Sage might absolutely dispose ¹⁴ of his own Life, and put an End to it whenever he thought fit; and this Opinion, as false and dangerous as it is, was, as is universally agreed, the Sense of the whole Sect.

S E C T. XXVIII.

AFTER Epicurus and Zeno, we find not, among the succeeding Philosophers, any, who set up new Schemes of Morality. Each Man betook himself to that Sect, where he found what most suited his own private Sentiments. The Romans, who had their Philosophy, as well as the rest of the Sciences, from the Greeks; took this Course. In the Reign of Augustus, a Philosopher of Alexandria, called Potamo, introduc'd a Manner of Philosophizing, which they called Eclectic; because it consisted in collecting from all the Tenents of the preceding Philosophers, such as appear'd most reasonable; out of which they form'd, each Man his own System of Philosophy. Cicero, who, as I said before, was a moderate Academick; does for the most Part pursue this Method in his Book of Offices; ^a where he is sometimes a Stoick; sometimes a Peripatetick. That excellent Work, so well known to the World, is without Dispute the best Treatise of Morality, that all Antiquity has furnish'd us with; the most regular, the most methodical; and what does the nearest of any come up to a full and exact System of Morality. I say, what comes the nearest: For he would be much out, who should imagine it to contain a Compleat Body of Morality; such as descends to the utmost Degree of Particularity; and where every Thing is digested into the very best Order, and Method possible. Many Things are there wanting, which naturally come within the Plan of that Science; and, for the Generality, the Topicks he there goes upon, are but very superficially handled; as might be easily made appear. We there also find some ^a Decisions too

'Tis thus we ought to read that Passage, partly according to the Conjecture of Gravus the Father, and Gravus; and partly according to Mr. Le Clerc; See Ars Critica, Part. 3, Sect. 1, Cap. 16, Num. 22, Tom. 2, p. 286 — Edit. 2d.

too rigid; or such as plainly shew, that Cicero was not thoroughly acquainted with the true Principles, on which the Resolution of some certain Cases depends. 'Tis great Pity his Treatise of Government is lost; of which the few Fragments remaining give us a very noble Idea. His Discourse of Laws, which we yet have, though imperfect; contains many excellent Things. Cicero there particularly applies himself to prove at large, that there is a natural Law, independent of any humane Institution; and which derives its obligatory Force from the Will of God. This he proves to be the Foundation of all just and reasonable Laws. He shews the Usefulness of Religion in civil Societies. He follows the grand Principle of the Stoicks, that Man is born for Society; and from thence deduces all the reciprocal Duties of Mankind. And though he acknowledges it necessary to admit all this, for one who intends to build upon well-chosen and well-connected Principles; yet he expects not that all the World will approve of them; he promises himself only the Approbation of the antient Platonists; and that of the Peripateticks and Stoicks. As to the Epicureans, he is under no Concern about them; they professedly retir'd from all political Affairs; he therefore leaves them to philosophize, in this their Retreat, as they should think fit: But for Arcefilas and Carneades, he asks a Quarter of them; and fears, that, should they come to point their Batteries upon him, they would soon make practicable Breaches in this his suppos'd impregnable Fortress: He perceives not in himself Courage enough to repulse 'em, with therefore not to be expos'd to their Indignation; is desirous to appease 'em, and prevent all Acts of Hostility." He has been, and not without Reason too, charg'd with not adhering stedfastly enough to his Principles; and with being too much an occasional Reasoner. I cannot forbear adding here Montagne's Opinion of this great Orator's Way of Writing. As to Cicero, says he, "Those of his Works that are most useful to my Design, are his philosophical Tracts; particularly the moral: But, to speak my Mind freely --- his particular Way of Writing, with all others of the same kind, is to me very tedious. For his Prefaces, Definitions, Discussions, and Etymologies take up the greatest Part of his Work. Whatever there is of Life and

Marrow, 'tis smother'd and lost in the Tediousness of the Preparation. When I have spent an Hour in reading him, --- and come to recollect what I have thence extracted of Juice and Substance; for the most Part I find nothing but Wind: For he is not yet come to his main Arguments; or yet ready to produce the strong Reasons, which are to do the Business, and clear the Point, I want to be resolv'd in. To me, who only desire to become more discreet, not more learned or eloquent; these Logical and Aristotelian Rules and Ordinances are of no Use at all. I would have a Man begin first with that, which is of the last Consequence. I know well enough what Death and Pleasure are, there is no Occasion to stand anatomizing of 'em to me. I look for good and solid Reasons at first Dash; such as will instruct me how to stand the Shock of 'em, and make a brave Defence. Your grammatical Niceties, fine-spun Argumentation, and delicate Turns, are nothing to this Purpose: I am for Discourses that give their first Charge into the very Heart of Doubt; his only heat about the Bush. They are proper enough for the Schools, the Bar, or the Pulpit; where we have Leisure to nod, and may awake a Quarter of an Hour after, Time enough to find again the Thread of the Discourse. It is very requisite to talk after this Manner to Judges, we have a Mind to gain, right or wrong, to favour our Cause; to Children and common People, where every Thing is to be urg'd, in order to see what will take with them. I want not any one to make it his Business to stir up my Attention, and cry out to me fifty Times, O yes, as our Clergy, and Heralds do. The Romans in their religious Exercises began with, Hoc age: as we in ours do with, Sursum Corda; which are so many Words lost to me. I come thither already fully prepar'd from my Chamber; --- instead of wetting my Appetite by these Preparatives and Preludes, they quite spoil my Stomach. Would but the Licentiousness of the Times excuse the sacrilegious Boldness; I should even censure the Dialogisms of Plato himself, as languid, and cumbersome to his Matter; and regret the great Loss of Time, spent upon long and needless Preliminaries and Interlocutions; by one who had so many, and so much better Things to say. My Subject now naturally engages me to give the Reader here, what Montagne says immediately before the last-cited Passage. "Plutarch, says he, and Seneca have both this great Accommodation for one of my Humour; that the Knowledge, I search for, is there deliver'd “ deliver'd out in Parcels. --- Such are the Opuscula of Plutarch, and the Epistles of Seneca; which are the most beautiful Part of their Writings. -- These Authors, as they do for the most Part concur, in all their useful and true Notions; so they both happen'd to flourish about the same Age; were both Tutors to two Roman Emperours; both Foreigners, both rich, both great Men: Their Doctrine is the very Cream of Philosophy; and deliver'd after a plain and pertinent Manner. Plutarch is more uniform and constant: Seneca more various and wavering. The last toils, sets himself, and bends his whole Force, to fortify Virtue against Frailty, Fear, and vicious Inclinations: The other seems more to slight their Power; disdainng either to mend his Pace, or stand upon his Guard. Plutarch's Sentiments are Platonick, gentle, mild, and accommodated to civil Society: The other's are Stoical and Epicurean, more remote from common Practice; but, in my Opinion, better fitted for private Use, and more determin'd. Seneca seems to lean a little to the Tyranny of the Emperours of his Time. --- Plutarch every where shews a Spirit of Freedom. Seneca abounds with surprizing Turns, and Flashes of Wit; Plutarch with Things. The first warms and animates; the latter gives more Content, and fuller Satisfaction. The one guides us, the other pushes us on. -- There are, (says the same Author in another Place ¹) in Plutarch, abundance of Discourses, well worth our Perusal, where he is even prolix: --- but then there are a thousand others, where he but glances upon Matters: Where he only points with his Finger to direct us which Way we may go if we will; and contents himself sometimes with barely touching upon what is most material. These then are to be remov'd out of their Obscurity into a clearer Light.” Mr. and Madam Dacier confess, That in the Morals of Plutarch, there is scarce any Thing that is thoroughly discuss'd, and fully made out; and that all the Matters there treated, a few only excepted, are but very superficially handled. As for Seneca, his Treatise de Beneficiis is, in my Opinion, the very best Piece he has; but there too he observes as little Order, and Method, as in the rest of his Writings: a Defect, which is, more or less, to be found in almost all the Authors of Antiquity. 'Tis own'd, That he has join'd to the Virtues of the first

Stoicks, all the Pride and Haughtiness of their Followers: And indeed, we may easily discover, that this haughty Stoick never speaks of Virtue without Vanity. Notwithstanding all which, he may be read with infinite Advantage; if we do but join to his Precepts two Things, which are there wanting: The one is, that God has commanded us to apply ourselves to Virtue; the other is, that he will reward with eternal Happiness all such as shall have faithfully adher'd thereto. The same is to be said too of Epicletus, and Marcus Antoninus. We have of the first, besides his Manual, so well known to the World; some Discourses that have been preserv'd by Arrian. That Philosopher, in the Opinion of Monsieur and Madam Dacier, is more unaffected, solid, and pure than Seneca: But is without any great and noble Views, is wanting in Extent of Genius, and Elevation of Thought. Antoninus has all these Qualifications, with a Soul more vast and capacious than his Empire. He contents not himself with the bare receiving, and solidly explaining the Precepts of his Masters; but frequently corrects, and gives 'em new Strength, either by the ingenious and natural Manner in which he has propos'd 'em; or by the new Discoveries with which he has improv'd 'em. But however, it must be own'd, that he retains so much of the ill Principles, and Maxims of the Stoicks; as to require a Reader of no small Caution and Judgment. Besides, the Obscurity and Hardness of Style, common to all of that Set; is still greater in the Reflections of that Emperour; who often explains himself but by Hikes; because he wrote only for himself. Nor would any Thing less, than the Ability of his last Translators, have serv'd to make that Work be read with Pleasure in our Language.

The Roman Lawyers, of whom the greatest Part were Stoicks, contributed very much to the perfecting that Part of Morality, which may be call'd Natural Jurisprudence. The Study of the Law having under the Emperours, become a principal Step to Preferment; the Men of the greatest Genius, and Parts among the Romans, continu'd to apply themselves to this Study, for near the Space of two Centuries. It were to be wish'd, that we had had the Writings of those famous Lawyers intire; they would no doubt have afforded us very great Light. But the Emperour Justinian, having been pleas'd to abridge the Roman Laws; of which the Decisions of these Lawyers, were the most considerable Part; their Works hereupon grew out of Use; so that we have now left of 'em, only some Fragments in the Digest. Tribonian the Lawyer, to whose Care the Emperor had committed this Work; has left us a very Chaos^z, full of Obscurity and Contradictions; which afford a vast Field for Chicanery; and which have, in the latter Centuries, produc'd that prodigious Number of senseless, and confus'd Commentaries. It appears by this Collection, and some Historical Remains, that there were, in the Roman Empire, Sects among the Lawyers^{aa}; who, upon several Points, follow'd different Opinions; in the Manner we see practis'd among Philosophers, and Divines. However, notwithstanding all those Divisions, and the vain^{bb} Subtleties, that were the common Source from whence they sprung; we may find among those few Fragments, several considerable Principles of natural Equity, that may serve to decide many difficult Cases; but they lie intermix'd with a far greater Number of Laws, purely positive.

The Platonists, who became famous in the third and fourth Centuries; such as Plotinus, Amelius, Porphyrius, Jamblichus, Proclus, &c. apply'd themselves much more to explain the Speculations, or rather chimerical Conceits of the Founder of their Sect; than to cultivate his Morals. Aristotle had hitherto, had but very few Followers: He was scarce known in the Western Parts of the World, till towards the Beginning of the sixth Century. The celebrated Boetius, by translating some of that Philosopher's Writings, laid the first Foundations of that prodigious, and truly despotick Authority, which the Peripatetick Philosophy became afterwards possess'd of; and which, even to this Day, in many Places, it still maintains. The Arabians, in the eleventh Century, grew fond of it; and introduc'd it into Spain. From thence sprung the Scholastick Philosophy; which spread itself all over Europe, and with its barbarous Cant became even more prejudicial to Religion and Morality, than to the speculative Sciences. The Ethicks of the Schoolmen^{cc}, is a Piece of Patchwork; a confus'd Collection, without any Order, or fix'd Principles; a Medley of divers Thoughts and Sentences out of Aristotle, Civil and Canon Law, Scripture, and the Fathers. Both good and bad lie there jumbled together; but so as that there is much more of the latter, than the former. The Cassists of the succeeding Centuries, made it their sole Business to out-do their Predecessours, in broaching of vain Subtleties; nay, what is worse, monstrous and abominable Errors; as all the World knows. But let us pass by these unhappy Times; that we may at length come to that Age, wherein the Science of Morality was, if I may so say, rais'd again from the Dead.

S E C T. XXIX.

TH E famous Chancellour of England, Francis Bacon, who liv'd in the End of the Sixteenth, and the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century; was one of those, who most learnedly discover'd the Imperfection of the present State of Philosophy; which he labour'd vigorously to redress; and laid down most excellent Plans for its Reformation. Posterity will be eternally obliged to him, for the great Light and noble Projects he has furnish'd the World with; towards the general Restauration and Advancement of the Sciences. We have Reason to believe, that 'twas the reading of the Works of this great Man, that inspir'd Hugo Grotius, with the Thoughts of attempting the first to compose a System of the Law of Nature; which he afterwards undertook, at the Sollicitation of the celebrated Nicholas de Pietsse, Judge of the High Court of Parliament for Provence. 'Tis pretended, that Melancthon had already given a Sketch of something of this kind, in his Ethicks; and they tell us too of one Benedict Winkler, who publish'd in 1613 a Book intitled, Principia Juris; wherein he intirely departs from the Method of the Schoolmen; and maintains against them, amongst other Things^a; that the Will of God is the very Fountain and Foundation of all Justice. But 'tis acknowledg'd, that the latter of these two often confounds the Law of Nature with that which is positive: And that neither the one, nor the other has afforded any more than a small Gleam of Light; not sufficient to dissipate those thick Clouds of Darknes, in which the World had been so long envelop'd. Besides, Melancthon was too much prepossess'd in favour of the Peripatetick Philosophy, ever to make any great Progress in the Knowledge of the true fundamental Principles of the Law of Nature, and the right Method of explaining that Science. Grotius therefore ought to be regarded, as the first who broke the Ice; and most certain it is, that no Man could be better qualify'd, for such an Enterprize. Extraordinary Clearness of Understanding; exquisite Judgment; profound Meditation; universal Knowledge; prodigious Reading; continual Application to Study, in the Midst of a great many vexatious Obstacles, and the necessary Duties of several considerable Employments; with a sincere Love for Truth; are Qualifications, which no one can deny properly to belong to that great Man, without wronging his own Judgment; and bringing his Character in Danger of the Imputation either of hate Envy; or gross Ignorance. "If (as has been very rightly observ'd) he was not thoroughly acquainted with the Art of Thinking justly; the Philosophy of his Time, being still very dark and obscure; he has supply'd, in a great measure, that Defect, by the Force of his good Sense. If, without the Help of Art, he has shewn so much Delicacy of Taste, and true Discernment; what would he not have done, had he been intire Master of that Art of reasoning justly, and of rightly methodizing his Thoughts, which is now, and has been for some Time, to be had?" His Book was first published at Paris in 1625, and dedicated to Louis XIII. 'Tis said he at first design'd to have intitled it, The Law of Nature and Nations; but he chose afterwards to give it the Title it now bears. of, the Law of War and Peace. What he had chiefly in View was, to set forth those Duties, which the several Nations of the World, or their sovereign Powers, that govern them, owe one to another; and how the Differences arising between 'em might be justly terminated. For which Purpose, he takes into his Work the principal Subject Matters of natural Jurisprudence, and Politicks; and lays down also Principles sufficient to establish the most considerable Duties of private Men. He himself owns, that he is far from having exhausted so copious a Subject; and wishes that others may supply what's wanting; to the End that Mankind may one Day be furnish'd with a compleat System of this Science. Never had Book a more universal Approbation. Numbers of the Learned have wrote Comments upon it: It has been publickly read and expounded in the Universities: And the Author, but fifty Years after his Death, had an Honour done him, which was not paid to any of the Ancients, till after a long Succession of Ages:

Ages: I mean, his being publish'd cum Commentariis Variorum, at Francfort on the Oder, in 1691.

Some Time after the Publication of this Work of Grotius, John Selden, a celebrated English Lawyer, enter'd the Lists; and, whether through Jealousy, or a commendable Emulation; form'd a System of all the Hebrew Laws, relating to the Law of Nature; which he separated from those, that concern'd the particular Constitution of the Jewish Republick. He gave his Book the Title, of the Law of Nature, and Nations, according to the Doctrine of the Hebrews; wherein he is excessively lavish of that vast Erudition, which we find in all his other Writings: But is far enough from eclipsing the Treatise of Grotius. For, besides the extreme Disorder, and Obscurity, for which Selden's Manner of Writing has been justly censur'd; that Author derives not the Principles of the Law of Nature from the pure Dictates of Reason; but from the seven Precepts given to Noah; which, as to their Number, are very uncertain; and solely founded upon a doubtful Tradition, though perhaps ancient enough: He very often too contents himself with barely reciting the Decisions of the Rabbins; without giving himself the Trouble to examine, whether they are well or ill grounded.

Not long before the Death of Grotius, another English Author appear'd, of a Character quite different from that of Selden, I mean Thomas Hobbes; a great Mathematician, and one of the most penetrating Genius's of his Age. It is great Pity he suffer'd himself to be misled by the Indignation he had conceiv'd against those, whom he look'd upon as the seditious Disturbers of the Peace of his Country: Had he philosophiz'd without Prejudice, and with a sincere Regard to Truth only; he would doubtless have done her very signal Service. He publish'd at Paris 1642, his Treatise de Cive; wherein, amongst other dangerous Errors, he endeavours to establish, and that too in the Geometrical Method, the Hypothesis of Epicurus; which makes Self-Preservation and Self-Interest, to be the original Causes of Civil Society. He builds upon this Supposition; That all Men have the Will, as well as the Strength and Power to Mischief one another; and that the State of Nature is a State of War, between each particular Person, and the rest of Mankind. He gives an unlimited Authority to Kings; not only in Affairs of State, but even in Matters of Religion. Hobbes created himself by this Work many Enemies; but, as Mr. Bayle says, the more discerning and judicious Part of Mankind were forc'd to acknowledge, that no one had ever yet penetrated so far into the Foundations of Civil Policy. Lambert Veltbuisen, a famous Philosopher of the united Provinces, boldly undertook the Defence of this Treatise De Cive, as far as related to Hobbes's Manner of demonstrating the Laws of Nature. The same Year this Defence appear'd, Hobbes publish'd his Leviathan; the Sum whereof is: "That, without Peace, there is no Safety in a State; and Peace cannot subsist, without Authority; nor Authority, without Arms; and Arms avail not, unless put into the Hands of one Person: and that the Fear of Arms cannot incline those to Peace, who are push'd on to Hostilities by an Evil, more to be dreaded than Death itself; that is to say, by Dissentions about Things necessary to Salvation." In this Piece he lays himself much more open; for he here roundly maintains, That the Will of the Sovereign alone constitutes, not only what we call just and unjust; but even Religion also; and that no divine Revelation can bind the Conscience, till the Authority, or rather Caprice, of his Leviathan; that is, of the supreme arbitrary Power, to which he attributes the Government of every Civil Society; has given it the Force of a Law. If thereupon we sometimes find in his Works, some seeming Contradictions; 'tis probably, because he durst not trust the Reader with the whole of his Notions; and was willing to provide for a Retreat, in case he should not be able to stand the Shock of his Adversaries. He had several of 'em; but they did not all succeed alike. He pass'd for an Atheist; and perhaps they were not very much out in their Judgments, who thought him so; for he admitted none but Corporeal Substances.

S E C T. XXX.

THE Number of Commentators upon Grotius daily increasing, insomuch that there was now scarce any Thing else mnded, besides Disputes about the Sense of his Words; and the barbarous Terms, and ridiculous Subtleties of the Schoolmen, of which Grotius had purg'd his Work, being again brought upon the Stage; a German had the Courage to shake off the tyrannical and pernicious Yoke of Custom; and bravely follow the Footsteps of that great Man: I mean the illustrious Samuel Pufendorf^a; who has thereby acquir'd an immortal Reputation: a Reputation, whose Lustre not all the Efforts of his envious Competitours will be ever able to efface. He pursu'd the Genius and Method of Grotius: He examin'd and weigh'd Things in their Originals; and making the best Use he could, of the Discoveries of those who had gone before him, he then added his own; which soon gave very great Hopes of his accomplishing that Work, which as yet was but in Embryo. The Principles of the new Philosophy, which he exceedingly relish'd, but without blindly adopting all the Opinions of the Cartesians; together with the Mathematicks, which he study'd under^b a celebrated Professor in the University of Jena; did not a little contribute towards the perfecting his natural Qualifications; and rendering him more capable of so vast a Work. We are beholden, for the first Sketch he drew of it, to the Leisure an unhappy Accident, he had the Misfortune to meet with, gave him. He had been sent for into Denmark, to be Governour to the Children of a certain Lord, who was then Ambassadour of Sweden to the other Northern Crown. A little after his Arrival at Copenhagen, the War suddenly breaking out again with the Swedes, (who attack'd that City, but were after some Time oblig'd to raise the Siege;) Mr. Pufendorf was made

Prisoner^c, with the rest of the Retinue of the Ambassadour; who was himself but a few Days before, gone to take a Trip to Sweden. During this Confinement, which lasted eight Months; as he had no Books, neither was permitted to see any Body; he took a Resolution^d to meditate on what he had read in Grotius and Hobbes; and having collected his Meditations together, he compos'd a short System out of what he lik'd best, which he turn'd and explain'd his own Way; handling such Matters as those Authors had omitted; and adding to the whole some new Thoughts of his own, as they occur'd. Not that he intended, at that Time, any Thing more, than to divert himself in his Solitude: But about two Years after his being set at Liberty, he went into Holland; where a Friend of his getting a Sight of this Essay, advis'd him to review, and publish it. He did so; and the Work was printed at the Hague, in 1660; under the Title of Elements of Universal Jurisprudence. He owns in his^e Preface, that, besides Grotius and Hobbes, the Professor in Mathematicks mention'd before, had afforded him some Light. His Method is, in some measure, that of the Geometricians: For he first lays down his Definitions and Axioms; afterwards he explains 'em; and then draws out the Consequences they contain. And though he himself prov'd afterwards dissatisfied with this Work of his, and publicly own'd it to be the imperfect and premature Fruit of his more juvenile Studies; yet as the Publick gave it a very favourable Reception; so it serv'd to make our Author known to the World, in a very advantageous Manner. The Elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, to whom it was dedicated; was not satisfi'd with returning him his immediate Thanks for it, in a very obliging Letter^f; but sent for him the Year following to his University of Heidelberg;

^a He was originally of the Marquisate of Misnia, in Saxony, and a Lay Man, tho' sprung from the Clergy; for his Father, Grandfather, &c. were both on the Father's and Mother's Side, were Ministers of the Lutheran Communion. I learn'd this from one of the Pieces, which compose that Collection, intitled, Eris Scandinica, p. 149, 150. The Village, whereof his Father was Minister, is call'd Flebs, near Chömnitz; and in all Probability he was born there. His Brother at least, Isaiab Pufendorf, is a Native of that Place; as Mr. Gundling testifies, in his Hist. Philos. Moralis, Part 1, cap. 6, Sect. 5, Note 10. See also the Acta Eruditiorum of Leipfic, An. 1703, p. 185.

^b Erhard Weighel. He was with that Professor in 1657, during the whole Year. See Eris Scandinica, p. 126.

^c Mr. Coyel: This happen'd in 1658. Eris Scandinica, p. 126.

^d One of his Letters, to the Baron de Boineburg, is publish'd; wherein he says, that the Pretence for detaining him was; that his Brother was settled in Sweden. See J. Graevii Bibliothec. Jur. Gent. Lib. 3, cap. 9, p. 281. 'Twas that Brother, to whom he dedicated, in 1655, his Dissertationes Academice Selectiores. He calls him Isaiab de Pufendorf, Knight, (Eques Auratus.) and Chancellor to the King of Sweden, in the Dutchies of Bremen and Verden. He says he had been sent to the chief Courts of Europe, about the Affairs of that Prince. See the Place before quoted, Lett. (1), in Mr. Gundling's Book.

^e 'Tis what he says himself, in the Letter above cited; but which, as well as the others which follow, is full of Errata; which in many Places so spoil the Sense, as to make 'em unintelligible.

^f Pref. * p. 3, — & c.

^g The Dedication is dated the First of September, 1660, and the Elector's Letter the 29th of the same Month. The Letter is printed in the Bibl. Jur. & Gent. of Grotius, Lib. 3, Cap. 10, Sect. 1. And in the Delimitio Hist. Jur. Arini, &c. of J. Frid. Lubovic, published at Hall in Saxony, 1701, Sect. 45.

Heidelberg; where, on his Behalf, he founded a Professorship in the Law of Nature and Nations. Thus, that great Prince, at the same Time that he conferr'd on Mr. Pufendorf so high a Mark of Distinction and Favour; secur'd to himself the immortal Glory, of having first set the Example to all, who should hereafter publicly cause to be taught, this noble Science; a Science so necessary for Youth, and indeed for all Mankind; but which no one had as yet bethought himself of introducing into the publick Universities. As our new Professor constantly made it his Business to explain the Treatise of Grotius; so this gave him the Opportunity of observing, more and more every Day, the Necessity there was of composing something in that Kind, that should be more complete. The Solicitations too of the Baron de Binebourg, then Chancellour to the Elector of Mentz; might also contribute very much to engage him therein. That Minister was extremely desirous, to have some Body set about the compiling a methodical Body of natural Jurisprudence; and had in vain endeavour'd to persuade several learned Men to undertake it; and amongst the rest, Beecler, Conringius, and Rachelius. We may easily imagine that, after having read Mr. Pufendorf's Elements of Universal Jurisprudence, he could not fail to apply to him for that excellent Purpose, judging him more capable, than any other, of executing that noble Design. He found him accordingly intirely dispos'd to satisfy so laudable a Desire. Mr. Pufendorf laid before him a Plan of the System he design'd: He represented to the Baron, that the due Execution thereof would require (these are his own proper Terms) great Penetration of Mind; an exquisite Judgment; and free from all Manner of Prejudice; a numerous Library; great Leisure; a settled Correspondence with several learned Men; who would, upon all Occasions, freely communicate their Thoughts to him: All which Things, adds he, I want. However, he promis'd to do all that lay in his Power; but without hurrying himself; neither would he engage to publish his Work, till he had brought it in some Degree to answer his Expectation. These Particulars I have from a Letter, he wrote in Answer to the Baron de Binebourg, &c, publish'd about four or five Years ago, with two Letters of Beecler, and one of Herman Conringius; to whom that Minister had sent Mr. Pufendorf's, to have their Opinions upon the Matter. Conringius and Beecler were too much prepossess'd in favour of Antiquity; and too un-experienc'd in the Business of clear Reasoning, to weigh and examine rightly the Project and Ideas of our Author. This plainly appears by their Answers: Conringius's is indeed a very civil and obliging Letter; but 'tis remarkable, that Beecler in his discovers an extraordinary Uneasiness at the growing Fame of Mr. Pufendorf; and an extreme Desire to lessen that Esteem, the World had conceiv'd of him. This happen'd in the Year 1663. About the Year 1667, Charles XI, King of Sweden, designing to establish an University at Lunden, in the Province of Schonen; resolv'd to invite thither our Heidelberg Professor. The Elector Palatine was very loth to part with him; but did not however think fit to lay his Commands upon him; and at length consented to his accepting the more profitable and advantageous Post, offer'd him in Sweden. But oblig'd him that same Year to bestow some Hours extraordinary on the Elector Prince his Son; who had his appointed Preceptors besides. Mr. Pufendorf went into Sweden; and was, in 1670, there establish'd in the new University at Lunden, in Quality of chief Professor in the Faculty of Law; and with a Salary more considerable than any of the other Professours. Two Years after, he publish'd his Law of Nature and Nations: And in 1684 he reprinted it at Francfort on the Main, augmented above a Fourth Part.

^c See Groningius, ubi supra. Lib. 3, Cap. 9.

^b Some learned Men, of Beecler's own Country, say, that his Notes on Grotius are very perplex'd; and that he promises throughout more than he performs; besides, in the greatest Part of his Writings, he is very politick as to his Sentiments; which he always manifestly accommodates to the Interests of those, he desires to please. See Mr. Budden's Hist. Jur. Nat. Sect. 28.

^e See the Preface of the Eris Scandinica, and p. 128, of that Collection. Some Years after his having executed that Charge, the King of Sweden made him his Historiographer; and one of his Privy-Council. About the Year 1686, he was sent for by the late Elector of Brandenburgh, Frederick William; who gave him the same Employ of Councillour and Historiographer. He was created a Baron, (Liber Baro;) a little before his Death, which happen'd at Berlin, on the Sixth of October, 1694.

S E C T. XXXI.

I Shall not here enlarge in setting forth, in a pompous Manner, all the particular Excellencies of this Work. Nor do I think myself under any Obligation to follow the establish'd Mode; which will have ^a every Translator to pay his Original the Tribute of Preference; neither does the Office of an Interpreter necessarily oblige me so to do: I shall content myself with speaking here historically; with the same Indifference and Impartiality, as will, I dare say, every where shew itself in my Notes upon this * Author. There is no such Thing as absolute Perfection in Books, any more than in any other humane Productions; And Mankind has, without any more ado, a Right to treat as Mountebanks, all those panegyric Writers; who, to let off the Authors they translate or comment upon, or rather themselves and their own Performances; begin with assuring the Reader, that it is an intirely accomplish'd Work in its Kind; a compleat Model, the utmost Effort of human Ingenuity: Always ready to say as much, in four Days Time, of any other Author, who shall first have the good Fortune to fall into their Hands.

First then, I shall observe, that this Work has had a very general Approbation. The vast Number of Editions it has had in Sweden, Germany, and Holland, within the four and thirty Years since it was first publish'd; do sufficiently declare, in what an advantageous Manner, it has been receiv'd by the Publick. At the same Time that I was translating it into French, I was inform'd, by the Nouvelles of Mr. Bernard, ^b That Dr. Kennet of Corpus Christi in Oxford, with some † others, had translated it into English: I should have been very glad to have met with that Translation; to have consulted the Introduction, and the † ample Notes, with which it was said to be accompany'd; and at the same Time to have seen, if those several Hands have been able to carry on such a Work in Concert, as that the necessary Uniformity thereof has receiv'd no Prejudice: But, for our Author himself, as there are certain single Suffrages, which alone weigh more than Multitudes of the common Sort; I shall here produce two of that Kind, which are of very great Weight; and to which all Men of Judgment will, I am persuaded, pay a very great Regard. The first is that of the illustrious Mr. Locke, that great Philosopher; whose Loss the Republick of Letters still laments; and whose exquisite Judgment, profound Penetration, and extraordinary Abilities, especially as to what concern'd Matters of Reasoning; all the World is sufficiently acquainted with. Let us see what he says, in his excellent Treatise of Education: When ^c [a young Lad] has pretty well digested Tully's Offices, and added to it Putendorf de Officio hominis & civis, it may be seasonable to set him upon Grotius de Jure Belli & Pacis, or, which perhaps is the better of the two, Putendorf de Jure Naturali & Gentium; wherein he will be instructed in the natural Rights of Men, and the Original and Foundations of Society, and the Duties resulting from thence. The other Suffrage, is that of Mr. Le Clerc; concerning whom I shall, though with Regret, forbear saying what I think; for fear I should offend his Modesty by Encomiums, which no reasonable Person refuses to give him; and which, in my Mouth, would be of no great Weight. His Approbation falls not directly on my Original; but is not therefore of less Force; seeing it regards the Abridgment of it, which the Author himself made, a Year after he had publish'd his principal Work. Let us see then what he says, in the ^d Parabasia; when he is treating of the general Knowledge, which one ought to have of the Principles of Civil Policy: The Books of Hugo Grotius de Jure Belli ac Pacis; and that of Samuel Putendorf, intitled, De Officio Hominis & Civis; are admirable for their general Principles. More especially the Second; which, as it is more concise, establishes with great Clearness and Order, the Fundamentals of Morality, Politics, and Jurisprudence. Whoever reads it carefully, will there find Principles sufficient, to solve most of the principal Questions in these Sciences;

ences; which can admit of any Debate. Since then the Abridgment is, in Mr. Le Clerc's Opinion, so useful; what must he think of the Book itself? But that I may give a more particular Idea of the Work itself, and that every one may know the just Value thereof; I will in a few Words draw the Parallel of it with that of Grotius.

To begin then with the Style; if the Question be about Purity of Language, and Accuracy of Expression, I readily give the Preference to Grotius; who had an Erudition incomparably more vast; and who, from his Cradle, if I may so say, wrote with marvellous Facility and Elegance. But then even his Style is too concise; he very often speaks out but half his Meaning; and supposes his Reader to know many Things, which require very great Study and Application; so that his Work is of little Use but to the Learned: Whereas Mr. Pufendorf's is much more within the Reach of common Capacities. As to what concerns Order, and the Disposition of Particulars; the general OEconomy of the Work of Mr. Pufendorf is by far the best: But, in the particular Ranging of the * Materials, that compose each Chapter, he has sometimes let slip some Inaccuracies, which are not to be found in Grotius; from which I have endeavour'd, as much as possible to disengage my Translation: As to the Subject Matter, I have already taken Notice, that Grotius pretended not to give a compleat System; which might be easily seen, though he himself had not declar'd it. 'Tis only occasionally that he touches upon even the greatest Part of the principal Subject Matters of natural Right: So that, though his Views had been more extensive, and less imperfect, than they seem in many Things to have been; his Plan did not lead him to a full Discussion of them; it was enough for him to handle 'em so far, as might be sufficient to decide the Questions, which concern'd the principal Subject of his Book. In a System of the Law of Nature, an Author ought, without Dispute, to begin with instructing his Reader in the Nature of moral Entities or Beings; in the Principles and different Qualities of humane Actions; and what it is that makes 'em imputable either as good or evil; in the Nature of Laws in general; and their different Kinds, &c. But we meet with scarce any Thing in Grotius, relating to all these Matters; which compose the first Book of my Original. Grotius saw what was the fundamental Principle of the Law of Nature: But he does no more than just point it out in his * Preface; and that in such a Manner too, as gives us Reason to conclude, that his Ideas on that Head were not altogether clear; nor enough disengag'd from the Prejudices of the Schools: And when he handles any Matter particularly, he does not always shew the Connection it has with its first Principles. On the contrary, my Author establishes, and distinctly explains the fundamental Maxims of the Law of Nature; and from thence deduces, by a regular Train of Consequences, the principal Duties of Men and Subjects; in whatsoever State and Condition they are. As Grotius omits some important Matters; so he touches upon others that might have been very well spar'd; as when he examines Questions relating rather to Divinity, than to the Science of natural Right; or else enlarges on some certain Subjects, more than is requisite in a general System; as, for Instance, on the Subject of War. On all these Accounts, his Work is very much inferior to that of Mr. Pufendorf; who besides scarce ever borrows any Thoughts from Grotius †, but what he improves, and explains more distinctly; and draws from 'em a greater Number of Consequences. In fine, Mr. Pufendorf often refutes Grotius, and that too with Reason; as may be seen at one View by running over my Index of Authors: and, to be convinc'd, that Grotius had, as to several Matters, even false, or at least very confus'd Ideas; there needs no more, than to examine one single Notion of his, which runs through his whole System; I mean that pretended Distinction of his, between the Law of Nature, and a certain Law of Nations; which he conceives to be founded on the tacit Consent of the People of those several Nations.

From all this, I think, I may boldly, and without any Fear of being suspected to have too great a Tendernefs and Affection for my Author; infer, that his Work, take it all together, is far more useful than that of Grotius. I have no Design to derogate in the least from the Glory of that great Man, who is far above all my Encomiums. We should not, perhaps even at this Day, have had any tolerable System of the Science of the Law of Nature, had it not been for the Light he has given us: And had Mr. Pufendorf been in the Place of Grotius, and Grotius in the Place of Mr. Pufendorf; the Work de Jure Belli ac Pacis would, in my Opinion, have been much more imperfect than it is; and the other, De Jure Gentium & Naturæ, much more perfect. I say it once again, that

* The learned Journalists of Leipsick, in that most obliging Extract they gave of the first Edition of this Work, Jun. 1707, p. 35.— make me say quite the contrary: In speculioribus pertinetudinis accuratorem esse Grotio preat. Perhaps this is only an Error of the Press. (Grotio for Grotium;) though I do not find it mark'd in the Errata of that Year.

† Prolgom. Num. 7. & seq. particularly, Num. 11, 12, 13, 14.

‡ For which Reason I have taken care to cite in the Margin that learned Man, in a great many Places, where Mr. Pufendorf had forgot to do it; so that by Means of my Translation, one may perpetually confront Grotius with my Author.

that I never entertain'd a Thought of diverting any one from reading the Book of Grotius: But very far from it, I am heartily sorry, out of the Good-will I bear to the Republick of Letters; that this excellent Work is so wretchedly translated into our Language. If the Truth may be spoken, Mr. de Courtin, who is the Author of this Translation, undertook more than he was able to perform; and it is surprizing that a Man, whose Employments particularly engag'd him in the Study of the Subject Matter of this Book; should succeed no better in a Design of this Nature. I shall say nothing of the Barbarousness, Harshness, and Obscurity of his Style: This is obvious to every Reader upon the first Opening of the Book. But there are too a great Number of essential Faults, which make Grotius speak quite beside his Meaning; and the Translator sometimes trips in Places so plain and easy, that he discovers a great deal of Ignorance, both in the Subject Matter; and in the Latin Tongue. The Notes too, which he has inserted in his Index, in order to explain the Terms, and sometimes the Thoughts of Grotius; make the Thing yet more apparent. His Explanations are for the most Part either false, imperfect, or so confus'd; that instead of clearing up Matters, they serve only to render 'em still more obscure. I have here advanc'd nothing, but what I can very easily make appear. And though I have not confronted this Translation with the Original quite through; yet I have noted down, as I have at several Times consult-ed it, so great a Number of such Sort of Blunders; that I may, without the Imputation of Rashness, pass this Judgment upon it. When the first Edition of my Preface appear'd, I immediately sent a small List of them to one, who had taken Offence at this Judgment of mine on the Performance of Mr. de Courtin; but the Party had nothing to reply to me as to those enormous Faults, of which I had taken my Instances almost at the very first Opening of the Book. But the best Way to convince all Mankind of a Thing, of which I think no judicious and impartial Person can have a Moment's Doubt; would be to publish a new Translation of Grotius's Book: which I may * perhaps some Time or other do, should I find Leisure enough for it. I should follow the same Plan as in my Translation of Pufendorf; in such Manner as to refer from one to the other, both in the Text, and Notes; and to make the two Works join'd together serve as perpetual Supplements to each other. There would then appear so great a Difference between the two Translations, that every one at first Sight would conclude, that one or other of the Translators must have been strangely out of the Way. I am not ignorant that a learned German Professor commends this Version of Mr. de Courtin; as an elegant, clear Version, that may serve instead of a Comment; he adds too, that the Translator has in an accurate Index, given his Reader an Abridgment of the whole Work. But, in all Probability, this learned Man has rely'd upon some Body else's Judgment in this Matter; or perhaps, being better acquainted with the Latin, than our Language; he has concluded this Translation to be a good one, because the Author speaks Latin in French. It has perhaps ^b, been reprinted thrice, or it may be oftner; but this only shews what Credit the Original itself of Grotius has in the World; and the great Want there is of Books of this Nature. So that, admitting there was, in the main, no great Difference between my Original, and the Work of Grotius; this Translation at least of the latter, could afford no just Cause, why I should have desisted from translating the former.

* This he has since perform'd, and his Translation printed at Amsterdam, An. 1724.

S E C T. XXXII.

MY Design in this Translation, has been to do Service to two Sorts of Persons. The first, are such young Men, as are destin'd for publick Employments, as well Ecclesiastical, as Civil. We see 'em every Day aspire to, and actually obtain those Employs; without having the least Tincture of the most general Principles of a Science, so universally necessary, as is the Science taught in this Book: In so much that, even though the Passions should not otherwise intrude themselves; we need not wonder to see Affairs succeed so ill in the Hands of Men, who sit down contented under so gross an Ignorance of their Duties. It may perhaps be said, that they can read this Book in Latin, and therefore have no need of my Translation. But, not to mention at present the Regulations and Amendments I have made in the Text of my Author, and the Notes I have added to it; an exact Knowledge of the most necessary Languages is besides a Thing generally very much neglected; and there are vast Numbers in Offices, who either do not understand Latin at all; or else so little, that they cannot, with Pleasure and Improvement, read a Book in a Style like that of my Author. Besides 'tis my Notion (if I may be allow'd to venture a Thought, which is perhaps peculiar to myself; but I believe well enough grounded;) that we ought, as much as possibly we can, to begin our Studies of the Sciences with Books written in that Language, which is most familiar to us. However able we may be to read with great Ease, and Readiness, Books wrote in a dead Language; yet our Mother Tongue is always best understood: neither is it good to divide the Mind by sharing our Thoughts between the Attention, that we ought to have for the Things themselves; and that, which we are oblig'd to give to the Understanding of the Terms, in which they are express'd.

The other Sort of Men, I intended to serve by this Translation, are the illiterate or common People; among whom, it is not at all to be wonder'd at, if we find the grossest Ignorance of the Things, contain'd in this Book; seeing those, whom I have just now mentioned, have but very false and confus'd Ideas thereof. I know by Experience, that even the Term, Law of Nature, is as-much unknown to them, as is the Terra Australis incognita; for which Reason, I thought myself oblig'd to explain it in the Title Page. The People of this Rank, when they heard talk of the Translation I was then upon; imagin'd at first, that it was a Book thick-set with the Querks and Subtilties of the Bar; and therefore to be left to the Lawyers. I own 'tis not within the Reach of a Peasant or a Day-Labourer. But how many Men are there, who without making Learning their Profession, might with Proficiency read such a Book as this; if they would but give the same Attention thereto, as they do to their common Affairs; or to the Reading of other Books far less useful; nay, sometimes pernicious. I shall not stop here to shew 'em the Necessity they are under of being instructed, at least to a certain Degree, in the several Points of Morality, Jurisprudence, and Politicks, treated of in this Work. If they will take the Pains to read carefully the * Paraphrasana, they will no longer doubt thereof; and, if they have their true Interest at Heart, they will speedily apply themselves to the making a proper Use of those excellent Lessons, the Author there gives. I did intend to have said something in this Place of the † Defects, and Imperfections in the Generality of Books and Discourses of Morality; of the Method to be observ'd in treating of, and studying this important Science; of the Conformity of the Duties, right Reason teaches us ‡, with the Maxims of the Gospel; and of some other Things of the like Nature. But, besides that this Preface is already spun out to a very great Length, the Matters I have handled having led me further than I imagin'd; the Printers allow me not Time enough, to digest thoroughly what I had

* Tom. 2, pag 54, c. 63.

† See what I have said in a few Words about one of these Defects, in my Preface to the Traité du Jeu, printed in 1709, pag. 17.

‡ I have also handled this at large in my Traité du Jeu, Lib. 1, Cap. 3. I have no more Leisure at present to undertake the rest, tho' I had, when the first Edition of this preliminary Discourse was printed; which is besides now considerably enlarged, by several Additions in this new Edition.

to say on those Heads. I shall therefore content myself with observing, in a few Words, one Thing, which we seem not enough to reflect on. And that is, that Revelation was not given to Men, to reach them absolutely and fully all that they ought to know. On the contrary, it supposes in 'em the Knowledge of some certain Things; which Knowledge they either actually have, or which 'tis intirely in their Power to acquire: And the Faculty of drawing Consequences from Principles known, either by the sole Light of Reason; or by Holy Scripture. The Existence, for Instance, of a Deity infinite in Power, Wisdom, and Goodness, the sovereign Legislator, and Author of humane Society; is a Principle evident by its own Light: Therefore we find that the Sacred Writers do not so earnestly apply themselves to the establishing of it; if they sometimes speak of it, 'tis as of a Thing manifest to all Mankind. They even expressly tell us, that that which may be known of God, was manifest among the Heathens, God having shewn it to them (by the Light of Reason); for that the invisible Things of him, his eternal Power and Godhead, were from the Creation of the World, clearly seen, being understood by his Works; so that the Heathens were inexcusable: Because they did not give that Attention to 'em, they ought to have done. Thus too it is with respect to the true Principles of Morality, which are founded on the general Notions of Religion. The Sacred Writers assure us, that, 'when the Nations, which have not the Law, (written, like that of Moses;) do by Nature (that is to say, without Revelation;) the Things contained in the Law; these having not the Law, are a Law unto themselves: And shew, that the Commandments of the Law are written in their Hearts; their Consciences also bearing Witness, and their Thoughts the mean while accusing or excusing them. The Manner, in which the Sacred Writers propose the Maxims of Morality, does also manifestly shew, that they did suppose, in the Minds of Men, certain Notions, which, though imperfect, are nevertheless most true; and that they were satisfy'd with supplying what was therein defective; or with retrenching what ill Habits and Customs had perversely added thereto. They have not left us a methodical System; they do not exactly define all the Virtues; they enter not into Particularities; they only give, as Occasion requir'd, general Precepts; from whence we must draw many Consequences, in order to apply them to the several States and Circumstances of particular Persons, and Cases; as it would be easy to shew by many Instances, if the Thing was not evident to all who read, with ever so little Care, the Holy Scriptures. And from thence it appears, to mention it only by the By; how far we ought to rely upon the Expedient of those, who, after having made it their Business to ruin and destroy the Certainty of the Light of Reason; refer us to the Light of Faith, for the resolving of our Doubts: As if the Light of Faith did not necessarily suppose that of Reason; and as if the Proofs we have of the Truth of those Facts, on which Revelation is founded; or of the Sense and Meaning of a great many Passages in Scripture; were more evident, than the Maxims of right Reason are, with relation to our Duties, and their true Foundations: not to mention how far these Gentlemen carry Hypocritical Pyrrhonism. On the contrary, 'tis certain, that the intire Conformity of the Christian Morality with the clearest Dictates of right Reason; is one of the most convincing Proofs of the Divinity of the Christian Religion: as has been acknowledg'd by all, who have wrote with any Solidity on that Subject. We are assur'd, says a famous English Divine, that God can never reveal any Thing contradictory to the true Dictates of our Reason. Nay, what ought chiefly to persuade us, that the Holy Scriptures are the Work of God, or of the Author of Nature; is, that that Holy Book illustrates, confirms, and every where lets in new Light upon the Laws of Nature. And if we duly weigh and consider it, we shall find, that this is the Proof, which of all others is the most affecting; and the best proportion'd to the common Capacities of the Bulk of Mankind. I have no Design, in any Respect, to diminish the Certainty of those Facts, that are the Foundation of Faith: There is no one Fact to be found, in all ancient History, so well prov'd, as these are found to be; and it has been very justly observ'd, that they afford when well consider'd, a Demonstration as incontestable, as those of the Mathematics; though of another Nature. But it must be own'd, that the Generality of Mankind are, by their State and Condition of Life, reduc'd to an Impossibility of sufficiently instructing themselves, in all that is necessary, for the apprehending the Force of this Demonstration. They must understand several Languages, and read with Application a great many Volumes; which we well know, they have neither Leisure nor Means to do. They are therefore ob-

lig'd to refer themselves therein to those, who are in a Condition to make such Enquiries: And, though they may be able to draw a very strong Proof, in Favour of the Gospel, from the Unanimity which they observe, as to this fundamental Point, among all Christians, though otherwise so very much divided about particular Opinions: Yet after all it must be own'd, that there is still something wanting to produce in 'em an intire Conviction. But when they come at length to consider the Evangelical Morality, and find it intirely conformable both to their true Interests; and to all those Principles, of which every Man has by Nature the Seeds in his own Heart; they cannot then help concluding, that the Author of it must necessarily be, that very Being, who has given 'em Life, and brought 'em into this World only to make 'em happy; provided they will not be wanting to themselves, but contribute on their Part, all that lies in their own Power, towards the Attainment of their own Felicity.

I.  T was the Business of the first and highest Philosophy¹, and that by which alone it could fully answer the Design of its Name, and Institution, to deliver the most comprehensive Definitions of Things, and to rank them agreeably under their proper Classes, subjoining the general Nature and Condition of every Sort of Beings. Now as the Series of natural Things² hath been fairly enough regulated by those, who have hitherto apply'd themselves to the adorning of that Science, so it is evident, that Men have not been equally solicitous about constituting the Entia moralia, or moral Entities, nor treated them with that Respect which their Dignity requir'd. Many Authors seem never so much as to have thought on them; others only touch them lightly over, as idle Fictions, of no use or moment in the World. When, at the same time, it was highly expedient, that they should be fully understood by Mankind, who are endu'd with the Power of producing them³, and through whose whole Lives and Conducts their Force and Activity is diffus'd. This Reflection obligeth us to premise somewhat on a Part of Knowledge generally neglected; so far as shall seem requisite to il-

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. I. §. I.

¹ Metaphysics are most probably meant by our Author's Philosophia prima, because it comprehends (as some Philosophers hold) not only the Science of Essences in general, their chief Properties, and most eminent Species; but also Natural Theology, and an Account of the Nature of Spirits.

² Our Author reserving the Distinction of physical and moral Entities to the next Paragraph, passes it over here in the beginning of the Chapter.

³ How this is done, see §. 3. and 4. following.

lustrate our principal Undertaking: Especially lest our Definitions of moral Things should, either upon account of their Obscurity, or of their Novelty, prove a Stop to the Reader, who perhaps in common Treatises hath rarely met with the like Terms. And here, if those who have been bred up in the nicer Delicacies of Letters, shall disdain our Endeavours of this kind, and cast a censorious Frown on Words unknown to antient Eloquence; we only petition them for this Favour, that as we often pardon the Impertinencies of their over-scrupulous Exactness, so they would be pleas'd to grant us the Toleration not to be Polite¹, whilst we profess a closer Regard to the strict Severity of Things, than to the exterior Ornaments of Speech. For how to express ourselves with more Advantage about these Matters, we are yet to seek; unless by tedious Circumlocutions we would leave them more obscure and more perplex'd than we found them. Against the Charge of Novelty Tully himself will be our Advocate: New Names (says² he) are to be apply'd to new Things; nor is this to be wonder'd at by any Man of ordinary Knowledge, when he considers, that in every Art and Craft, not vulgarly understood, there is a Variety of Terms coin'd for that particular Subject. And then giving Examples in the liberal and mechanic Arts, he concludes; *A Philosopher of all Men hath an especial Right to this Privilege; for Philosophy is the Art of Life, and he that would undertake to explain its Rules, cannot, from the common Currency of Words, find Stock enough to answer his Occasions*³. But he that can upon no account digest such Harshness of Stile, is left at his Liberty to turn out of these rougher Tracts, and to pass immediately to a Field of more Smoothness and Pleasure.

II. All the Beings⁴ which compose this Universe, as they consist of such Principles as were by the most wise Creator temper'd and fitted for the producing of each particular Essence; so they have every one of them their particular Properties, arising from the Disposition and Aptitude of their Substance, and exerting themselves in agreeable Actions, according to that Portion of Strength which their Divine Author and Founder hath imprinted on them. These Properties we now usually call natural, since the Term Nature hath been extended so far, as to denote not only the general Mass of Things, but also the Modes and Acts flowing from the internal Force of their Constitution, by which is produc'd that infinite Variety of Motions which turns and manages all the Business of our World. Those Things which exercise their Operations, either without any Sense at all, or with pure down-right Sense, or with such as is assisted by very imperfect Reflection, are guided by the sole Instinct of Nature, and are unable to govern their Actions by any Rules or Modes of their own Invention. But Man, who besides his excellent Form and most accurate Contexture of Body, fitting him for the noblest and the quickest Offices of Life and Motion, is endu'd with a singular Light of Understanding, by the Help of which he is able most exactly to comprehend and to compare Things, to gather the Knowledge of Obscurities from Points already settled, and to judge of the Agreement which Matters bear to each other; and hath also the Liberty of exerting, suspending, or moderating his Actions, without being confin'd to any necessary Course and Method: Man, we say, is farther invest'd with the Privilege of inventing and applying new Helps to each Faculty, for the more easy Regulation of its Proceedings. To consider what numberless Modes and Notions have been introduc'd for the Assistance of the Understanding, and for preventing the Confusion which might arise from the undistinguish'd Vastness of its Objects, is the Province of another Sort of Enquirers. Our Business is, to declare, how, chiefly for the Direction of the Will, a certain Kind of Attributes have been impos'd on⁵ Things, and their natural Motions; whence there springs up a peculiar Agreement and Conveniency in the Actions of Mankind, a grateful Order and Comeliness for the Ornament of human Life. And these Attributes are call'd moral Entities, because the Manners and the Actions of Men are judg'd and temper'd with relation to them; and do hence assume a Face and Habit different from the horrid Stupidity of the dumb Creation.

¹ We find Manilius using the like Excuse: Lib. iii. v. 39. &c.

*Ornari res ista negat, contenta doceri.
Et si qua externa referantur nomina lingua,
Hoc operis, non ratis erit: non omnia secuti
Possunt, & propria melius sub voce notantur.*

And though some Words of foreign Stamp appear, Seem harsh, untun'd, uneasy to thy Ear,
This is the Subject's, not the Writer's, Fault:
Some things are stiff, and will not yield to Thought.
I must be plain: and if our Art hath found Expressions proper, it neglects the Sound.

Mr. CREECH.

Nor hope sweet Verse and curious Turns to find:
I'll leave thy Passions, and instruct thy Mind.

To the same purpose, V. LUCRET. Lib. i. v. 137. HORAT. Art. Poet. v. 48. which last speaks thus:

----- Si forte necesse est
Indiciis monstrare recentibus abdita rerum, Fingere cinctutis non exaudita Cethegis
Continget: dabiturque licentia sumpta prudenter.

None may to us that Liberty refuse,
Supposing that it prudently be none.

Thus in English:
If to express Things new found out, we use
New Words, unto the Antients never known,

----- Licuit, semperque licabit
Signatum presente nota producere nomen.
It ever was, and e'er will lawful be
To use the Words forg'd by Necessity.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. I, II.

¹ Cicero maintains it to be a childish Thing to speak elegantly of Matters philosophical: In such Cases to speak plain is sufficient, and learned Men have no other Intent, but to express themselves clearly. Cic. de fin. l. iii. c. 5.

² De fin. l. iii. c. 1. The following Part of this Discourse plainly shews us, that he speaks expressly of such Philosophers as treat of moral Knowledge, because he distinguishes them from Logicians, Natural Philosophers, Geometricians, &c.

⁵ See Note 2. upon §. 5. of this Chapter.

⁶ Men and their Actions are here understood, as §. 16. shews.

III. We may define our moral Entities to be certain Modes superadded to natural Things and Motions by understanding Beings, chiefly for the guiding and tempering the Freedom of voluntary Actions, and for the procuring of a decent Regularity in the Method of Life. We call them Modes, because we conceive Ens, or Being, in general, to be more conveniently divided at large into Substance and Mode, than into Substance and Accident. And as Mode is contradictorily distinguish'd to Substance, so it is manifest, that moral Entities have no Self-subsistence, but are founded in Substances and in their Motions, and do only affect them after a certain manner. Of Modes, some flow, as it were, naturally from the Things themselves; others are superadded by the Intervention of an intelligent Power. For whatever is endu'd with Understanding, can, from the reflex Knowledge of Things, and from comparing them with one another, form such Notions as may prove very serviceable in the Direction of an agreeable and consistent Faculty. Moral Entities are of this kind; the Original of which is justly to be refer'd to Almighty God, who would not that Men should pass their Life like Beasts, without Culture and without Rule; but that they and their Actions should be moderated by settled Maxims and Principles, which could not be effected without the Application of such Terms and Notions. But the greatest Part of them were afterwards added at the Pleasure of Men, as they found it expedient to bring them in, for the polishing and the methodizing of common Life. And from hence the End of them is plainly to be discover'd, which is not, like that of natural Beings, the Perfection of the Universe, but the particular Perfection of human Conduct, as superior to brutal, in being capable of regular Beauty and Grace; that thus in so inconstant a Subject, as the Motions of Mens Minds, an agreeable Elegance and Harmony might be produc'd.

IV. As the original Way of producing natural Entities is ⁴ by Creation, so the Manner of framing moral Entities cannot be better expressed than by the Term of ⁵ Imposition. For these do not proceed from Principles ingrafted in the Substance of Things, but are added, at the Pleasure of intelligent Creatures, to ⁶ Beings already perfect in their Nature, and to the real Productions of those Beings; and consequently obtain their ⁷ whole Existence from the Determination of their Authors. The same Power assigns them such ⁸ such Effects, which, when it sees convenient, it can destroy, without causing any natural Alteration in the Subject to which they were apply'd. Hence their Force and Ability of Operation doth not consist in this, that they can by their internal Efficacy produce any natural Motion or Change in Things, without the Intervention of other Causes; but partly in shewing Men how they ought to govern their Freedom of Actions, and chiefly in making them capable of receiving Benefit or Injury, and of exercising several Works towards other Persons, with some peculiar Effect. And the Efficacy of moral Entities, produc'd by Almighty God, flows from this Principle, That he, by his Right of Creation, hath the Power of circumscribing, within proper Limits, that Liberty of Will with which he indulg'd Mankind, and when it grows refractory, of turning it which way soever he pleaseth, by the Force

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. III, IV.

² For Instance, The Figure of a Body, which is really inherent in it; and therefore called an Internal Mode.

⁴ This Word is sometimes used in Latin, to signify the Establishment of a Man in an Office, as Consul creatus est, He was made Consul.

⁷ To obviate all Objections against this Expression of our Author, we ought to observe, that he makes two sorts of Institution: 1. Purely arbitrary. 2. Another, which has a Foundation in the Thing itself, and which is a necessary Consequent of what is before freely resolv'd, and can't be oppos'd or contradict'd: As for Example, an Architect may or may not build a Palace; but when he has resolv'd to do it, he must necessarily order the Materials in a clear different Manner than if he were to build a Cottage; and he'd pass for a Fool, if, after he had built a Cottage, he should affirm it to be a Palace: Yet this hinders not, but the ordering of the Materials proceeds from the Contrivance and Will of the Architect. In like manner it was altogether free for God either to create Man, or not; but after he had resolv'd to send him into the World, it was necessary that he should lay such Obligations on him, as became a rational and sociable Creature; so that if the Laws of Nature depend originally on the Divine Institution, they are not a pure arbitrary Constitution, as the ceremonial Laws given to the Jews were; but an Institution founded upon the very Nature of Man, and the Wisdom of God, who can't will the End, but he must at the same time will the Means to the End. Nevertheless, though the Will of God can't be separated from his Goodness and Wisdom, yet we impute the Establishment of the Laws of Nature chiefly to the Divine Will, because it is not only the Principle of all Divine Actions, but because God's Wisdom and Goodness are Attributes intirely free, and so can't be conceived without the Will. These Expositions are taken from this Author's Works, viz. Specim. Controvers. cap. v. §. 9. Dissert. Acad. p. 743. Spicil. Controv. cap. iii. §. 9.

⁸ See the last Paragraph of this Chapter.

⁹ By virtue of moral Entities we have a Right to do ourselves, or require of others, certain Things; or rather we are oblig'd to do them, or suffer others to do them. See Note 2. in the next Paragraph.

of some threaten'd Evil: Men likewise were empowered to give a Force to their Inventions of the same kind, by threaten'g some Inconvenience, which their Strength was able to make good against those who should not act conformably to them.

V. Since then moral Entities were instituted for the Regulation of Mens Lives; to which End it is necessary, that those who are to observe this Rule should bear some settled Relations to one another, should govern their Actions by a fixed Method; and, lastly, should act with determinate Respects and Titles about such Goods and Possessions as the Occasions of Life require; we may hence conceive them to be principally inherent, first, in Men; secondly, in the Actions of Men; and, thirdly, after a sort, likewise, in Things, which Nature, either by her own Strength, or with the Assistance of human Industry, may produce. But though it would be no Absurdity to state their Division according to these three Heads or Subjects, yet it seems a more exact Method to make the Classes of natural Entities our Patterns in digesting the moral; not only because the former have more engag'd the Studies of philosophical Men, and being compar'd with the latter, cast a considerable Share of their own Light and Evidence upon them; but likewise because our Understandings are so immers'd in corporeal Images, as to be hardly capable of apprehending such moral Beings any otherwise than by their Analogy to those of Nature.

VI. Now though moral Entities do not subsist of themselves, and for that Reason ought not, in general, to be rank'd under the Class of Substances, but of Modes; yet we find many of them to be conceiv'd in the Manner of Substances, because other moral Things seem to be immediately founded in them, just as Quantities and Qualities inhere in the real Substance of Bodies. Farther, as natural Substances suppose some Kind of Space, in which they fix their Existence, and exercise their Motions; so in Allusion to these, moral Persons are especially said to be in some State, which in like manner contains them, and in which they perform their Operations. Hence a State may not improperly be defin'd a moral Entity fram'd and taken up on account of the Analogy it bears to Space. And as Space seems no principal and original Being, but is devis'd, to be, as it were, spread under other Things, to hold and to sustain them in some particular manner; so the several States were not introduc'd for their own Sakes, but to make a Field for moral Persons to exist in. Yet there is indeed this Difference between State and Space, that the latter is a kind of immoveable Substance, extended primarily, and of it self, and which might still subsist, if all the natural Things, which now fill it, were remov'd: But States (and all other moral Beings, consider'd formally as such) obtain no higher Condition than that of Modes or Attributes; so that upon taking away the Persons suppos'd to be in such a State, the State it self is in manifest Danger of losing its own Existence.

VII. There are two Sorts of Spaces; one according to which Things are said to be in a Place, which the Logicians call Ubi, as here, there, &c. and another according to which they are pronounc'd to be in Time, which they call Quando, as Yesterday, to Day, to Morrow, &c. In the same manner we may conceive a double Notion of State; one which denotes a moral Ubi, and bears an Analogy to Place; another which includes a Respect to Time, signifying the Application of some moral Effect to Persons existing in such a Time. The former State, which hath a Relation to Place, may be consider'd either undeterminately, as it results only from ⁴ moral Qualities; or determinately, as it supposeth a Dependence on moral Quantities, and on Comparifon. The State of Man consider'd undeterminately, is either natural or ⁵ adventitious. We use the Word natural, not because such a State flows from the internal Principles of human Essence, antecedent to the Power of Imposition; but because it was impos'd by GOD himself, not by Man, and affects us immediately upon our Nativity. We are wont to consider the natural State of Man, either absolutely, or with relation to other Men: The former Notion, till we can find a more convenient Term, we may express by the Word Humanity, importing that Condition in which Man is plac'd by his Creator, who hath been pleas'd to endue him with Excellencies and Advantages in a high Degree above all other animate Beings¹. Of which State this Principle is a direct Consequence, That Man ought to be a Creature acknowledging and worshipping the Divine Author, and admiring his Works; and that 'tis expected he should maintain a Course of Life far different from that of Brutes. To this State is oppos'd the Life and the Condition of irrational Animals.

Since then the very being a Man is a State obliging to certain Duties, and giving a Title to certain Rights, it cannot be out of the way to consider the precise Point of Time at which particular Persons may be said to enter on such a State: And this we conceive ought to be fix'd on the very first Moment when any one may be truly call'd

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. V, VI, VII.

² See what the Author says §. 16.

⁴ As for Example, When a Prince, in favour to, or to reward any of his Subjects, establishes an Office or Dignity, which he would not else have done, nor was otherwise necessary, but purely to advance the Honour of him for whom it was established: Such are all honorary Employments.

⁵ From the 17 to the 23 §. of this Chapter, the Author shews what he means by moral Qualities and Quantities.

⁶ Adventitious is a sort of moral State, which is added by way of Overplus to the State of Nature, in Consequence of some human Action.

a Man, though he as yet want those Perfections which will follow his Nature in a longer Course: that is, whensoever he begins to enjoy Life and Sense, though his Mother hath not yet delivered him into the World. Now because the Obligations cannot be fulfilled by him, without he understand his own Nature and the Ways of working, they for that Reason do not actually exert their Force, 'till he is able to square his Actions by some Rule, and to distinguish them by their proper Differences. But the Rights, on the contrary, date their Validity from the very Beginning of our Being, in as much as they engage other Persons, already arrived at the full Use of Reason, to such and such Performances towards us, and may turn to our Benefit, even whilst we are incapable of apprehending the Favour. Hence, it being a general Right and Privilege of all Men not to be hurt by others, if the Body of a Fœtus in the Womb should suffer any unlawful Violence, the Injury is not only done to the Parents, but to the Child; who, we suppose, may in his own Name demand Justice on that score, when he is grown up to a Knowledge of the Action¹. But before the imperfect Materials² have acquired an human Form in the Womb, if any one should dissipate or destroy them, he cannot properly be termed injurious with regard to that senseless Mass; though he hath indeed broken the Law of Nature, by intercepting a Member of human Society, and hath done an Injury to the Commonwealth, and to the Parents, by depriving them of their promis'd Citizen and Off-spring.

The Natural State of Man, considered with relation to other Men, is that which effects us upon the bare account of an universal Kindred, resulting from the Similitude of our Nature, antecedent to any human Act or Covenant, by which one Man is rendered peculiarly obnoxious to the Power of another. According to which Sense, those Persons are said to live in a State of Nature, who neither obey one common Master, nor are at all subject one to the other, nor have any Acquaintance by the means of Benefits, or of Injuries. To which may be added a third Notion of a natural State, as it abstracts from all Inventions and Institutions brought in, either by human Industry, or by divine Revelation, for the Grace and the Convenience of Life.

The Adventitious State is that which obligeth Men at, or after their Birth, by the Authority of some human Constitution; the Divisions of which will be better settled hereafter³.

But we ought to observe, by the way, that there's no Reason why People should imagine a State of Nature, in the Sense but now delivered, to be a Thing that never was, or can be in the World; because there was never any Set of Men joyned together barely by that Similitude of Nature, as it abstracts from Consanguinity; Eve being knit to Adam in the conjugal Tie, and all their numerous Descendants being closely united and ally'd by the Communion of Blood and Affinity of Race. For we must know, that the Bond arising from Nearness of Birth, doth by Degrees wear out amongst Persons remov'd at a great distance from the common Stock; nor is esteem'd of any farther force, when once got beyond the reach of those several Appellations and⁴ Terms which Mankind have invented to express it by. And therefore such a State, though it did not appear at the Commencement of human Race, arose afterwards in a longer Tract of Time, when the Memory of the universal Root, and the Sense of the Relation springing from it, were sunk out of the Thoughts and Minds of Men.

VIII. But although every State supposeth, in the Person whom it affects, a Respect and Disposition towards others, in as much as it is attended with some Right, or some Obligation, neither of which we can conceive without an Object to employ their Force upon; yet some Kinds of States do more expressly include and denote a Relation towards other Men, whilst they signify the Manner and Process by which the mutual Business of Mortals is on both ¹ Another Example may be; If a Thing be given to an Infant before he comes into the World by Will, or by any other Title, when he is in Conception, the Infant has a certain Right to it; so that if it be taken from him, he may legally require it, when he comes to an Age of Discretion: For it is sufficient, that he declares, that his Goods were taken away without his Consent. This Comparison will clear the Matter. When any Person in our Absence robs us, or does us any Manner of Damage, he does us a real Injury, though we may not know it till a long time after. We have taken this out of our Author's Work, call'd The Elements of the Civil Law, p. 11, 12. We may add, that by the Roman Law, an Infant in the Mother's Womb is supposed to be come into the World at all times, when any thing may be done for its Advantage, as the Words of the Digest, Lib. i. Tit. iii. De Statu hominum. Leg. vii. import. Qui in utero est, perinde ac si in rebus humanis esset, custoditur, quotiens de commodo ipsius partus queritur. See Leg. xxvi. of the same Title. Yet the Roman Lawyers are not well agreed upon this Point; for some of them hold, that the Fœtus is a Part of the Mother, or of her Entrails, and that it can't be called a Man, till it is born into the World. Partus enim, antequam edatur, mulieris portio est, vel viscerum. Digest. Lib. xxv. Tit. iv. Leg. i. §. 1. They borrow'd this Motion of the Stoicks, who in this agreed with divers others of the ancient Philosophers. See Julius Paulus, written by Mr. Noodt. c. ii. and xi.

² The Explication, which Philo gives upon Exod. xxi. 22. is so very pertinent here, that 'tis a wonder our Author did not apply it. The Text is, If Men, in striving together, hurt a Woman great with Child, so that she miscarry, tho' no other Mischiefs follow, they shall pay the Husband of that Woman such a Fine, or Mulct, as he shall lay on them, and give it him before the Judges; but if Death follow, ye shall give Life for Life. These Words may be understood of the Death of the Mother only, as Jesephus thinks, or of both the Mother and Child, as Philo supposes, according to the Opinion of this Author. Εάν τις ἀρδασοι, &c. If the Fœtus be not formed, he that strikes the Mother, ought to make Satisfaction, as well for the Harm done her, as because he hath hindred Nature from perfecting her Work, and giving Life to so noble a Creature as Man; but if the Fœtus be already formed, every Member being in its natural Place, and having its proper Qualities, the Person ought to be put to Death; Philo De Leg. special. See Selden de Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum Hebr. l. iv. c. i. Further, if before the Fœtus be completely formed, a Man by hurting the Woman on purpose, causes a bodily Deformity, or other Infirmary in the Child; he may, when he is grown up, prosecute the Author of such a Damage, and shall obtain Satisfaction according to his Damage, as our Author speaks in a Place cited hereafter, where he treats also of another Question, which deserves our Notice, lib. iv. c. xii. §. 10.

Sides manag'd and transacted. Of this sort the most signal and material are Peace and War, which two States, ¹ Libanius says, comprehend all the Affairs, and all the Conduct of Life. Peace is that State by which Men live quietly together, without the Disturbance of Violence or Injuries, and voluntarily discharge their mutual Duties, as Matters of necessary Obligation. War, on the other hand, is a State of Men mutually engag'd in offering and repelling Injuries, or endeavouring forcibly to recover their Dues. Peace may be divided into common and particular; the former, such as is maintain'd amongst Men by Duties flowing purely from the Law of Nature; ² the latter, such as derives its Force from express Covenants and Leagues, binding both Sides to agreeable Performances: This again is branched into internal and external, the one ³ between Members of the same Commonwealth, the other regarding Persons of different Countries and Governments, whether as common Friends, or as special Confederates and Allies. A common or universal War engaging all Mankind at the same time, is an impossible Supposition; this being a direct Consequence of the State of Beasts. Particular War is either internal and civil, or external; that, between Members of the same ⁴; this, between those of different Communities. When the Acts of War are suspended, though the State still continue, such a Cessation is call'd a Truce ⁵.

IX. States are said to be consider'd determinately, when we measure them according to the high or low Degree of Esteem which attends them; or accounting as they are reckon'd more or less honourable. ⁶ For since peculiar Rights and Obligations accompany each State, every one obtains a larger Share of Splendor and Credit, either as its Rights are more numerous and ⁶ more forcible; or as its Obligations are directed towards the Performance of such Works as require a singular Ability of Parts and Wit. On the other hand, those which demand only dull Pains and Labour of Body, are in very little Value and Repute.

X. The latter sort of State, which, in our general Division, we settled with relation to Time, in conjunction with some moral Effect, may be divided, first, into Seniority and Juniority; both which are consider'd, either with respect to the Duration of human Existence, and are then call'd Age; the Degrees of which are Infancy, Childhood, Puberty, Youth, Manhood, fix'd Age, declining, old, and decrepit Age: or, with regard to some adventitious State, ⁷ according as a Man hath continued a longer or a shorter Time in it. Secondly, into Plen-age ⁸, when one is presum'd able by his own Strength and Discretion to manage his Affairs; and Non-age, when a Person hath need of a Tutor, or Guardian, because he is suppos'd, upon the account of Weakness of Judgment, incapable of dexterously prosecuting his own Business. The Limits of this State are different, according to the various Constitutions and Customs of Nations.

Different from Non-age is what we may call an Age capable of meditated Guile; the Bounds of which it is likewise impossible to assign. Aelian in his Various History relates a very remarkable Way of discovering such an early Deceit. A Boy, having taken up a golden Plate ^b dropt out of Diana's Crown, was indicted in Court: The Judges order'd a Pack of trifling Play-things to be laid upon the Board, and amongst these a Plate of Gold, and bid the Boy choose which he lik'd best; who again laying hands on the Gold, was condemn'd as guilty of the former Sacrilege.

XI. Before we proceed to other Matters, it seems necessary for us to observe, that through Scarcity of Words we are frequently compell'd to express by the same Term, the State it self, and the Attribute proper to such a State; though they are really distinct, and form different Conceptions in our Minds ^c. Thus, to give an Instance, Liberty is us'd as well for a State with analogy to Space, as for a Faculty of working, with resemblance to an active Quality ¹⁰. And so Nobility sometimes expresseth a State, sometimes an Attribute, or Affection of the Person in such a State, in the manner of a passive Quality. So likewise the word Truce denotes both the State of Peace, and the Manner of settling it.

^c Senec. de Benef. l. ii. c. xxxiv. There is a vast multitude of Things which have no peculiar Words fix'd upon them; and these we express not by proper, but by foreign and borrow'd Names.

³ Viz. So far as they execute the fundamental Agreement punctually, for the sake of which the Society was established, and do not oppose, by open Fact, the lawful Power which is exercised over them; and so that Peace is not disturbed by any sort of Violence, but only that which we are engaged not to use, when we are entred into a Society. As for Example, The internal Peace of a State suffers no Interruption, when the Magistrate uses the Power entrusted to him to curb and punish the Breakers of the Laws. But when the Subjects will by Force deliver a Criminal from Punishment, and endeavour to oppose the Magistrate in the Exercise of his legal Authority, this is called a Civil War. Element. Jurisprud. Univers. p. 17. The War also which breaks out among Confederates, united together by a perpetual Alliance, may also be looked upon as an intestine War, as Mr. Hertius there observes.

⁶ More forcible.] The French Translator renders the Words, validiora jura, more considerable, i. e. of greater Validity and Certainty; for the Honour of an Employ does not depend upon the Manner of obtaining it, but upon the Dignity and Privileges which it confers on such as are invest'd with it. And so this seems the better Translation.

⁹ See Lib. iii. Ch. vi. §. 4. and Lib. iv. Ch. iv. §. 15.

The Roman Law declares such as are in their Non-age, or not far from it, capable of Deceit. igitur doli non capaces, ut admodum impuberes----- excusati sunt. Digest. Lib. xlvii. Tit. xii. De Sepulchro violato, Leg. iii. §. 1. See CUJAS'S Observations, Lib. vi. Ch. xxii. & Digest. Lib. xlvii. Tit. viii. De vi bonorum raptorum, Leg. ii. §. 19.

¹⁰ The Author will explain a little lower, viz. §. 19. what he means by Qualities active and passive.

Nor must we forget to hint, that as one Person may be at the same time engag'd in several States, provided that the Obligations of those States do not interfere with one another; so the Obligations adhering to one particular State, may, according to different Parts, be deriv'd from different Principles. And therefore he that only collects the Obligations flowing from a single Principle, and omits the rest, doth not presently form a distinct State incapable of other Obligations besides those which he hath taken notice of. Thus he that gathers several Parts of the Office of Priests purely from the Holy Scriptures, doth not in the least deny, but that they are likewise bound to such Performances as the Constitutions of particular Governments shall farther enjoyn. So we that profess in this Work to treat only of those Duties of Men, which ¹ the Light of Reason shews to be necessary, do not at all pretend that there ever was, or now is, or ought to be, such a State in which those Obligations only should prevail, exclusive of all others. Nay, it would be almost a needless Disquisition to search, whether such a State of Men was once so much as likely to have been in the World. For the Assertion, which some so confidently lay down, could never yet be clearly made out; That if Man had continued in his primitive Holiness, the Law of Nature alone, as it govern'd him at first, so should have continued its Sway, except that one or two ² positive Commands might probably have been added to it. We may justly question, whether Mankind, although untainted with Sin, should have always pass'd their Time in the Compass of a single Garden, sustaining themselves with the Fruits of spontaneous Growth, and not have cultivated and adorn'd their Ways of living, by industrious Management, and by Variety of Arts and Inventions. For what Prejudice could it have been to their original Innocence and Integrity, if, upon the Multiplication of human Race, they had divided into separate Societies in the Forms of Commonwealths? And what Notion can we frame of such Societies, without the Addition of positive Laws and Constitutions?

XII. Moral Entities, fram'd with Analogy to Substances, are call'd moral Persons ³; which are either particular Men, or several join'd in one Body by some moral Tie, consider'd with the State and Office which they maintain in common Life. Moral Persons are either Simple, or Compound. The Simple, according to the Difference of their Posts and Employments, are either Publick, or Private; as their Duty is immediately apply'd, either to the Benefit of civil Society, or to the particular Advantage of ³ every private Member. Publick Persons, by the general Custom of the Christian World, are divided into Civil and Ecclesiastical. The former ⁴ are either Principal, or Inferior. Of principal Persons, some administer Affairs with a supreme Power; others either execute some Part of the Administration by Commission from the supreme Power, who are properly call'd Magistrates, or else assist with their Advice and Counsel in the Management of the Commonwealth. The Inferior perform a less noble Service to the Community, and act under the Magistrates, with respect to their publick Capacity. In War the Officers, whether of higher or lower Commissions, answer to Magistrates, and are assisted, in Subordination, by the common Soldiers. We reckon Men of that Profession amongst publick Persons, in as much as they are authoriz'd by the supreme Power, either immediately or mediately, to bear Arms in the Service of the Commonwealth.

There is likewise a peculiar Species of politick Persons, which we may stile Representatives, because they sustain the Character of other Persons: such as, being invest'd with the Power and Authority of acting by another, do in his room transact Business with the same Force and Validity, as if he himself had managed it. Of this Kind are Legates, Vicars, Burgesses, &c.

A new Distinction hath been brought in of late, between Ministers ⁵ of a representative Character, who are Embassadors properly so call'd; and ³ The Roman Lawyers ordinarily restrain the word Person to those that are Free: and rank their Slaves amongst the Goods they possess'd.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XII.

¹ In Opposition to Revelation, and particular Rules of the Civil Laws of every Country, from whence arise three distinct Sciences, viz. Natural Right, which is common to all Men without Exception; Civil Right, which is or may be different according to the Interest of every State; and Moral Theology. See the Author's Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen. Prof. §. 2.

² It is not known, whose Words these are, which our Author censures. As to the Question itself, 'tis one of the most impertinent; for our Author elsewhere acknowledges, that it is very hard to imagine, how a Propriety of Goods and Government, on which our whole Lives now are spent, could have Place in our State of Integrity. See his Spicil. Jur. Nat. c. 2. §. 9. and his Comment. super. inven. Vener. Lips. pullo. p. 386. Nevertheless some others have treated feriously upon this frivolous Question; as Mr. Thomasius Inst. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. i. c. 2. §. 37, 38. and Mr. Hirtius in his Elem. prud. Civil. l. i. Sect. 3. §. 5.

³ There is another Reason, why they are call'd so, and that is, that they are settled in publick Employments by the Authority of a civil Society, or of them that govern it. Whereas private Employments depend upon the Will and Choice of every Man, unless the State will interpose and confer them.

⁴ Why does he not define what is meant by Persons political, or civil? They are such, as (for so our Author himself speaks, Elem. Jurisprud. Univers. p. 23.) administer by publick Authority those Affairs which have a particular regard to civil Society, considered as such; whereas Ecclesiasticks are to take care of Matters of Religion only. These last, though they ought to be subject to their Sovereigns in temporal and civil Matters at all times, yet may and ought also to be independent, as to Spiritualls, provided they keep within their Bounds, and do not set up any other Religion besides the established: And the Reason of it is, that as Religion is a Thing in its own Nature free, at least, directly, and can't be supposed to be admitted into civil Society for no End, every ecclesiastical Society may do what it judges for the Interest of Religion, provided it encroach not upon any Prerogative of the Civil Power. See what shall be said hereafter, Lib. vii. ch. 4. §. 11. Note 2. Nevertheless, I do not assert any Thing here, which may be a Foundation for any Principles contrary to the English Author, Of the Rights of the Christian Church.

⁵ The Author here quotes the Work of Mr. Wicquefort, entituled, The Ambassador, and his Office, printed in his Time without a Name, and under a different Title, viz. Memoirs concerning Embassadors; but lately published, with many Additions, as above.

Ministers of the second Order, as Envoys or Residents, who do not, like the former, express the full Power and Grandeur of their Masters¹.

With resemblance to these publick Representatives, Tutors and Guardians are concern'd for private Persons, as they manage Affairs in behalf of Pupils or Minors given them in Charge.

On this Point Mr. *Hobbs*² is mistaken, when he will have it frequently to happen in Communities, that a Man shall bear the Person of an inanimate Thing, which therefore is it self not properly a Person; as suppose of a Church, an Hospital, a Bridge, &c. For there appears no Necessity of introducing a Fiction of Law, to constitute Persons by whom any of these should be represented. It being more natural to say in plain Terms, that particular Men are empower'd by the Community, to collect the Revenue, settled for the preserving of such Places, or Things, and to carry on and sustain any Suits that shall arise on those Accounts.

The Variety and Division of ecclesiastical Persons is obvious to every Man, according to the particular Religion in which he hath been bred up. Nor can any Man of Letters be at a loss to apprehend what Kinds of Persons are founded in the Management of Schools.

Private Persons are of a vast Latitude and Extent; yet their principal Differences may be taken, first, from their Business, Craft, or Trade, which employs their Pains, and exhibits their Livelihood: and these are, either creditable and genteel, or such as seem to carry in them more Baseness, or Drudgery. Secondly, from the Condition, or, as we may say, the moral Situation which any one obtains in a Community; in which respect one is a Citizen, with more or fewer Privileges; another a Sojourner, and a third a Stranger. Thirdly, from the Place in a Family, upon which account one is said to be a Householder, which may comprehend the Person of a Husband, a Father, and a Master; another is call'd a Wife, another a Son, another a Servant: These may pass for the ordinary Members of a Family; the extraordinary are Guests and Lodgers. Fourthly, upon account of Race and Birth; whence arise Nobles (divided into different Degrees in different Countries) and Plebeians. Fifthly, from Sex and Age, whence come the Differences of Man and Woman, and the Distinctions founded in Childhood, Youth, Manhood, and Old-Age³. For though the Diversity of Sex, and Number of Years, are not of external Imposition, yet in the Method of a social Life, they involve some kind of moral Notion; in as much as different Actions are becoming in different Sexes, and Persons of various³ Ages require a various Treatment and Application.

XIII. A Compound moral Person is then constituted, when several individual Men are so united together, that what they will or act by virtue of that Union, is esteem'd a single Will, and a single Act, and no more. And this is supposed to be done, when the particular Members submit their Wills to the Will of one Man, or of one Council, in such a manner as to acknowledge, and to desire others to acknowledge, for the common Act and Determination of them all, whatever that Man, or that Council shall decree or perform, in Matters which properly concern such an Union, and are agreeable to the End and the Intention of it. Hence it comes to pass, that whereas in other Cases, when many Men will or act any Thing, we conceive so many distinct Wills and Acts as there are in number natural Persons, or human Individuals; yet when they close, and form a compound Person, they are supposed to have but a single Will, and every Action which they perform is construed as one only, although a Number of natural Individuals concurs in its Production. And hence such a compound Person doth and ought to obtain some particular Goods and Rights, which none of the Members, in their private and separate Quality, can claim or arrogate to themselves⁴.

Here also we must remark, that as natural Bodies continue the same, although in length of Time, by slow and silent degrees they receive a considerable Alteration from the various Accessions and Deserctions of their Particles; so by the particular Succession of Individuals, the Identity of the compound Person is not injur'd; unless at one and the same time such a Change should arrive, as would entirely take away the Nature and Constitution of that united Body. On which Point we shall be more large in⁵ another Part of our Work.

Compound moral Persons, or Societies, may, after the manner of single Persons, be divided into Publick and Private. And the former again are subdivided into Sacred and Civil. Of the Sacred, some we may call general, as is the Catholic Church, and likewise any particular Church, whether comprehended within the Bounds of such a Nation, or distinguish'd from others by publick Forms of Confession. Others Peculiar, as are Councils, Synods, Consistories, Presbyteries, &c. Civil Societies are also either general, as a Commonwealth, of which there are many Species, as simple, compound, regular, and irregular; or particular, as a Senate, an Order of Knights, a Tribe, a Parliament, &c. Armies may be called military Societies, and consist

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XII, XIII.

² This is a visible Mistake in our Author, who has asserted the contrary elsewhere, and ought to have been corrected by Mr. Hirtius, who put out the Frankfort Edition in 1706; for there is great reason to reject the Sentiments of such Men (as Charles Pascal, Richard Zouchaus, &c.) who affirm that Embassadors, properly so called, are as their Master himself, who sends them; inasmuch, that the Prince or State, to whom they are sent, ought to give them the same Honour they would to their Master. The Character of an Ambassador certainly gives neither the Dignity nor Title of a Sovereign, and such a Minister may not pretend, because his Master has a Superiority above another Prince, that he must personally be preferred before him. See what our Author says, Lib. iii. ch. 4. §. 20.

³ In the Civil Law some other Distinctions are made among Persons from their Age and Sex. See Mr. DAUMAT'S Civil Laws in their natural Order, Lib. i. Tit. II. Sect. I. of the Preliminaries; and the Interpreters upon the Digest. Lib. i. Tit. V. De statu Hominum.

⁴ Ages is not in the Original, but the Manner of Reasoning, and Beginning of the Sentence require the Addition of it, as our Author himself does in his Elements Jurispr. Univers. p. 28.

⁵ As for Example, No private Person hath a Right to punish Criminals, although the Right to do it proceeds originally from private Persons; the Sovereign only has that Power.

of ' Regiments, Troops, Cohorts, Companies, &c.

Amongst private Societies we do not only reckon Families, but all the ' Colleges, or Corporations in a Kingdom, or a City, as those of the Merchants, of the Artificers, and the like. To make a minute Catalogue of every Species we think unnecessary to our present Design.

XIV. Concerning the Nature of simple moral Persons, we have this farther to observe; that as one and the same Man may be in several States together, ' provided they do not clash with each other, so he may sustain several Persons together, upon Supposition that the Duties attending those Persons may be perform'd together by him. For, though upon a natural Account one cannot be both a Husband and a Wife, both a Son and a Daughter; nor in a moral Consideration, at the same Time, a Master and a Servant, a Judge and a Prisoner, a Party and Witness; yet nothing hinders why the same Man may not be (for Example) at home a Householder, a Senator in Parliament, an Advocate in the Halls of Justice, and a Counsellor at Court. In as much as those particular Offices do not require and engage the whole Man; but may, at different Times, be all conveniently administr'd ' . And upon this Principle the wiser Heathens undertook to defend Polytheism^b, which they knew well enough was contrary to Reason: For, their Excuse was, they only conceiv'd such a Number of Persons in the same supreme Being, as might answer the Variety of Operations which proceeded from his Essence and Nature^c ' 4.

It's very plain from the Name and the Notion of Imposition, that when a Man enters on the Capacity of a new Person, there is no natural Change produc'd in him, no Generation of new natural Qualities, no Augmentation of old ones; but whatever accrues to him from this Relation, is comprehended within the Sphere of moral Things. So when a Man is declar'd Consul, he is made ne'er the wiser, nor when he lays down his Office, doth he lay down any of his Parts with it. Though some have observ'd, that the Splendor of Mens Dignity hath frequently a strong Influence on their Actions, and that many Men have made very different Figures in a publick, and in a private Station. But we may reckon these Fancies amongst the common Deceptions of Sight, occasion'd by gaudy Pomp and Shew. The Case being much the same, as when Country People imagine the Name and Title of Doctor to have some Share in the Force and the Success of a Prescription^d. Except indeed, that some kinds of Parts and Dispositions are rouz'd and enliven'd by Business; and on the contrary, lie dormant in a State of Ease^e. Yet there is no Question to be made, but that when God Almighty imposeth a peculiar Charge and Person on any Man, he can, and often doth indue him with extraordinary Qualities, beyond the Measure of moral Acquirements; as is evident from the holy Scriptures^f.

From what hath been offer'd on this Subject it appears, that the Jews heretofore attributed too large Effects to their Regeneration, by which the new Person of a Profelyte of Justice was impos'd on a Gentile; as, when they affirm'd, that there was no Force remaining in his former Kindred; that he ought not to esteem, or use as Relations, his Brethren, Sisters, or Parents; nor his Children begotten in his first Condition^g. The Cause of this Error was their absurd Belief, that a new Soul was infus'd into the Profelyte.

XV. It may not be amiss, in the last Place, to observe, that Men sometimes frame a kind of Shadows, or Images of moral Persons, for the representing of them in Sport and Jest. Whence it came to pass, that the Term of Person hath been peculiarly challeng'd by the Stage. The Essence of a feigned Person consists in this, that the Habit, Gesture, and Speech of another real Person be handsomely express'd: Thus the whole Procedure bears only a Countenance of Mirth, and whatever such a fictitious Actor says or does, leaves no moral Effect behind it, and is valu'd only according to the Dexterity and Artifice of the Performance: For which Reason we may, by the way, justly wonder, why

We must understand, that we are by Nature invested, as it were, with two Persons; or Capacities; one common to Mankind, on account of our being Partakers of Reason, and of that Excellence by which we surpass the Beasts; the other proper to particular Men. Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ Our Author expresses these Parts of an Army according to the Manner of the Romans, as Legio, Turma, Cohors, Manipulus, &c. to which we have no Terms that will exactly answer, and therefore we are forced to translate them thus. See the Treatises of Justus Lipsius upon this Matter.

² Collegia is a Name given to the Assemblies of some particular Society of Men of one Trade or Calling in a City or Corporation, and such were the Collegia, or Societies of Coachmen, Augurs, Aesculapius, or Health, Dendrophori, or Timber-Merchants, &c. as we have at London, Companies, or Collegia of Mercers, Drapers, &c. Vide Mr. DAUMAT, Of publick Right, Lib. i. Tit. xv.

³ Mr. Hertius has treated at large of this, and cleared it by a great Number of Examples, in his Discourse, De uno homine plures sustinente personas, which makes up a Part of the third Tome of his Commentaries, and small Tracts. Printed at Frankfort on the Mein, A. D. 1700.

⁴ See Mr. LE CLERC's Bibliothèque Choise; i. e. Choice Library, Tom. iii. Art. i.

Peter^a, Bishop of Alexandria, approv'd of the Baptism which Athanasius, when a little Boy, had administred to one of his Play-fellows^a.

But the Imposition which produceth true moral Persons, is allow'd no such Liberty; but ought always to presuppose such Qualities, as may contribute to the solid Use and real Benefit of human Life: And he that in constituting Persons hath not a Regard to these Endowments, is to be esteem'd an extravagant Buffoon, and a vain Insulter over Mankind^b. Thus Caligula might have made a Consul of the most wicked, or of the most senseless Wretch in Rome, provided the Man had been a free Citizen, and could at least have perform'd the common and formal Part of that Office: But to design his Horse Incitatus the same Honour, was a Pitch of Madness, and of insipid Raillery: nor a less Impudence than when he set him up for a Master of a Family, and gave him a House and Furniture; where there was good Entertainment provided for Guests invited in the Name of the Beast^b. An equal Madness was it, as well as a horrid Impiety, that many of the Antients, to flatter their Princes, their Founders of States, and other Worthies, rank'd them after their Death in the Number of the Gods^c. And what to think of the Canonization amongst the modern Papists, no Man of Sense is at a Loss.

XVI. As to Things consider'd as they are the Object of Law^d, there seems to be no Occasion of ranking them under the Head of moral Entities. For, though Men are conceiv'd as different Persons, upon account of their different State or Office, yet Things do not raise such distinct Notions in us, with reference to their Owners, whether ourselves or others, or whether the Propriety be yet uncertain. When at first some Things fell under particular Right and Dominion, and others were left exempt, we must not fancy, that they themselves acquir'd any new Qualities; it seems rather, that upon introducing this Propriety of Things, a moral Quality arose amongst Men, of which the Men were the Subjects, and the Things only the Terms: For, as during the primitive Communion of Goods, any Man had a Right of applying to his proper Use, what equally belong'd to all; so, when once Masters or Owners were constituted, there sprung up a Right in each particular Master of disposing how he pleas'd of his own, and an Obligation in all other Masters to abstain from his Possessions. But the Things themselves obtain'd nothing hence, but an extrinsecal Denomination, as they make the Object of such a Right, and of such an Obligation. So when certain Things are said to be holy, or sacred, no moral Quality of Holiness inheres in the Things; only, an Obligation is laid upon Men to treat them in such a particular Manner: and when that Obligation ceaseth, they are suppos'd to fall again into promiscuous and ordinary Use. Yet if, still, any Man will positively maintain, that there are some Things, as well as Persons, which should be call'd moral, he must take care so to explain himself, that he may be understood to attribute this Morality to the Things, not formally, as if it were inherent, but only objectively, as it is terminated in them^e.

XVII. Thus much of those moral Entities which are conceiv'd with Analogy to Substance. We are now to enquire about those that are really and formally Modes, and pass in our Notion as such. Modes may be conveniently enough divided into^f Modes of Affection, and Modes of Estimation: According to the former, we suppose Persons to be affected in such and such a Manner; according to the latter, both Things and Persons may be rated and valu'd. The former fall under the Name of Quality, the latter of Quantity; if we take both those Terms in the most extended Sense. Qualities, so far as concerns our Business, may be divided into formal and operative. Formal Qualities are such as do not tend, nor are directed towards any Act or Work, but agree and are join'd with the Subject, in the Manner of pure and naked Forms: whence we may likewise call them simple Attributes. Operative Qualities are either primitive, or derivative. By the primitive, a Thing is conceiv'd fit and able for such an Act: They are divided into internal^g, and external^h, and may be term'd moral passive Qualities. The derivative are those which proceed from the primitive, and are theⁱ Acts themselves, as the former were the Powers.

XVIII. Among moral Attributes, Titles have a considerable Place, which are apply'd for the Distinction of Persons in civil Life, with Reference to their State and their Esteem. They are chiefly of two Sorts: Some directly signify the Degree of the Rate and Value, which Persons bear in common Account, together with the Qualities peculiar to Men of that Rank; but the State itself they only denote indirectly, and by the Bye, and

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

[†] The greatest Number of learned Men reject this Story, because (as they prove) S. Athanasius was eighteen Years old, when this pretended Baptism was administred. See the Life of this Father written by the Benedictines; but it is sufficient for our Author's Design, that the Fact was possible.

² A witty Speech of Antisthenes deserves our Notice in this Place. He advis'd the Athenians, upon a certain Time, to decree, That hereafter Asses should be call'd Horses. Some present replied in Banter, That can't be. But, Gentlemen, (says he) you can choose for your Generals Men that know nothing of warlike Affairs, and whose Qualifications consist only in having a greater Number of Voices, Diog. Laert. Lib. vi. §. 5. Edit. Amst.

³ The different Distinctions of Things in relation to Right, shall be explain'd in Lib. iv. and v. See the Instit. Lib. ii. Tit. i. & Digest. Lib. i. Tit. viii. De rerum Divisione, as also Mr. DAUMAR's Civil Laws, in their natural Order in the Preliminaries, Tit. iii.

⁴ Modi affectivi: Words hard to be translated. The French renders them, simple Modes; because, as our Author explains them, they only modify; i. e. dispose moral Persons.

⁵ Internal Qualities are such, as are really inherent in a Person, as Power, Right, Obligation; as also, such passive Qualities, of which our Author treats in §. 20. following. It were to be wish'd, that our Author had been clearer in his Divisions, which are not very Scholar-like.

⁷ Viz. These derivative Qualities are nothing but the Effect and actual Operation of the primitive Qualities. In a Word, our Author ought to have avoided all this Jargon and unprofitable Distinctions of the Schools.

that either more clearly, or more obscurely, according as such a Title is usually attributed to fewer, or to more States. Of this kind are those honorary Epithets, commonly prefixed to the Names of great Persons, as Marks of general Respect: As, The most Serene, The most Eminent, The most Illustrious: the Signification of which rises higher, or falls lower, according to the Condition of the Substantive to which they are join'd. Other Titles directly signify some particular State, or some peculiar Seat and Place in a State, but indirectly denote that Degree of Value and Repute, which usually accompanies such a State: as are the Names of moral Persons, of those especially who fill any Post of Honour. Now these Titles are not consider'd, as they are only Notions representing to one Man's Understanding the State and Office of another, but as, by Virtue of human Imposition, they declare the Power and Authority of the Person that enjoys them. So that 'tis not a vain Contention about empty Ceremonies, when Men frequently have such hot Disputes and Quarrels about Titles: because, upon the Denial of a Title, we are suppos'd at the same time to deny the State, the Office, the Power and the Rights, which such a Title generally expresses, or includes. But here we must be sure to observe, that the Imposition of most Titles is not perpetual and uniform; but in different Countries, and in the same Country at different Times, admits of very large Alterations. Thus the Titles of the first Kind which we mention'd (or the honorary Epithets) made use of by our Ancestors, how mean and little do they sound to the Ears of our own Age: while what was heretofore thought a worthy Mark for the greatest of mortal Men, shall now be despis'd by an inferior Scribler? For which reason the Increase of such Titles does not always argue the increase of Dignity; but when the Titles swell higher, while the Thing itself maintains its first Condition, their Value and Price is suppos'd to be considerably debas'd. Sometimes also a certain Title is affix'd by way of Elogy and Complement to some particular Order, because the Quality or Thing meant by that Title, is, or ought to be conspicuous in the Generality of the Members belonging to such an Order. And hence those Members, who are not really possess'd of the Thing, do however enjoy the Title¹. Thus in the Order of Men of Letters, many Persons are saluted with the Appellation of most famous, and most learned, who are as much any thing else in the World as what those Terms signify. And so too, an idle unactive Nobleman must have Industry, and Strength, and Valour applied to him in our Addresses. It happens likewise very commonly, that private Men, or others, either advance or diminish the Titles of Persons, as they judge it convenient for the present Condition of their Affairs to flatter and caress, or to despise and vilify them. And even in the latter Sort of Titles, as we above divided them, it frequently falls out, that the Title may continue, tho' the Thing itself, or the Dignity and Right be in a high manner either better'd or impair'd. And farther, 'tis very usual, that in different Countries the same Word shall express very different Degrees of Honour. And therefore it would argue a very unskillful Head, to place in the same Clais all those who bear the same Title all over the World². It must not be forgot, that sometimes a bare Title is attributed to a Man without the Thing, or without the Offices and the Profits which used to attend such a Title; only to this Intent, that he may hence obtain the external Ensigns and Badges of the Honour, and may acquire a more creditable Place and Seat in the Community of which he is a Member. Lastly, It is worth remarking, that chiefly in the Titles of the principal Houses of Europe, the same Title sometimes imports both the Family, and the Possession of the mention'd Territory; sometimes the Family only, without the Possession, yet with the Right of succeeding to it, according to the due Courte and Order of Inheritance.

XIX. *Moral operative Qualities*³ are either active or passive. Of the former the most noble Species are Power, Right, and Obligation. Power is that by which a Man is enabled to do a thing lawfully and with a moral Effect: which Effect is, That the Person exercising this Power, shall lay an Obligation on others to perform some certain Business, which he requires, or to admit some Action of his as valid, or not to stop and hinder it; or that he shall confer on others a License of doing or possessing something, which License they did not before enjoy. Whence it appears how wide this Quality runs, and how very diffusive it is of itself. Power, with respect to its Efficacy, is divided into perfect and imperfect. The former is that, the Exercise of which may be asserted even by Force, against those who endeavour unlawfully to let and oppose it. Now Force is chiefly applied, within the Bounds of the same Community, by an Action at Law, and without these Bounds by a War. The latter, or imperfect Power, is that, the Exercise of which if any Man is unlawfully prohibited, he may be said indeed to be inhumanly dealt with, yet he has no Right to defend it, either by Process of a Court, or by the Force of Arms, unless this Inefficacy or Imperfection is supplied with absolute Necessity. With respect to its Subject, Power is further divided into personal and communicable. The former is such as one Man cannot lawfully transfer to another. But then this must be consider'd under several Differences. For some Powers are

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. xviii, xix.

¹ Hence it is that Cicero calls Titles of Honour no certain Marks of Dignity. Lib. x. Epist. ad Famil. Ep. vi. and observes a little after, that during the Troubles of the Commonwealth, several Persons were honoured with the Titles of Consuls, who were altogether unfit for that Dignity, Consules dicti, sed nemo in Rempublicam consularis. See The Art of Thinking, Part ii. Ch. vii. §. 2. and The New Letters of Mr. BAYLE, on the Occasion of his general critical Remarks on MAIMBOURG'S History of Calvinism. Let. iv. §. 3, 4, 8.

² Vide Mr. LE CLERC'S Ars Crit. Tom. i. Part ii. Sect. i. Cap. 13.

⁴ As for Example, If a Man refuse to let us pass through his Ground, though we do him no Injury, and we can pass no other way, without great and manifest Danger, he is guilty of an inhuman Action towards us; which nevertheless does not license us to offer him any manner of Force; but if a Man finds himself attacked, and can't otherwise save his Life; as, when an Enemy prosecutes us furiously, then we may force a Passage. Pufend. Elem. Jurispr. Univers. p. 91. See also what he says, l. ii. c. 6.

so closely united with the Person, that the Acts belonging to them cannot rightly be exercised by another. Such is the Power of the Husband over the Body of his Wife, which no Laws allow him to discharge by a Deputy. In some again, tho' we cannot transfer the Possession, yet we may by Delegacy commit the Acts to the Administration of others; but in such a manner, that the whole Strength of their Authority must be deriv'd from him, in whom those Powers are originally seated. Of this kind is the power of such Kings as are constituted by the Will of the People: For they cannot transfer the Right of Reigning to another, and yet they may use the Service of Ministers for the Performance of the Acts belonging to that Right. Communicable Power is such as may be lawfully devolv'd upon others; and that either at the Pleasure of the Person so devolving it, or by the Authority or the Consent of a Superior ¹.

Lastly, In respect of the Objects, the Generality of Powers may be reduced to four Heads: For they regard either Persons or Things; and both these as they are either our own, or other Mens. A Power over our own Persons and Actions is called Liberty; ² the different Acceptations of which Word shall be hereafter discuss'd. This must not be conceiv'd as a distinct Principle from him who enjoys it, or as an Authority ³ of obliging himself to anything which is oppos'd by his Inclinations ⁴; but as a Licence to dispose of himself and of his Actions, according to his free Pleasure; which at the same time includes a Negation of any Impediment, proceeding from a superior Power. A Power over our own Things or Goods, is called ⁵ Property. A Power over the Persons of other Men, is properly Empire or Command ⁶. A Power over other Mens Things, is what the Civilians term Service.

XX. Right is that moral Quality by which we justly obtain either the Government of Persons, or the Possession of Things, or by the Force of which we may claim somewhat as due to us. The Latin Word Jus is a very wide and ambiguous Term: besides the Signification here used, it is taken for Law, and for ⁷ a System or Body of municipal Laws or Constitutions, and likewise for a ⁸ Sentence pronounc'd by a Judge. There seems to be this Difference between the Terms of Power and Right, that the first does more expressly import the Presence of the said Quality, and does but obscurely denote the Manner how any one acquir'd it. Whereas the Word Right does properly and clearly shew, that the Quality was fairly got, and is now fairly possess'd. Yet because the several kinds of Power have for the most part a peculiar Name, which * that Quality, by which we conceive something to be due to us, wants, we have thought it convenient to give it the name of Right in a peculiar manner, tho' we do not in other places abstain from its more common Signification, as may be observed in the following Parts of this Discourse. We place Right in the Class of active Qualities, as by virtue of it any thing may be requir'd of others. It may likewise be rank'd in the number of passive Qualities, as it impowers us lawfully to receive any thing from others. For moral passive Qualities are those by which we are said to do or suffer somewhat, or to admit and receive it. Of these there be three kinds: One according to which we rightly indeed admit something, but in such manner, that neither we our selves have any Power of exacting it, nor others any Obligation to give it: Such is the Ability of receiving a Gift purely under the Notion of a Gratuity. And that this Quality is not a mere Fandy and Fiction, is evident from this one Consideration, that it may be restrain'd by a Law. A Judge, for Example, may be debarr'd the Liberty of taking a Gift from Parties engag'd in a Suit, under what Colour or Pretence soever. A second Species is such as puts us in a Capacity of receiving something from another, not so, that we can force it from him against his Will, unless in Cases of Necessity; yet so, that he is oblig'd by some moral Virtue to pay or perform it. This ^b Grotius calls ⁸ Aptitude, or Desert. The third Species is that by which we are enabled to compel another to some Performance even against his Will, to which Performance he is likewise fully oblig'd by the Force of some Law ordaining a Penalty upon his Default. Here 'tis worth our remembring, that many Things in common reckoning pass under the Notion of Rights, which if we would speak accurately, we should rather call Compositions, made up of Power and Right, in the strict Sense of those Words: At the same Time involving, or supposing, some Obligation, some Honour, or the like. Thus the Right or Privilege of being a Citizen, contains both the Power of exercising with full Virtue all Acts peculiar to the ⁵ This Command or Authority is divided into, 1. Absolute, 2. Limited, see Lib. vii. Ch. vi. As also into, 1. Private, 2. Publick. The first is that with which private Persons are invested for the Management of their private Concerns, as such, to which may be referred the Authority of Parents over their Children; of Masters over their Slaves, or Servants; of an Husband over his Wife; of a Schoolmaster over his Scholars; of a Tutor over his Pupils, &c. The other is that which publick Persons are endowed with as such, for the Advantage of the civil Society. Puffend. Elem. Jur. Gr. Univ. p. 93, 94.

⁶ Thus the Collection made by the Command of Justinian, is called the Civil, or Roman Law; and in the same Sense this Book is entitled, The Right of Nature and Nations.

Members of that City, and also a Right of enjoying the Benefits proper to it, supposing in the Person an Obligation toward the Corporation. So, for Example, the Honours and Degrees of learned Men include both the Power of performing certain Actions proper to such a Dignity, and the Right of sharing in the Profits of their Order; to which Notion there is further added the height of Esteem and Respect, which accompanies their Place and Title.

XXI. An Obligation is that by which a Man is bound under a moral Necessity to perform, or admit, or undergo any thing. The several Kinds of Obligations † will be hereafter insisted on at large ^a.

There are also a sort of ^a moral patible Qualities, which are conceiv'd to affect the Understandings of Men in some certain manner: as in natural Qualities, those have obtain'd the Name of patible, which affect the Faculty of Sensation. Of this Order are Honour, Ignominy, Authority, Gravity, Fame, Obscurity, and the like.

XXII. It remains that we subjoin something about the Modes of Estimation, or the moral Quantities: For 'tis evident in common Life, that Persons and Things are rated, not only according to the Extension of their natural Substance, or according to the Intensity of their Motion, and their other natural Qualities, considered as they flow from the Principles of their Essence; but likewise according to another kind of Quantity, different both from physical and mathematical: And this Quantity arises from the Imposition and Determination of a rational Power. Now moral Quantity is met with first in Things, where it is called Price; secondly in Persons, where we term it Esteem; both which were included in the Notion of Value; and thirdly, in Actions, where it has not yet acquired ^a a peculiar Name. Of each Species we shall treat in its proper Place. What we have hitherto insisted on, about the Variety and Distinction of moral Entities, may seem sufficient to our present Design.

XXIII. We will only add this general Remark, That as moral Entities owe their Original to Imposition, so they draw their Continuance and their Changes from the same Cause; and when that once ceases, they immediately vanish, just as when we put out the Light, the shadow instantly disappears. Those which are made by divine Imposition, are not dissolv'd but by the divine Pleasure. Those which are fram'd at the Will of Men, are destroy'd by the same Power, without the least Alteration in the Persons or Things, as to their natural Substance. For tho' it implies a Contradiction in the Nature of Things, that what has been done already, should be made not to have been done; as that a Man, who has been Consul, should not have been Consul; yet we find every Day how easy 'tis to cause a Man not to be for the future what he has already been: and we see at the same time all the moral Entities that inher'd in such a Man, entirely defac'd, and leaving no real Footsteps behind. For 'tis impossible that a moral Entity should ever grow up to the Strength and Force of a natural Quality. Whence 'tis a very weak thing to believe, that when a Man is constituted such or such a Person, an indelible Character is imprinted on him barely by virtue of that moral Imposition: For thus, when a Commoner is created a Nobleman, he only acquires new Right, but does not at all change his Substance, or the Qualities founded in it: And if a Nobleman be degraded, he only forfeits the Rights of his Order; but the Benefits he holds from Nature, remain perfect and unimpair'd ^b.

IT has been an establish'd Persuasion among the Generality of learned Men, that moral Knowledge is destitute of that Certainty which is so famous in other Parts of Philosophy, and especially in the *Mathematicks*¹. The Foundation of their Notion is this: They take Mortality to be incapable of Demonstration, from whence only true Science, and free from the fear of Error, can proceed; but imagine that all its Evidence rises no higher than a probable Opinion. An Unhappiness that has been prodigiously injurious to the most noble Disciplines, and the most necessary to human Life. For, hence it came to pass, that Men of Wisdom and Parts were afraid of spending too much Labour in cultivating Notions which depended on so weak a Bottom: And the same Principle furnish'd those who were intirely idle and negligent about these Studies, with a fair Excuse; while they might alledge, that there was no firm and demonstrative Assurance to be had in such Disquisitions, but that they could only be prosecuted in a rude and unaccurate Manner. To which Aristotle contributed not a little, who in the common Judgment of the World, has arriv'd at the highest Pitch of moral Attainments, and left no farther Field for the succeeding Industry and Wit of Men. Aristotle then, as to the Truth of Ethicks, in his Treatise on that Subject, address'd to *Nicomachus*², delivers himself in the following Propositions: It must not be expected, that all Kinds of Things shall be explain'd with the same Accuracy. Honesty and Justice, which fall under the Consideration of³ civil Knowledge, have so many different Faces, and are liable to so many Mistakes, that they seem to be only instituted by Law, and not originally decreed by Nature. We shall therefore think it sufficient, when we discourse on such Heads, or when we argue from them, to shew the Truth in a ruder Manner, and under a kind of Shadow and Figure. It becomes a Man well instituted to require such Proof and such Explication of any Matter, as the Nature of the Thing will bear. For, it seems equally absurd, to demand Demonstrations from an Orator, and to let a Mathematician satisfy us with Probabilities³. We, for our Part, as we are not at all influenc'd by the Name of a single Philosopher; so we intend to enquire what Answers are to be return'd to the principal Arguments urg'd by him, and others, so soon as we shall have premis'd a Word or two concerning the Nature of Demonstration in general.

II. To demonstrate then, as we apprehend it, is syllogistically to deduce the necessary Certainty of any Matter propos'd from such Principles, as being its Causes, must needs make it known beyond Doubt and Dispute. Now, tho' 'tis manifest that there is such a Thing as we here define, and we see Instances of it every Day in mathematical Operations, to which no Man in his Wits ever denied the Art and Power of Demonstrating; yet from the false Exposition of two or three Words, it has happen'd that the greatest Number of Philosophers have committed a wretched Oversight in the Point, and have rashly excluded this noble Way of Proof from many Parts of Knowledge, which had a just Title to its Possession. The chief Occasion of the Error was this: They found it laid down for a Rule, That the Subject of a Demonstration ought to be necessary, which they interpreted, as if in a demonstrative Syllogism the Subject of the Conclusion, to which the Predicate was applied, ought always to be a Thing necessarily existent; as for Example, in that thread-bare Instance, Man is rational, therefore visible; the Subject of the Demonstration is Man, who must be own'd for a necessary Being⁴. But in Reality the Subject of Demonstration is not any

MR. BARB. NOTES.

² If we would know the Reasons, why it is falsely believed, that all demonstrative Knowledge borders upon mathematical Quantity, we need read nothing but Mr. LOCKE's excellent Work of Human Understanding, Lib. iv. Ch. ii. §. 9, 10, &c. and Chap. iii. §. 19, 20.

⁵ He does not mean, that Man has such an Existence that he can't but exist; for that's the Property of God only. The Existence of Man then is no otherwise necessary, than as God has determined to send him into the World, and that being supposed, he must exist till God destroys him.

one single Term, but some entire Proposition, the necessary Truth of which is from settled Principles syllogistically inferr'd. Where it signifies little, whether or no the Subject of this demonstrable Proposition necessarily exist; but 'tis sufficient, if granting its Existence such certain Affections necessarily agree to it, and if it can be made out, that they do thus agree to it, by undoubted Principles. Thus, a Mathematician never troubles himself to enquire, whether a Triangle be necessary or contingent, so long as he can demonstrate all the Angles of it to be equal to two Right ones. And therefore the Subject of Demonstration is only call'd necessary upon account of the necessary Connexion by which the Predicate cleaves to it in Conclusions of that Nature ¹.

III. But what kind of Propositions those ought to be, which we are to use in Demonstration, will appear from the Consideration of its End and Effect. That then, which we require by Demonstration, is Science, or a clear and certain Knowledge, every Way, and at all times constant to itself, and plac'd beyond the Fear of Mistake. What we have Science of (says * Aristotle) we imagine under an Impossibility of being otherwise.

Therefore 'tis necessary the Propositions should be true ² really and absolutely, and not upon Concession or Supposition. For, tho' from a Supposition laid down, a long Chain of Conclusions may be drawn; yet 'tis impossible that, being deriv'd from a precarious Principle, the Streams should not relish of the Fountain. And tho' we should make the two most contradictory Suppositions in Nature, one of which must of Necessity be true; yet we can by this Means only prove for certain τὸ ὄντι, as the Logicians call it, or that the Matter is really so: for τὸ διὰ τι, or the Reason why it is so, requires, as an indispensable Condition, the Firmness of the precedent Hypothesis. The Propositions of Demonstration must likewise be the first and the highest that can be, so as to want no further Proof, but to deserve Credit upon their own Evidence; or, however, so as at last to be reducible to some first Truth. For as some Propositions are plac'd at a less, and some at a greater Distance from the first Principles; so we must not imagine that every Demonstration can be finish'd in a single Syllogism, but we must carry on the Argument from the Proposition to be demonstrated, till we arrive at the first Principle, on which it depends. For, they are not the only Masters of Reasoning, who are so very quick and expert at their quicquid, their atqui, and their ergo; but those also, who beginning at evident Principles, understand how to frame an Argument by a just Train of necessary Consequences. Another Requisite in such Propositions is, that they be immediate ³; that is, that they flow immediately from one another, without any Gap or Interruption. For, a demonstrative Argument should be work'd up in the manner of a Chain, the Propositions being knit within one another, like so many Links; so that if any one Link breaks, or proves deficient, the whole Frame must dissolve and fall in Pieces. Lastly, 'tis necessary that the Propositions in Demonstration be the Causes of the Conclusion, as containing the Reason why in such a Conclusion the Predicate necessarily agrees to the Subject ⁴.

IV. This being premis'd, it is farther observable, that tho' 'tis a Thing common to all moral Discipline not to take up with a bare Theory, but to pass into Use and Practice, yet there is a vast Difference to be discover'd between the two Principal of them; of which one is concern'd about the Rectitude of human Actions, in order to Laws; the other about the dextrous Government of our own, and of other Mens Actions, for the Security and the Benefit of ourselves, and more especially of the Publick. For this latter Part of Ethicks ought to be rank'd under the Name of Prudence, which Aristotle defines; A Habit, active according to Reason, about the Good and Evil that can happen to a Man. Whence he thus settles the Duty of a prudent Person: It seems to me to be the Property of a Man of Prudence, to take right Consultations about those Things which are good for him, and of universal Use in well living. And these Opinions he builds upon Axioms drawn from the accurate Observation and Comparison of human Manners and Events. But those Axioms do not appear so very firm and evident, as to be the Ground of infallible Demonstration, as well upon account of the wonderful Frailness and Inconstancy that occurs in the Wits and Tempers of Men, as because the Events of Affairs are frequently turn'd in a little Moment, and driven to a Result quite contrary to our Intentions

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ So that though the Actions of Men, and all other moral Entities, do not necessarily exist, but depend upon the free Determination of our Understanding; yet if we suppose certain Relations between Deeds which are actually produced, or may exist, and a Rule with which we may compare them, some Right and Obligation will as necessarily follow from thence, as supposing a Triangle, it follows, that its three Angles are equal to two Right ones.

and Expectations^a. Nor is human Subtily in the Applications of these Rules and Maxims baffled only by such unlook'd for Accidents and Occurrences; but the divine Wisdom is pleas'd often to interpose, and to elude the craftiest Stratagems, and the best contriv'd Plots of mortal Designs. And therefore the ablest Managers of Affairs aspire not to act always with strict Demonstration of Success^b, but when they have apply'd the most sage Circumspection, and the most piercing Forecast, they commit the Issue to Providence and Fate. For tho' generally we may know what can possibly happen, tho' we may compare these possible Events together, tho' we may determine for certain, not only which of two Possibilities is of greater, and which of lesser Value, supposing them now to exist; but also what Effect can proceed from more, what from fewer Causes, either now in being, or hereafter to be: and tho' we may conclude that Effect, which can be produc'd by most Causes and Ways, to have the highest Degree of Probability, and therefore best to deserve our Hopes and Expectations^c; yet all Possibilities do not occur to the Mind at all Times and Places; or, if they do, are not always rightly weigh'd and consider'd: and by reason of strange and sudden Accidents, which could scarcely have been foreseen, many Things, which we at first thought to be most possible, or the most likely to fall out, when we come to the Point, appear quite otherwise than we before imagin'd them. Hence, in prudential Managements most Men think it sufficient to follow that Rule of Aristotle^d: We ought no less to hearken to the undemonstrated Declarations and Opinions of skilful, of antient, or of wise Men, than to Demonstration itself: for such Persons found their sight of Things on Experience, and so look into the very Principles of Action. But let others fight out this Prize^e. As for the former and more noble Species, which we assign'd to moral Discipline, that which considers what is Right, and what Wrong in human Actions, the best Share of which^f will be illustrated in our present Attempt; this is built altogether on so sure Grounds, that we thence draw genuine Demonstrations, able to produce true and solid Science: Or, in other Words, its Decrees may be in such a Manner deriv'd from certain Principles, as to leave no Room, no Excuse for Doubt^g. Whatever contributes to the improving of our Virtue, or of our Happiness, Nature hath taken Care to lay either directly before us, or at a very easy Distance for our Search. This Assertion will be more clearly made out, if we in the first Place consider and examine the Arguments usually alledg'd to the contrary. But, by the way, we acknowledge Mr. Hobbes^f to have been extremely mistaken, when he contends, that 'Ethicks and Politicks are therefore capable of a Demonstration à priori, i. e. by Reasons drawn from the Nature of the Thing; because we ourselves are the Authors of the Principles of Justice and Injustice, of Right and Wrong, by making those Laws and Compacts whence the Measures of Justice are to be taken: since before any such Laws or Compacts were instituted, there was no such Thing as Justice or Injustice, publick Good or Evil, among Men, any more than among Beasts'^g. The absolute Falseness of which Position we shall hereafter^h have Occasion to demonstrate; as there is also a Fallacy lurking under the word Publick.

V. To proceed therefore to the Objections: Some affirm moral Things in general to be uncertain and unstable; and no Science can be of a more firm and settled Nature than the Object about which it is employ'd. To which it may be answer'd, That tho' moral Entities owe their Original to Imposition, and therefore cannot be call'd Necessary in an absolute Sense; yet they do not proceed from such loose and wandering Principles, as that on this Account all Knowledge about them should be weak and uncertain. For, the very Nature of Man, assign'd him by the Wisdom and Goodness of the Almighty Creator, requir'd the Institution of the chief Part of them; and these at least cannot be said to be unsettled and uncertain. This will appear beyond Dispute, when we come to enquire into the Origin of the Law of Nature. Besides, human Actions are chiefly on this account call'd Moral, because they are not necessary, but free;

^a 'Tis not barely the Event of Things (says Fabius in Livy, Lib. xxii. Ch. xxxix.) which communicates this Knowledge, for that is only as the Instructor of Fools: but it is the same immutable Reason which was, and will be so as long as the World continues in its present Condition. ^b Vide 2 Sam. x. 12. ^c Vide D. Cumberland De. L. Nat. Ch. iv. §. 4. n. 4. ^d Ethic. Lib. vi. Ch. xii. ^e Senec. De Benef. Lib. vii. Ch. vii. ^f De Homine, Ch. x. ^g Ch. vii. §. 13. and Lib. viii. Ch. i. §. 5.

MR. BARB. NOTES.

^f See Montagne's Essays, Lib. i. Ch. xxiii. P. 76. in fol. And Charron, Of Wisdom, Lib. iii. Ch. i. Here also we may observe, that some Events are not probable sometimes, according to the Sense of an antient Poet, cited by Aristotle, Rhetor. Lib. ii. Ch. xxiv. Τὰς δὲ τῶν εὐχῶν, &c. Any Man may assert it as a Probability, That many unlikely Things befall Men. See Mr. Bayle's Histor. and Critical Diction. Tom. i. P. 94.

^g In the ordinary Course of Life we must not expect a clear Evidence, but are obliged, for the most part, to act by Probabilities. It is a judicious Maxim of Descartes's, and, long before him, laid down by Seneca: We must not expect a certain Knowledge of the Truth, which is hard to find out; but we must follow Probabilities. All our Actions are grounded on this. So we sow, sail, marry, &c. tho' we know the Event uncertain. We go, where Reason, not Truth leads: If we tarry till we can know what will happen well, and what is certain Truth, we may sit still for ever. I will not fear to follow Probabilities. Sen. de Benef. Lib. iv. Ch. xxxiii. Arnobius has a like Passage, in the Place where he answers the Pagans Objections against the Faith of Christians.

^h It is certain, that Politicks, as well as Physick, is a conjectural Science, as Mr. Bayle expresses himself, in his Reply to the Question of a Province, Tom. i. P. 570. But whatever that famous Philosopher says, who, according to his Custom, pretends to gather from thence some Arguments for Scepticism, P. 565. yet if he would seriously examine true Politicks, he would find that most of its Principles and Maxims have a Certainty in them, which comes very near a Demonstration; and as to those Things which look like Problems, their Obscurity proceeds rather from the Difficulty of Application, Ignorance of some Circumstances, or Want of Attention, than any absolute Impossibility to establish a Rule of Certainty concerning them. See what Mr. Hertius speaks here, and the Discourse of Mr. Buddeus, De Scepticismo Morali, §. 26. The Boasting of the Scepticks proceeds from the Observation of the Behaviour of bad Politicians, and ambitious Sovereigns, and not from the Principles and Maxims which arise from the natural Design of civil Government, and the publick Good, separate from the private Interest of some Persons.

ⁱ Our Author nevertheless explains the fundamental and principal Questions of Politicks in the two last Books of this Work.

^k For, some pretend that the Determination of what is morally Good or Evil, depends upon the Will of the Sovereign.

yet from hence it does not follow, that upon the laying down of certain Principles, such Affections may agree to these Actions, as may be undoubtedly demonstrated concerning them. For 'tis evident, that the Acts which fall under the Conduct of the Law of Nature, do in themselves contain an intrinsic Force and Power, directing towards a sociable Life, tho' the actual Exercise of them depends on the Free-will of Man. While we deliberate, we are properly said to be free, and the Effects which are to proceed from our Actions are, with Respect to the Freedom, rightly term'd Contingent: but when we have once determin'd which way to act, the Connection between our Actions and the depending Effects is necessary and natural, and consequently capable of Demonstration. Neither do they argue any Thing to the Purpose, who deny the Possibility of passing a clear Judgment on human Deeds, upon Account of the great Variety of Circumstances, any one of which seems to put a new Face, and a new Quality on the Action; whence it happens, that Legislators can seldom frame such a Law as shall admit of no Exception, and where there shall not be frequent Occasion to neglect the Letter of the Statute, and to have Recourse to Equity for Relief. Because indeed there are establish'd Principles, by which it may be shewn how much Weight and Force any Circumstance bears in affecting, or varying any Action. And these very Principles are the Occasion, that Law-givers are frequently less anxious about excepting from their Decrees some particular Cases involv'd in extraordinary Circumstances^a, but proceed with more Security in the Use of general Words. For they take it for granted, that the Judges, whose Duty it is to examine particular Actions by the Rule of the Law, will be very well able to understand what Power any Circumstance has over any Fact^{a 2}. But hence it cannot be infer'd, that constant and perpetual Decrees sometimes fail; but we ought rather to conclude, that

'tis not worth while for Legislators, in their written Laws, to prescribe any Thing about Cases that very rarely happen, since such may be easily determin'd by the Judges out of the Principles of the Law of Nature.

VI. But to make the Knowledge of the Law of Nature, of which we are now treating, and which includes all moral and civil Doctrines that are genuine and solid, to make this Knowledge, we say, fully come up to the Measure and Perfection of Science, we do not think it necessary to assert, with some Writers, that there are several Things honest or dishonest of themselves^b and antecedent to all Imposition, and so to make these Things the Object of our natural and perpetual Law, in Opposition to positive Laws, where Matters are Right or Wrong, just as the Law-giver was pleas'd to make them either. For, since Honesty (or moral Necessity) and Turpitude are Affections of human Deeds, arising from their Agreeableness or Disagreeableness to a Rule, or a Law; and since a Law is the Command of a Superior, it does not appear how we can conceive any Goodness or Turpitude before all Law, and without the Imposition of a Superior^c. And truly, as for those who would establish an eternal Rule for Morality of the Actions, without Respect to the Divine Injunction and Constitution, the Result of their Endeavours seems to us to be the joining with GOD Almighty some coeval extrinsecal Principle, which He was oblig'd to follow, in assigning the Forms and Essences of Things. Besides, 'tis acknowledg'd on all Hands, that GOD created Man, as well as every Thing else, according to his own Free-will. From whence it evidently follows, that it must needs have been his Power and Pleasure to endue this Creature with whatever Kind of Nature his Wisdom thought fit. And how then should it come to pass, that the Actions of Mankind should be vested with any Affection or Quality proceeding from intrinsic and absolute Necessity, with-

^a And hence chiefly we are to draw the Reason of it, §. 3, 4, 5, 6. de Legib. Laws are to be enacted, as Theophrastus us'd to say, with Regard to Things, as they most commonly fall out, not as they sometimes happen beside Expectation. Little particular Cases and accidental Exceptions are not worth the Notice of a Legislator. ^b Add. D. Cumberland de Legg. N. Ch. iv. §. 4. n. 1. ^c Selden de J. N. & G. Lib. i. Ch. 4.

MR. BARB. NOTES.

¹ By these Principles (adds this Author) the following Maxims of the Roman Lawyers are to be explained: Laws are to be made (says Theophrastus) about such Things as commonly happen, and not about such Things as fall out unexpectedly and by Chance: For what happens once or twice, Lawgivers pass over. Dig. Lib. i. Tit. iii. De Legibus, Senatuf. cons. & longâ consuetudine, Leg. iii. i. e. In a Word, Laws are made about Things that commonly happen, and not for extraordinary Cases, which may fall out once or twice by Chance. See Aristot. Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. v. Ch. xiv. and what is said Lib. v. Ch. xii. §. 16 and 21 following.

² We must own, that because of this infinite Variety of Circumstances, we can hardly come to a final Decision in our Examination of all particular Cases; yet that does not at all shake our moral Certainty, nor lessen the Use of it; for the Impossibility of doing any Thing without us, either by the Use of our Senses, or with the Help of Instruments, as to make a single Line perfectly right, a single Surface exactly round or plain, a single Body compleatly regular, or whatever else may be reduced to the like Nature; such an Impossibility (I say) can't destroy the Truth or Benefit of the Principles of Geometry, concerning the Measure of Lines, Superficies, and Solids. It is sufficient that they come so very near Exactness, that nothing considerable can be desired to make them useful to us; and so we may arrive at our Ends as well by the Principles of Morality, as by those of Geometry. It is true nevertheless, that Things moral, such as God and Man, with their mutual Acts and Relations, can't be known so distinctly and exactly, as mathematical Questions, and so moral Conclusions can't be so perfectly known. But as to the Method, Rules of Demonstration, and inferring one Thing from another, they are all exactly the same in Geometry and Morality; and there is no more Need of an absolute Exactness for the Use of Life, than to measure the Distance of Place, or Extent of a Field. Cumberland. De Legib. Nat. Ch. iv. §. 4. n. 1. It is thought necessary to give the Reader this Passage entire, which our Author only refers to.

³ To remove all Equivocations, and leave no Place for Cavil, we ought to observe, That we must own Things honest or dishonest of themselves, or in their own Nature, 1. By Way of Opposition to human Appointment, as the Agreements or Opinions of Men. 2. In Respect of the Subject, with Relation to which they are thought so. As for Example, There are some Acts which agree to GOD no way, i. e. which he can't do without derogating from his Perfections, and so contradicting himself. There are Actions also, which of themselves agree, or disagree with the human Nature in our present State. But if we understand that an Action is honest, or dishonest in its own Nature, without any Relation to the Appointment of GOD, or the Laws which GOD hath imposed upon us by our Creation, in this Sense the Proposition is false. Specim. Controvers. Ch. v. §. 7 See Lib. ii. Ch. iii. §. 4, 5. following.

out Regard to the Institution, and to the good Pleasure of the Creator ¹? So that in reality, all the Motions and Actions of Men, upon setting aside all Law, both divine and human, are perfectly indifferent ²: And some of them are therefore only said to be naturally honest or dishonest, because that Condition of Nature, which GOD has freely bestow'd on Man, strictly enjoins the Performance or the Omission of them ³. Not that any Morality inheres of itself, and without all Law, in the bare Motion, or the meer Application of natural Power ⁴: And therefore we see Beasts every Day doing such Things without Fault or Sin, in committing which Man would have been guilty of the highest Wickedness. Yet are not the natural Motions of Men and of Beasts in themselves different, but some Actions of Men are by the Authority of a Law invest'd with a moral Quality, which does not at all touch or affect the Proceedings of Brutes.

Nor will it be to the Purpose for any one to object, That since Men are endu'd with Reason, which is wanting in Beasts, therefore there must be a natural Difference between human and brutal Actions. For, if we consider Reason, as uninform'd with the Knowledge and Sense of Law, or of some moral Rule, it might perhaps even in this Condition, furnish Man with the Faculty of acting more expeditiously and more accurately than Beasts, and might assist the natural Powers by an additional Shrewdness or Subtily. But that it should be able to discover any Morality in human Actions, without reflecting on some Law, is equally impossible, as that a Man born blind should make a Judgment on the Distinction of Colours ⁴.

Another Argument in favour of our Opinion is suggest'd by Ostander, in his Notes on Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis, p. 60. If (says he) there were any such Thing as moral Good or Evil before all Law, how could there be any Obligation to make such a Difference in our Actions, since all Obligation proceeds from the Command of a Superior? For moral Good or Evil involve a Respect to a Person acting either of those ways; and if that Person be determin'd by no Obligation, he cannot be said properly to act well or ill.

But here we desire it should be well observ'd, That this Indifference of the natural Motion in human Actions is by us maintain'd and establish'd only in respect to Morality: For otherwise Actions enjoin'd by the Law of Nature have, from the Determination of the first Cause, a native Force in themselves of producing Effects good and useful to Mankind; as Actions forbidden by the same Law are productive of contrary Effects. But this Goodness and Illness, which an Action bears naturally and of itself, can never constitute any new Thing in Morals, which are quite beyond its Reach and Concern. For there are many Things highly conducing to the Happiness and Advantage of a Man, which are not morally good, as neither being voluntary Deeds, nor Performances of any Law ⁵; and many Actions which contribute to human Welfare, do in the same manner promote the Benefit of Beasts, in whom certainly they cannot bear any moral Quality. Thus the abstaining from mutual Hurt, the moderate use of Meat and Drink, the Care of Progeny or Off-spring, are equally serviceable in the Preservation of rational and of irrational Kinds; and yet Beasts are never said to perform Actions morally good ⁶. So tho' all human Actions falling under the Guidance of the Law of Nature, may be finally resolv'd into that natural Strength and Force which they bear in advancing the Profit or the Harm of Men ⁶, consider'd either in a single or in an united State; yet it does not follow on the other Hand, that whatever Thing is endued with a natural Power of doing good or harm to any Species of Animals, is therefore the Object of the same Law.

Another Objection against the Doctrines we are now establishing, is taken from that Passage in Aristotle's Ethics ⁷: Every Action and every Affection does not admit a Mediocrity: For there are some Affections which involve a kind of Pravity in their very Name, as Malice, Impudence, and Envy, and ὄνειδος, or rejoicing at another Man's Misfortune; and likewise some Actions, as Adultery, Theft, and Murder. Now these and the like being evil directly and in their own Natures, are not called Vices with relation to any Excess or Defect; for absolutely, and without any Degrees to be guilty of them, is to commit Sin. But 'tis by no means a good Consequence, that because we have some Names of Actions or Affections, which of themselves, and without any Excess or Defect, ¹ PLATO in Sympoſ. This is the Nature of every Action, to be in itself neither good nor vicious; as what we are now doing, drinking, singing, arguing. Neither of these, consider'd by itself, is honest or dishonest; but the Manner of performing it gives every Action its proper Denomination. For what is done right, we call good, and what is done wrong, evil or indecent. The same Rule the Philosopher afterwards applies to Love. ² Such are a Quick Apprehension, Knowledge, Memory, &c. ³ Add. D. Cumberland, De L. N. Ch. v. §. 9.

² This will appear more plain from this Consideration: There are some Actions, in which the physical Motion is entirely the same, but the Morality is very different; the one being accounted good, or at least allowable, the other evil and unlawful: As for Example; To kill a Man is a Wickedness in a Thief, but a good Action, or at least an allowable one, in an Executioner, a Soldier, or a Person that fights in his own Defence, &c. so that the Action in itself may be reckon'd altogether indifferent.

³ PLATO, in his Treatise of Banquets, speaks to the same Effect. The Nature of all our Actions is such, that they are neither honest nor dishonest in themselves, as to drink, sing, discourse, and such like Actions; but 'tis the Manner of doing, that denominates the Action; for what we do well, and according to our Duty, is honest, but what we do ill is dishonest.

⁵ Such are (saith Bishop Cumberland, De Leg. Nat. Ch. v. §. 9.) a Quickness of Wit, Knowledge of speculative Sciences and divers Arts, an happy Memory, Strength of Body, the Help of outward Things, &c.

imply Vice; therefore there are some Actions and Affections bad in themselves, without Respect to any Law: because these Terms or Names do not signify bare natural Motions and Acts, but such entire moral Motions and Acts, as are repugnant to some Law, and so take in and express the whole Compass of a moral Deed^a. For why, for Example, are Envy and its vile Consequents, which we but now mention'd under the Greek Name of ἐπιχαιρεκακία, reputed evil Affections, but because the Law of Nature ordains, that a Man should never be a Stranger to his own Kind, but should bear a Part in the Pleasures and in the Sorrows of his Neighbours; to which Rule it is an open Contradiction, to receive any Joy from the Calamity of others, and to repine at their Happiness and Success^b? And so what else is Impudence, but a wicked Firmness and Hardiness of Mind in the Commission of such Things as the Law bids him be ashamed of? For not to be ashamed, or not to blush, can never be a Fault, when we are not by some Law suppos'd and enjoin'd to do otherwise. After the same Manner, Adultery is the Pollution of another Man's Wife, whom the Laws appropriate to her Husband. Theft is the taking away of another Man's Goods, against the Consent of the Owner, who by the Law is made the sole Disposer of them. Murder is the killing of a Person in his Innocence, and against the Laws. Incest is a Conjunction with such a Person as the Laws oblige us to abstain from, upon account of the Reverence which Men are by Law likewise taught to pay to Nearness of Blood. And the same Judgment is to be made of other Vices. But now, if from all these you take away the Respect to the Law, and the Morality inherent in such Actions, the bare natural Fact will involve no Absurdity or Contradiction: For in a natural and absolute Sense these are altogether indifferent Things; to have Conjunction with your nearest Relation, or with the same Woman who is enjoy'd by another, supposing he has no peculiar Right to her, as he cannot have without Law; to take away the Life of a Creature of the same Species with your self; to take a Thing which another Man had design'd for his Use, tho' he had obtain'd no Right by Law to exclude others from their Share in it, or possession. And the Reason why so few Persons can conceive and apprehend such a natural Inconvenience as we are maintaining, is only this, because from our Infancy, we are taught to detest such Practices; and this Abhorrence being imprinted on our tender Minds, seems to grow into a kind of natural Judgment; so that it seldom enters into Mens Heads to distinguish between the Materiality and the Formality of those Actions, or between our Performance of them as natural, and our Commission of them as moral Agents^c. Hence it appears that Grotius had not consider'd this Matter thoroughly^d, when among those Things to which the Power of GOD himself does not extend, because they involve a manifest Contradiction, he reckons^e the Malignity of some human Actions. Indeed 'tis impossible that twice two should not make four, because twice two and four are really the same Thing, and only differ in Name, and in our Manner of conceiving them. But the Contradiction which appears in Actions repugnant to Nature's Law, is of a much lower Degree, and can never rise to an absolute Impossibility. And upon the same Account he derives this Malignity from such Actions as compar'd with right Reason: For in the very Terms of right Reason, when apply'd to Man, there inheres a Respect to the Law of Sociableness enjoin'd to human Race by the Creator. Thus at the same rate he alledges^f for a Proof of the Independency of some of Nature's Laws, the necessary Agreement and Disagreement of Things to rational and social Nature. But Man obtain'd a social Nature from the good Pleasure of GOD ALMIGHTY, not from any immutable Necessity; and consequently the Morality of Actions, agreeable or disagreeable to him as a social Creature, must be deriv'd from

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

^a It is true, that we sometimes confound the positive Idea and physical Action with its moral Relation, though they are really two very distinct Things. As for Example, To drink Wine, or any other strong Liquor, till we lose the Use of our Reason, is that which we call Drunkenness; but as that Word imports, in its ordinary Use, a moral Turpitude in the Action contrary to a Law, Men are obliged to condemn every Thing that hath a Tendency to that, which we call Drunkenness, as an evil Action, and contrary to the moral Law; but if a Man happen to have his Brain disturbed, by drinking a certain Quantity of Wine, which was prescribed him as a Medicine for the Recovery of his Health, though we may call such an Action Drunkenness, considering it as a Name of a mixt Nature, yet 'tis plain, that if we compare it with the Law of GOD, our supream Rule, 'tis no Sin, nor a Transgression of that divine Law, though Drunkenness is ordinarily taken in that Sense. Mr. Locke's Essay of the human Understanding, Lib. ii. Ch. xxviii. §. 16. There is a great Use of this Remark in the Question of Lying, which is treated on, Lib. iv. Ch. i.

^b Here's a tacit Answer to an Objection that may be offered. There are some Men that have as natural an Abhorrence of some Vices, as others have of Meats. Now such an Horror being a kind of natural Motion, or Passion, it seems that our Sense of the Turpitude of such an Action ought to be looked upon as a natural Quality, and not as a moral one, resulting from the Law of GOD. This Difficulty is specious, and the Author seems to give it an Answer, which, that we may understand, let us unfold his Words; Custom being a second Nature, as the Proverb is, it happens that some Persons, of a more elevated Genius, conceive, from their Cradle, such an Horror against some Vices of a more heinous Nature, that they retain it the rest of their Lives. This sort of Antipathy proceeds more from a confused and indeliberate Thought, than a distinct Knowledge and Reasoning about the Contrariety of those Vices to the Law. As for Example, It is certain, that in the first Ages of the World, Marriages between Brother and Sister were in Use, and authorized by the Disposition of human Affairs at that Time, so that the most of our Divines and Lawyers acknowledge the Prohibition of these sort of Marriages to be only of positive Right; nevertheless, the Usage of them being long since abolished by most Nations, Men have entertained so great an Aversion to them, not only because they are forbidden by their Laws, but upon the Account of the Impressions of their Education, that they look upon it as a monstrous Thing for a Brother and Sister to have a carnal Love one for another. And it seems as if their Senses were lock'd up in that Respect, for we may see young Men converse all their Days with their Sisters of extraordinary Beauty, and yet be under no Temptation, though very amorous towards others of their Sex. Such as have these Impressions regard not the Laws, nor the physical Motion of the Action, but are strongly persuaded that they arise from a Turpitude in the Action, as contrary to the Nature of Man, as excessive Cold, or Heat, Grief, or other physical Qualities destructive to his Being. Puffend. Letters & Specim. Controv. Ch. v. §. 5. See Plato, cited Lib. v. Ch. iv. §. 3. Note 4. and Plutarch, De Virtut. Moral. Tom. ii.

the same Original and Spring; and must be attributed to Man, not by an absolute, but by an hypothetical Necessity; or upon Supposal of that Condition which GOD was pleas'd freely to bestow on Mankind above the Privileges of the inferior Creation. Nor can this Opinion of Grotius find any Shelter or Protection in those Places of Scripture which he quotes to shew, that GOD ALMIGHTY permits himself to be judg'd according to the original Laws, and therefore they must be absolutely immutable: For without doubt GOD declar'd to Mankind from the very Beginning of Things, that he would be a Rewarder of the Good, and an Avengeur on the Wicked, Heb. xi. 6. and that he would render unto every Man according to his Works, Rom. ii. 6. From which Declaration his Veracity not permitting him to go back, Abraham had Reason to make that Appeal which we find Gen. xviii. 25. Shall not the Judge of all the Earth do right? But how does it follow hence, that ' human Actions have any moral Quality antecedent to the divine Imposition? Nor does it at all appear how the same Conclusion can be drawn from the fifth Chapter of Isaiah, where GOD is pleas'd to refer the Cause between him and his Vineyard, to the Judgment of Israel and Judah, and concludes, that he may lawfully neglect the farther Care and Culture of it, since the degenerate Fruit made so ill a Return to his Pains. And lastly, from that Place in the sixth of Micah, where GOD is said to have a Controversy with his People, and to reason with Israel, it seems to be hinted, that Men may by their own Judgment understand the Equity of returning Thanks for Benefits receiv'd; but we cannot thence infer, that, because Men who have a Sense of Kindness, are oblig'd to be grateful, therefore this Gratitude is not commanded by any Law, but is of itself, before all Law, a necessary Duty. From all that we have urg'd on this Head, it may appear, that the Sentence which is frequently in the Mouths of most Men, ^a That the Precepts of natural Law are of eternal Verity, is so far to be restrain'd and limited, that this Eternity ought to reach no further than the Imposition and Institution of GOD ALMIGHTY, and the Origin of human Kind. Tho' to say the Truth, the Eternity which we improperly attribute to the Laws of Nature, is only to be rated in Proportion to the Opposition they bear to positive Laws, these being subject to frequent Alterations, while those remain fixt and unchangeable.

VII. It may be farther objected, and with some Face of Probability among vulgar Judges, That Honesty and Turpitude must needs inhere in some human Actions of themselves, and by the Force of their own Nature, not by the Power of external Imposition; for this Reason, because our very Blood seems to have a natural Sense of wicked Deeds, which it expresses by spreading a sudden Redness over the Face, whensoever we are touch'd, either with the Memory of them, or with the Reproach. Now they say 'tis very improper to attribute a natural Effect to a moral Quality; but, on the contrary, that since such a certain Motion of the Blood raising a Redness in the Face, results in the Manner of a natural Effect from an ill Action, that Illness or Pravity must likewise be applied to the Action, as a natural and a necessary Affection or Quality. In return to which, in the first Place, we confess that the most wise Creator has implanted in the Minds of Men the Passion of Shame, to serve as it were for a Guard and Defence to Virtue, and for a Bridle to wicked Designs. And it is likewise probable, that unless GOD had design'd Man for an Agent, who was to frame his Proceedings by a Law, he would never have mingled such a Passion in human Constitution, since without that Supposition it does not appear to be of any Use at all in the World. But indeed it is no manner of Contradiction, that a moral Quality owing its Original to Institution, should produce in Man (tho' not directly and immediately) a natural Effect: For ^b the Soul being united by the closest Ties to the Body, while itself apprehends moral Concerns, and is affected with them, may at the same Time easily raise a peculiar Motion in some Part of the Body. Besides, we ought to observe, that Shame does not only arise from the Pravity of Actions, but also from any Fact, tho' not morally evil, which we think will lessen our Character and Esteem: For, according to Des Cartes's Definition, it is nothing else but a Species of Sorrow, founded upon Self-love, and proceeding from a Sense or Fear of Disgrace: Or, as Aristotle speaks ^c, it is a certain Grief and Confusion at Things which appear hurtful to our Reputation: For, Man is a most ambitious Creature, and highly conceited of his own Excellency, whence he takes an extraordinary Pleasure, if he can find out any Advantage or Perfection in himself, on the Strength of which he may brag, and swell, and carry himself above the Dimensions of his Neighbours. And whenever he apprehends these Talents to be the least impair'd, and to weigh lighter in common Account, he immediately conceives the deepest Regret in his own Mind. Now the Heart, that chief Seat of human Excellency, being affected with this Passion, presently sends up the Blood to be an

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ What Grotius infers from hence is no direct Consequence. He alledges these Passages, to prove, that GOD contents that Men may judge (as we may say) of his Conduct, by the Principles of the Duties he imposes on them, to which he himself conforms, as much as the great Distance between the Creature and Creator will permit. See the Discourse of Mr. Noodt, Of the Power of Sovereigns, with the Note of the French Translator, printed, A. D. 1707.

² Those who have first spoken of the Eternity of the Laws of Nature, must mean it in Opposition to the Novelty and frequent Changes of the Civil Laws; for they assert only, that natural Light had not its Beginning in the Times of Minoas, Solon, or Lycurgus, but existed before any civil Society, and is as antient as Mankind. Further, That this Right is not subject to change, as Civil Laws are, which are abolished according to the Necessities of a State, or the Humour of Sovereigns; but it remains the same in all Times and Places, and shall end only with Mankind. In fine, 'Tis no ways necessary to maintain, that the Law of Nature is co-eternal with GOD; for since it has no Regard to him, and is only contrived for Men, on whom it is imposed; to what Purpose is it to suppose, that it had a Being before Men? But if we say, that he had them from all Eternity in his Prescience, we attribute nothing thereby to the Law of Nature, but what's common to every Thing that exists. Pufend. Apolog. §. 26.

³ See the Passage of PLUTARCH, §. 6. Note 10, and what goes before and follows it.

outward Sign of it in the Face. But because^a Man does not only value himself upon Account of abstaining from Evil Deeds, but for several other Things, which are not endued with any moral Quality, if he suffer in any of these latter Points, he is equally liable to Shame: Thus we see many Persons who cannot forbear blushing at their Lameness, or Baldness; at a Wen, a Crump-back, or any other Deformity of Body; at some particular Diseases; at Poverty; bad Cloaths; at faultless Ignorance, or at harmless Mistakes, and at^b many other Things, which are by no Means morally Evil^c. And among Sins, those especially put a Man to the Blush, which directly argue a Lowness and Dejection of Mind, and which for that Reason make us appear more contemptible^d; nor has the Fear of this Contempt the same general Power, but only when we are in Danger of suffering it from those Persons, whose Esteem and good Opinion we are particularly covetous of enjoying. And those desperate Wretches who have once sinned themselves out of all Care of Credit, are not afterwards^e touch'd with the least Blush, upon the Commission of the vilest Wickedness^f. Whatever we have urg'd against the natural, the absolute, and the necessary Goodness or Pravity of human Deeds, does not at all seem to rob moral Knowledge of its requisite Certainty, for this would remain fixt and unmov'd, tho' the Morality of our Actions depended entirely on Imposition.

VIII. But if this Doctrine be true which we have asserted, what will become of that moral Latitude, which is so much talk'd of, and so frequently oppos'd to mathematical Strictness? Does not that seem to detract somewhat from the Certainty which we maintain? This Doubt will be clearly solv'd, if it be consider'd how far we affirm Demonstration to prevail in these Notions, and in what Things this Latitude is to be found. Demonstrations therefore are here chiefly employ'd about moral Qualities, so far as those Qualities appear, for certain, to agree to such Actions or Persons: When we enquire (for Example) whether such an Action be just or unjust, whether such a Right, or such an Obligation accrue to such a Person, consider'd in general, or as that personal Capacity is common to others with him. Now all these Kinds of Truths we maintain to be so clearly and certainly deducible from their genuine Principles and Causes, that no Man in his right Wits, can entertain a Doubt concerning them. And tho' we should discover some little Latitude, or something analogous to Latitude, in the Questions; yet that would not be able to prejudice the Certainty of them in itself. As for the Goodness or Pravity of Actions, as they denote their Agreeableness or Repugnancy to the Rule of the Law, in this Respect they seem capable of no Manner of Latitude, but whatever declines from Good must immediately be pronounc'd Evil. Yet under other Considerations, at least with Respect to Men, they admit of something like Latitude; Latitude, properly speaking, being applicable only to Quantity. And first, Because in Laws the Force and Power of obliging Men is not always of the same Tenour and Degree, but appears more strict in commanding and forbidding some Actions, and more loose about others. Whence it comes to pass, that we are forc'd to distinguish between Law and Equity, or between what's rigorously and exactly just, and^g what's equal and fair to be done. The Difference between which Things is this, We lie under a more necessary Duty of performing the former, but the latter engage our Obedience with a gentler Tie, and with an inferior Obligation. Yet these last have a wider Object than the first; the Offices of other Virtues being extended much farther than those of Justice. It happens likewise very commonly, that among Men, and in human Courts, smaller Deviations from the Law scarce fall under Consideration or Animadversion. Many Things too are ordain'd and commanded in so weak and indifferent a Manner, that they seem to engage Men rather by affecting their Modesty than their Honesty: So that those who perform them deserve Commendation, those who omit them are not obnoxious to Reprehension. And among these Matters Grotius^h seems to reckon Concubinage, Divorce, and Polygamy, before they were forbidden by the Law of GOD: These (saith he) are such Things as Reason itself tells us it is more honest to abstain from; yet not so, as that (setting aside the Divine Precept) they include any grievous Fault.

But of these we shall treat in their proper Place. Hither likewise is to be refer'd that Passage of *Aristotle*ⁱ; He that declines but a little from right Dealing, whether to the Excess, or to the Defect, is not charg'd with Guilt; but he that transgresses in a larger Measure, because his Faultiness discovers and betrays itself by its Bulk. It may happen too that a Thing in itself shall be unobliging and indifferent, and yet the Performance, or the Omission of it shall either always, or however at some certain^j Juncture, be more for our Advantage and Use. To this Case belong those Passages of St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Chap. vi. ver. 12. Chap. vii. ver. 6, 7, 8, 9. Chap. x. ver. 23. And that Observation of Grotius^k, That sometimes by

¹ So far from that, that we are sometimes ashamed that we have done Things that we believe to be good, and not done Things that are evil. See PLUTARCH'S Treatise of Falſe Shame, Tom. ii. p. 528. Ed. Wech.

² SENECA in his Letters, Numb. 11. proves, that Blushing is the Effect of our Temperament, and that diverse Causes produce it. As for Example, Pompey the Great could not help Blushing, when he appeared in a great Assembly; and Fabianus the Philosopher and Orator blushed, when he came but to give an Evidence before the Senate. SENECA says, it proceeds not from Weakness of Spirit, but from Surprize; for what a Man is not accustomed to, disturbs such as are subject to Blushing.

⁴ So that Equity includes not only what is really and fully due to any one, although he cannot require it of us in Strictness by any written Law, but all that is due to another upon a Principle of Humanity, or Charity, or any other Virtue, which is such, that if we do not our Duty, he to whom we ought to do it can't complain of any Wrong done him; so that the Right from whence this Obligation arises, is that which is call'd by our Author, Imperfect. See Ch. i. §. 19, 20. foregoing, and Ch. vii. §. 7, 11. 16. Book iii. Ch. i. §. 3. and Ch. iii. §. 16. and Ch. iv. §. 6. Book viii. Ch. i. §. 1.

an abuse of Words, those Things which Reason shews to be honest, or better than the contrary^a, tho' they are not enjoin'd, yet shall be call'd Dictates or Ordinances of the Law of Nature. From all that has been said, we may understand whether, and in what Manner there may be said to be Degrees of Good. If then we consider Good in a strict Sense, for a Congruity to the Law, 'tis as impossible there should be any Thing better than what is good, as that there should be any Thing straighter than what is properly straight. Yet one Good may be pronounced better than another, according to the different Degrees of Necessity which are found in both, and upon Account of which, if they cannot be both perform'd, one of them manifestly gives Place to the other. To this Purpose, see Matth. viii. 21, 22. where it was a good Thing to bury a dead Father, but a better to follow our Saviour: Acts vi. 2. where it was a good Thing to minister to the Poor, but a better to preach the Gospel: On which Point we shall be larger hereafter^a. Lastly, when Actions, in themselves lawful and indifferent, are measur'd and rated according to their Usefulness or Expedience, one of them is declar'd better than another, as it is more advantageous to the present Circumstance or Occasion^a.

IX. According to our Doctrine already deliver'd, must that Place of Grotius^b be explain'd, about the Causes of Doubt in moral Actions; where he says, There is not an equal Certainty to be met with in Morals and Mathematicks; which therefore happens, because mathematical Sciences treat of Forms, as distinct and abstracted from all Sorts of Matter, and because the Forms themselves are generally such as will admit of no Medium, as we can find nothing which is not either crooked or straight. But in Morals the least Circumstance alters the Matter; and the Forms, of which they treat, have commonly some intervenient Latitude, by Reason of which they sometimes approach nearer to one Extream, and sometimes to the other. Thus between Things absolutely commanded, and absolutely forbidden, there are some Things left indifferent; but this Medium of Indifference sometimes inclines nearer to the Injunction, sometimes to the Prohibition. Whence frequently arises an Ambiguity, somewhat like what we meet with in Twilight, or in Water not perfectly hot. As to this Assertion, we must confess, that, as about other Actions, so especially about making War, a Doubt may probably arise; either because the Fact which occasions the War is not yet fully made out, or whether it be of so great Consequence as to deserve a Prosecution by Arms, where the Case is so desperate, and where the attending Miseries are so numerous; or whether in the present Juncture and Condition of the Commonwealth, it be a moot Case which Course ought to be taken, either to return the Injury in an hostile Manner, or rather conceal the Affront, and defer the Satisfaction, lest an untimely Pursuit of Revenge should draw greater Misfortunes on the State. But that the Causes of Doubting in such Cases proceed from the Uncertainty of moral Matters, this we absolutely deny. The Reason why the Demonstrations in Mathematicks are so very accurate, is not the Abstraction from Matter, but another, that we shall produce by and by. That in Morals the least Circumstance alters the Matter, is an ambiguous Expression. If this be the Sense of it, That the least Circumstance alters the Quality of an Action, that is, turns it from Good to Evil, this Variation does not at all injure the Certitude of moral Knowledge. For a Line that recedes never so little from Straightness, degenerates into Crookedness, and yet no Uncertainty arises hence in geometrical Operations. But if this be the Meaning of the Place, that the least Circumstance either raises or lessens^a the Quantity of an Action; this, at least in human Regard, is not always true; for trifling Accidents and Punctilio's seldom weigh any Thing in the Sentence of a moral Judge. Yet, if we grant this Supposition, it will not in the least diminish the Certainty of Morality; since even in Mathematicks the smallest Accession, or the most inconsiderable Loss, varies the Quantity. Lawful or indifferent Things, which compose the Medium between Commands and Prohibitions, we have already observ'd only in this Respect to incline sometimes more to one Hand, sometimes to the other, as it appears most expedient and useful sometimes to perform them, sometimes to omit them. Yet even hence nothing of Uncertainty can arise, nor is any such Medium form'd, as we can clearly understand either to be Good or Ill. So that those Examples and Instances of Twilight and lukewarm Water, are improperly applied to the present Case; they being of that Kind of Media we call Media Participationis, as lukewarm Water partakes of hot and cold together. But those Media, which we call Media Negationis, as are indifferent and lawful Matters, possess not the least Share of either the Extreams, but equally deny them both. For we say in the same Manner, Good is not Indifferent, and Evil is not Indifferent; and it does not appear, how a Medium of this Nature can prove a Cause and an Occasion of Uncertainty.

X. Yet as to the Quantities which are used in Morality, they, we confess, are capable of some Latitude; and it's chiefly on this Account, that mathematical Knowledge is esteem'd to have so much higher Degrees of Nicety and Exactness than moral. The Reason of this depends on the different Constitutions of natural and of moral Quantity: For natural or physical Quantities may be accurately compared, and measured, and divided into the most equal Parts; because they are represented as the Affections of material Things, which are the Objects of our Senses. Whence we may precisely determine, what Rule and Proportion they bear to one another, especially if we employ the

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ Such is, for Example, the Custom of covering those Parts of the Body which distinguish Men from Women: To which we may refer what St. Paul says of the Customs of his Times, 1 Cor. xi. 14. Nature itself teaches us, That if a Man have long Hair, 'tis a Shame to him; but if a Woman have long Hair, 'tis her Honour, as Frederick Gronovius explains these Words, in his Notes; but our Author gives them another Turn, Lib. ii. Ch. iii. §. 22.

² There are other Principles by which the respective Quality of moral Actions may be determined. See Ch. viii. §. 5. with the Note.

³ As for Example, It renders a Fault more or less excusable, and a Crime more or less enormous.

assistance of Numbers, by the Application of which all Questions of this kind are most exquisitely solv'd. And besides, those Quantities are the Effect of Nature, and consequently immovable and permanent. On the other hand, moral Quantities proceed from the Impositions and the Estimation of intelligent and free Agents, whose Judgment and Pleasure not falling under natural Dimensions, the Quantities which they thus conceive and determine, cannot be circumscribed by any such Measure, but retain, as it were, somewhat of the Looseness and Liberty of their Original. Nor indeed did the Ends for which moral Quantities were first introduced, require any such punctual Minuteness¹; but it was sufficient for the Use of human Life, that Persons, Things, and Actions should be more grossly rated and compar'd together². Thus we discover a Latitude in the Value or Esteem of Persons; by which, tho' we understand that one Person is to be preferr'd to another, yet we cannot exactly determine whether he exceeds him in a double, or treble, or quadruple Proportion of Worth. The like Latitude occurs in the Valuation of different Things, and of Actions belonging to Commerce; on the account of which we can scarcely fix any³ settled Price on any other Things besides those which the Civilians call *Res fungibiles*⁴, consumable Goods, that is, such as we borrow for our present Use, upon Condition of repaying them in the same Quantity and Quality: As to the rest, we esteem them equal and indifferent, and to be determin'd by the private Bargains and Agreements of particular Men. And so likewise the Proportion between many Faults and Punishments is adjusted with some Latitude: For who, for Example, can tell precisely how many Lashes, and how smartly laid on, come just up to the Guilt of some particular Piece of Thievery? But in such Cases we assign what Proportion we think fit, with great Looseness and Security. We find too a very remarkable Latitude in many Businesses and Affairs of Life⁵. Human Lawgivers are not us'd to cut every Thing to the quick. The Laws, and the Philosophers (says^b Tully) clear Subtilties in a different Manner: The Laws no otherwise than as Things may be felt and handled, by reason of their Grossness; but the Philosophers, as they may be discern'd by Reason and Understanding. And in the Decision of Causes 'tis a Maxim vulgarly known, That the Judge does not concern himself with every petty Circumstance. And so when such a Number of honest Men are appointed^c Arbitrators of any Controversy, there is fair room for Latitude in their Judgment and Sentence⁶. Farther, in executing vindictive Justice, there is an Indulgence made of a convenient Latitude, not only on the Part of Clemency, but of Severity too. To which purpose is that Saying of Tacitus^c: *All great Examples have somewhat of Injustice; but the Injury they do to particular Persons is recompens'd by the common Advantage they bring to the Publick: And that of Jason in Plutarch^d, 'Tis necessary that those should act unjustly in small Matters, who intend to maintain Justice in the grand and chief Concerns*⁷. Most Virtues likewise, besides Justice, admit a fr^ce Looseness and Latitude in the Exercise of them; as for Example, Pity, Liberality, Gratitude, Equity, and Charity. And so, in common Life, we apply the Names of Habits under a Latitude of Signification⁸. Thus we call him a just Man, who commits (tho' deliberately) but a few Pieces of Injustice. Lastly, we may observe, that if in moral Consideration some Quantities are brought to an exact Standard, and a punctual Measure; as the Price of some Commodities, the Periods of Time⁹ settled by Law, and the like; yet this precise Determination does not so much proceed from the Things themselves, or from the Times, as from the Institution and Will of Men^e. From all these Remarks we conceive the Difference between mathematical and moral Demonstrations to appear very clear and evident; and it is no more than this, that the former are chiefly employ'd about Quantity, which is in its own Nature dispos'd for the nicest Division

⁴ This is the Foundation of that excellent Expression of the Pagan Philosopher SENECA: Quam angusta Innocentia est, &c. De Ira, Lib. ii. Ch. xxvii. How little is the Virtue of that Man, whose Goodness extends no farther than the Law? How much larger is our Duty than the Rules of the Law direct? How many Things do Piety, Humanity, Liberality, Justice, and Fidelity require of us, which the Laws give no Commands for? What the Law forbids not, Honour and Conscience restrains us from: As for Example, The Law punishes the Injustice of a Seller, when he has taken more than a just Price; but Philosophy and Virtue order the Restitution of the least Thing, which he has fraudulently got, more than the Worth of his Goods. See Grotius, Lib. iii. Ch. x. §. 1.

Lib. xlvi. Tit. iii. De solutionibus & liberat. &c. Leg. cv.*
⁷ Some Reflections made by Mr. Bayle, Diét. Hist. & Crit. p. 235 and 2317, are worth our Observation here. He says, The publick Good requires, in some Cases, that Justice should depart from the Rigour of the Laws, because an Injury done to a private Person is a less Evil, politickly speaking, than the Advantage that redounds to the Publick by it, is a good----- For this Reason it is, that the Laws condemn to the most rigorous Punishments, such Servants as lie with their Master's Wife or Daughter, tho' they alledge that they were by many Promises and Threatnings drawn into it: Thus a Footman was hang'd at Paris in 1698. For though the Excuses be true, yet Justice will not release them; that such Persons may expect no Favour, and so may be more cautious of offending. Bodin the famous Lawyer, speaking of a Law made by King Henry II. against Women who made away their Children, so rigorous, that it might happen that an innocent Woman might suffer by it, says, "That the Use of profitable Laws ought not to be suspended, upon the Account of some Inconveniences produced by them." And thereupon, he quotes a Saying of Cato's, That there is no Law that is profitable for all, 'tis sufficient that it is beneficial for the most Part, and generally. *Liv. Lib. xxxiv. and Determination; whereas the latter endeavour nothing farther than to prove for certain such a Quality of such a Subject, leaving the Decision of moral Quantities to the larger Scope and Range of human Will.

XI. But we must take heed of confounding this moral Certitude, which we have been so long establishing, with that which is so often apply'd to Matters of Fact; as, when we declare (for Example) such a Thing to be morally certain, because it has been confirm'd by creditable Witnesses: For, this latter Sort of moral Certitude is nothing else but a strong Presumption grounded on probable Reasons, and which very seldom fails and deceives us. Zeigler, in his Notes on Grotius^a, has not sufficiently distinguish'd this inferior Certainty from the former and the more noble Kind, while, tho' he grants the more general Precepts of Ethicks to bear an equal Evidence with the Propositions of any Science properly so call'd, yet he affirms, That the particular Conclusions have a much shorter Degree of Certitude, and are often involv'd in dark Obscurities, by reason that the Things themselves, concerning which such Conclusions are form'd, are many ways changeable and contingent: And the Example he brings is this; We have moral Certitude and Evidence, that an honest and serious Person, when he takes an Oath, swears truly. And yet this Evidence is not absolutely such, but conditionally, because it is not directly impossible, but that a Man of these good Qualities may forswear himself, since he may fall from his Virtue and Integrity. But now that Certitude, by which we know Perjury to be an Evil, is very different from that by which we believe a good Man is not guilty of Perjury; nor is the latter Proposition deduced fairly, as a Conclusion from the former. Thus, in the same Manner, the Faith we give to Historians is reckon'd morally certain, when they testify a Thing vastly remote from our Memory and Knowledge, and of which there is no real and demonstrative Proof now extant; and especially, if many agree in the Relation: Because it is not probable that many Persons should join together by Compact, in putting a Trick on Posterity, or should entertain any Hopes, that the Lye would not in Time be discover'd. And yet for all this, if Occasion were, we could produce Examples of many popular Fables that have pass'd through several Ages, under the Colour and Character of Truth.

SINCE that Part of Knowledge which we have undertaken to explain, is chiefly employ'd in demonstrating what's right and what's wrong, what's good and what's evil, what's just and what's unjust, in human Actions; in the first Place we are oblig'd to consider and examine the Principles and the Affections of these Actions, and to shew how, by the Help of Imputation, they are conceiv'd to be morally join'd and connected to the Authors of them: In this Respect then, the Excellency of Man chiefly outshines the Condition of brute Creatures, that he is endow'd with a most noble and exalted Soul, which exerts itself not only with a singular Light, as to the knowing and judging of Things, but also with a prodigious Quickness and Activity, as to the embracing or rejecting them. So that on this Score the Actions of Mankind ought to be rank'd in a much higher Class than the Motions of Beasts, which proceed purely from the Spurs of Senses, without the precedent Help of Reflexion^a, whatever Charron^b has alledg'd to the contrary. That Power of the ^a Mr. Charron's Words are these, *Man setting himself above, and calling himself Master of all Creatures, disdains the rest. He divides them into Parts, and allows them what Faculties and Powers he pleases. On the other Side, he degrades himself as it were in Spite; he groans, complains, blames Nature as a cruel Stepmother to him, and makes himself the least and most miserable Creature in the World, both which are equally contrary to Reason, Truth, and Modesty. Nevertheless, Fearſis can't be reasonably deſeas'd to the Condition of meer Automata; i. e. Clock-work: Such an Opinion muſt proceed from Preſumption, and not a ſerious Conſideration of their Actions; for, as Mr. LOCKE ſpeaks very well: ſhall we believe that Dogs and Elephants do not think, when we plainly ſee, that they can find out that in us which we can't diſcern in ourſelves? Do they not give us all the Demonſtrations imaginable of their Senſe, except that they can't tell us ſo? It is hard indeed to fix the Bounds of the Faculties of the Souls of Beaſts, tho' Mr. Charron aſſerts, that they can from Particulars infer Universals: but yet we have ſufficient Reason to be convinced, that Beaſts act with ſome Knowledge and Reaſoning. See Mr. LOCKE, Lib. ii. Ch. ix. §. 11, 14. & x. §. 10. & xi. §. 7, 10, 11. As alſo Mr. LE CLERC's Phyſicks, Lib. iv. Ch. xii. What Mr. Pufendorf's Notion was in this Matter, is hard to know, for he allows Beaſts in one Place, what he denies them in another.*

human Soul, which it bears as a Light for its Guidance and Direction, we commonly call the Understanding, and in this, as it is concern'd about voluntary Actions, we conceive two Faculties¹: One is that by which, as by a kind of Mirror, the Object is shewn to the Will, with a general and confus'd Notice, whether it be agreeable or disagreeable, good or evil. The other is that by which the Reasons of Good and Evil, which in several Objects offer themselves numerously on both Sides, are weigh'd and compar'd, and Judgment is given, what, when, and in what manner we are to act, and Consultation taken about the most proper Means for the Accomplishment of the propos'd End. And here it must be observ'd, that the Beginning of a voluntary Act should regularly proceed from the Understanding, whence arises the vulgar Maxim,

Objects unknown can never move Desire:

Although this Knowledge, which precedes the Acts of Volition, is not always distinct, because a confus'd Notion is sufficient to make the Will stir itself. And thus when we have not a tolerable Knowledge of a Thing, we cannot be said properly and fully to desire it; yet we may desire to make Trial of it.

II. As to the former Faculty of the Understanding, we must remark, that it is of the Number of those which are commonly call'd *natural Faculties*², contradictinct to the free; in as much as it is not in the Power of Man to apprehend Things otherwise than as the Images of them present themselves to the Mind; nor can the Will by any Force hinder the Understanding from assenting to a Proposition which appears clear and evident to it. But thus far a Man is at Liberty; he can more diligently consider the Object in view, and more exactly weigh in his Mind the opposite Reasons of Good and Evil, and so not stick at the outward Face and Semblance of Things, but pierce into the deepest Secrets of their Texture and Constitution. And after so strict an Enquiry and Examination, he can pronounce a positive Judgment in the Cause before him. The Understanding being in this Respect, as in many others, like the Eye, that it makes a very important Difference in beholding Things with a roving and transitory Cast, and in contemplating them with a fix'd and steady Application³. And hence 'tis easy to conceive, how far this Power of the Soul falls under the Culture and Cognizance of Laws. For since 'tis beyond human Ability, that the Understanding should apprehend Things after another Manner than they appear; and since Credit or Assent cannot but answer the Idea of the Understanding, no Person can judge otherwise of a Matter, than as he appears to have conceiv'd it; nor can he by any just Law be compell'd to a contrary Judgment: For suppose a Man to be in the Wrong, yet 'a bare Injunction and Command will never make him the wiser. Yet because many Things escape a negligent Searcher, which offer themselves to the Notice of more curious Enquirers; and because the Will may hinder the Understanding from contemplating some Truth, by presenting other Objects to tempt and engage its Care; therefore an earnest and assiduous Application of Mind is of vast Use in confirming the Judgment; and consequently those who are entrusted with a Care and Authority over others, ought to make all fair Provision for the Assistance and Direction of a serious Meditation: and they may likewise engage Men, by the Sanction of Punishments, to apply with Diligence those Means which are most likely to dispel the Clouds and Perplexities of Things, and to represent them in their genuine Colours and Condition⁴.

III. Farther, since the Understanding performs the Office of a Light in our Course of Action; and since, when it doth not guide us aright, 'tis impossible but we should lose our Way; we ought to establish this as a certain Principle, That there is both in the apprehending Faculty, and in the Judgment, a natural Rectitude, which, upon due Attention given, will not suffer us to be deceiv'd in reference to moral Things, and that neither of those Powers are so far corrupted and deprav'd, as to put us under a Necessity of being mistaken. For at the same rate it would follow, that because a Glas ill cut presents every Image in a distorted Confusion, and because the Tongue, when cover'd with the Tincture of the Jaundice, is not able to discern the Difference of Tastes; therefore the Senses, to which those Offices belong, must be, in general, pronounc'd fallacious and uncertain. Neither could it be charg'd on us as Guilt, that we have done a bad Action, if we were not furnish'd with a clear Discernment of Good and Evil; and it would be the highest Injustice to impute that Error as sinful, which was beyond our Power to avoid or shake off. Therefore, unless we would utterly subvert and destroy all the Morality of acting, we must by all Means maintain, that the Understanding of Man is naturally right and certain, and upon sufficient Enquiry and Meditation does always apprehend Things clearly, and as they are in their own

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ To speak truly, one Faculty cannot have another fixed in it, as in its Subject; because every Faculty must have its proper Subject. Faculties, or Powers (says Mr. LOCKE) belong only to Agents, and can only be attributed to Substances; and not to any other Power. Hum. Understand. Lib. ii. Ch. xxi. §. 16.

² By natural Faculties is meant passive Faculties, which receive the Impressions of Objects, and do not properly act at all; for the Understanding is like the Eye, which discerns Ideas with the different Relations, without adding or diminishing any Thing; whether it only perceives the Objects, or judges what is, or is not to be done. For in the Understanding there is nothing but bare Perception or Reception of Ideas. The Determination from whence Action proceeds, is an Act of the Will only. The Distinction of the Schools; that is, Understanding is either speculative or practical, is founded upon the Nature of the Objects it contemplates; and not upon the different Actions of the Soul: For the Soul is dispos'd alike in the Perception of Good and Evil, Truth and Falshood. See the Searches after Truth, Lib. i. Ch. ii. and Mr. Clerc's Discourse of Spirits, §. 1. Ch. iii.

³ i. e. Without any Reason or Motive.

Nature and Constitution: And likewise that the practical Judgment cannot prove so far debas'd and degenerate (at least as to the general Precepts of Nature's Law) as to excuse the Acts proceeding thence from being imputed as if they were Effects of invincible Ignorance^a. And here we desire it should be consider'd, that we are not debating what Power the Understanding has about Matters which depend on peculiar Revelation from GOD, or what it can perform in such extraordinary Cases, without the singular Assistance of divine Grace; because this is the Subject and Business of another Profession. Neither are we concern'd to examine whether in speculative Truths, requiring the most subtil Disquisitions of Mind, a Man may not through ill Information get such firm Possession of a false Tenet, as not to be able to recover himself out of the Mistake: But we are discoursing only about the Power of the Understanding, as it is employ'd in squaring our Actions according to the Dictates of Nature. And, as to this Point, we conceive that there's no Man of proper Years, and Master of his own Reason^b, so desperately dull and stupid, as not to comprehend, at least, the most general Rules of natural Law, and those which are of the greatest Use in common Life, and not to discern the Agreement they bear to the rational and social Condition of Mankind. And though a Person through extrem Idleness may possibly never have thought of one or two Precepts, or through precipitate Rashness may have fram'd wrong Opinions of acting, or by bad Information, or a Mind corrupted with vicious Courses, may have call'd their Truth and Necessity in question, or have taken up other Rules of Action contrary to natural Suggestions; yet we do not by any Means acknowledge this Ignorance or this Error to be insuperable, so as to hinder the Imputation of Deeds consequent on such a Principle. For these universal Edicts are so clearly publish'd and explain'd, and so closely interwoven with our Being, that no one can be overcome with so brutal a Sottishness, as not to be capable of apprehending and discerning them; since to this Business there is not requir'd any singular Force of Wit, any peculiar Shrewdness of Reason, but an ordinary Portion of natural Light is sufficient, provided that the Mind be not vitiated and obstructed by some Distemper. To which Purpose Tully's Distinction about Folly and Madnets is observable: Folly (says^b he) if assisted with a due State of Health, is able to maintain a competent Set of Duties, and to keep up, in some manner, the Culture and the Methods of common Life; but Madnets is a perfect Disease, that quite extinguishes the Sight of the Mind, and involves all its Objects in a general Obscurity^c.

IV. The Judgment pass'd on moral Actions by the Understanding, as it is suppos'd conscious of a Law, and therefore accountable to the Lawgiver, is commonly call'd Conscience; which as it either^d precedes, or follows the Action, we may, for Distinction sake, branch into antecedent, and consequent: This last is the reflex Judgment of the Understanding on Things done, or forborn^e, approving what's well, and condemning what's ill; the Attendants of which are either Tranquillity or Restlessness of Mind, according to the different Testimony it bears; and as it gives us Occasion to expect either the Favour, or the Displeasure of the Legislator, and either the Good-will, or the Hatred of other Men^f. The former, coming before the Action, informs us what is good and what evil, and consequently what to be done, and what to be omitted. But here it is carefully to be observ'd, that the Conscience obtains no other Place in the Guidance of human Operations, than with respect to its being instructed in the Knowledge of some Law; since Laws only are the proper Rules of^g acting. And therefore, if any Man will attribute to the practical Judgment, or the Conscience, any peculiar Force or Ability of directing us in our Doings, owing neither its Original to, nor its Dependence on any Law; he will invest with a legal Power the vain Fausy of private Men, and will bring the wildest Disorder and Confusion on the Affairs and Transactions of the World. For we must declare, that as far as our Diligence could reach in searching, the Word Conscience, in this strange Sense, is neither to be met with in the holy Scriptures, nor in the antient Latin Authors; but it

² See the Note on Book i. Chap. i. §. 4. of the Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen. Printed at Amsterdam in 1707.

⁵ Pliny Panegy. Chap. lxxiv. &c. vide

⁶ This is true, but it hinders not, but that the Conscience may be the immediate Rule of Action; for a Man can't conform himself to a Law, unless he know it, and if he do good without knowing it, he loses his Pains, the Lawgiver regards it not. Nevertheless it follows not, but that every one may do all that he believes either permitted, or commanded, after what Manner soever it comes into his Mind. Here are two Rules, which the most simple may, and ought to follow, to satisfy themselves, upon all Occasions, that the Motions of their Conscience are according to the Law: 1. To consider, whether they are not out of the State of determining concerning an Action, by such clear Arguments as may satisfy any Man of Sense. 2. To see that they have sufficient Reasons to do what their Conscience leads them to, without farther Examination. In the first Case, 'tis evident, that we can't determine or attempt any Thing but with an unwarrantable Rashness. In the other, we must of Necessity suspend our Judgment and Action, till we are fully satisfied. All the Inconveniences and Evils which are consequent upon a misused Conscience, come under the Breach of one or other of these Maxims, which are easy to be observ'd by such as love their Duty. This appears chiefly in Matters of Religion, as every Man's Experience will teach him. See Biblioth. Univ. Tom. i. p. 343, 344. and Parrhasiana, Tom. ii. p. 97. as also Biblioth. Choise, Tom. x. p. 336.

was first introduc'd by the Schoolmen, and has been maintain'd in these latter Ages by the crafty Casuists, for the better securing of Mens Minds and Fortunes to their own Authority and Advantage. But if we have regard to the true and genuine Signification of the Word, to do a Thing against Conscience, is nothing else but to commit a voluntary Evil, knowing it to be such; and is oppos'd to transgressing out of Ignorance and Mistake. And this we mean by Conscience in our present Enquiry, recovering it to its antient Import, and exploding the new Abuses that have been obruded on its Signification.

V. Conscience rightly inform'd is of two Sorts; for either it clearly understands that the Persuasion which it holds concerning some Performance or Omission, is built on certain Principles, and agrees with the Laws, which are the Rule of Action and of Conscience; or else it esteems, indeed, its Persuasion as true and certain, and sees no Reason to doubt of it, tho' it cannot reduce it to a formal Demonstration; but, on the contrary, relies chiefly on Arguments from Probability. In the former Case it is commonly term'd a 'right, and in the latter a probable Conscience. Concerning a right Conscience this general Maxim is establish'd, That every voluntary Action against its Suggestion, and the Omission of any Action which it declares to be necessary, is Sin; and so much the more heinous Sin, as the Person had a more perfect Knowledge of his Duty; because a Transgression under such Advantages argues a greater Pravity and Corruption of Mind^a.

The Difference of a probable Conscience from a right, we conceive not to be in reference to the Truth of the Persuasion, but upon account of its Ignorance and Inability to reduce this Truth artificially into the Exactness of a Demonstration; for which Reason it has not so evident and unshaken a Knowledge of its Certainty. For (as the Logicians speak) nothing is probable in itself, but only with respect to our Understanding. And by this Rule of Probability the greatest Part of Mankind are steer'd and govern'd in their Proceedings. For few Persons are able to apprehend human Duties as they flow from their first Origin and Foundation. And most Men rely with so much Security on the Tenor of common Life^b, on the unquestionable Authority of ^{} unsuspected Teachers, and on the manifest Decency or Conveniency of such and such Actions; that they think it a superfluous Trouble to make a more curious Enquiry into the Reasons and Foundations of them. In the same manner as the greatest Number of Artificers are satisfy'd with performing their Work by Instruments mechanically prepar'd, and leave the Mathematicians to demonstrate the Reasons of their Operations. And Men are apt especially to content themselves with these probable Appearances, when the Proposition in Debate is remov'd at a vast Distance from the first Principles; and therefore requires a tedious and troublesome Deduction, which is commonly above the Capacity of those who have not run the Course of the Sciences, nor cultivated their Reason by a learned Institution. Yet hence can be drawn no Protection for that pernicious ^{} Probability maintain'd by the later Casuists, and especially by those of the Order of the Jesuits, which resolves itself into the sole Authority of a single Doctor, tho' destitute of Reasons, and oppos'd by all other Judgments. For this Principle tends to the utter Subversion of all Morality, and seems design'd only for the keeping under the Senses and the Consciences of Men, and making them depend entirely on the Pleasure of the Priests: as has been prov'd at large by others^c. We need only observe farther, that they act not at all fairly, when they confound Probability of Fact with Probability of Judgment, and of Law. For indeed, in Matters of Fact the Authority of one great and credible Person may raise a probable Presumption, and obtain at least half the Force of a full Proof. But in defining Matters of Law, 'twould be the highest Absurdity and Rashness to attribute so much to the Declarations of one Man, not grounded on good Arguments, and at the same time contradicted by Persons of equal Rank and Power, as that it should be safely admitted for the Square and Standard of Acting.

VI. For the Information and Direction of a probable Conscience, there are many Rules commonly laid down, concerning which our Opinion is this, That they take place only where there seems to be a Clashing between strict Law and Equity; or when both sides of the Question are alike free from the Obligation of the Laws; yet so as that one of them may seem to approach nearer to Honesty, or may appear more likely to produce some Convenience or Inconvenience than the other. For in Matters absolutely determin'd by the Command or Prohibition of some Law, there is no room left for such a free Choice, as that we may reject one Side, and take the other; because positive Laws will not be satisfy'd with Equivalents, but demand a punctual Obedience to their Decrees. And therefore this Freedom of Election must be confin'd to indifferent Things, to which the Laws do not extend their Sphere and Authority. The chief Rules are these:

1. In a probable Conscience two Opinions being propos'd, neither of them contrary to the Laws,

^a See Luke xii. 47, 48. Wendrochius, and Sam. Rachel.

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

^{*} This Epithet is not well apply'd, for our Author owns that a right and probable Conscience are the same, a little lower: He ought rather to have called it a clear Conscience; but his Divisions are not exact: These are better; an antecedent Conscience is, 1. resolved, 2. dubious. The resolved Conscience declares positively, not only about the Quality, but Execution of an Action; in which, if it mistakes, 'tis erroneous; if it judges well, 'tis right; which will be clear or probable according as the Reasons which Men give of their Opinions, are certain, or only probable. A dubious Conscience is either simply so, when the Understanding hangs like a Balance, not knowing which Side to take, or whether the Action be good or evil, and so can't put it in Execution; or scrupulous, when we are determin'd about the Morality of the Action, and Execution of it, yet with some Fear of being mistaken. Gott. Gerb. Titius's Observ. on Pufend. De Officio Hom. & Civ. Obs. xvii.

one of which is founded on better Reasons, the other is more safe; either of the Two may be follow'd without Blame.

2. Two Opinions being propos'd, of which one is built on weaker Reasons, the other is the more safe, the latter ought justly to have the Preference.

3. In a probable Conscience a learned Man may follow that Opinion which seems to him to have the greatest Degree of Probability, tho' perhaps it may appear different to others, unless he is under Apprehension of incurring some Inconvenience or Damage upon account of dissenting from the common Judgment.

4. An unlearned Man may safely follow the Authority of wiser Persons.

5. A Subject, or one plac'd under the Command of others¹, may, upon the Order of his Superiors, fairly do a Thing which he does not certainly know to be unlawful, tho' in his private Judgment he does not think it very probable that it ought to be done.

6. In things of little Moment and Concern,² if there are probable Arguments alledg'd on both hands, either Side may be taken.

7. In things of great Moment³ if there arise probable Arguments on both Sides, the safer Part is to be preferr'd, or that from which there cannot follow so great an Evil, tho' we are never so much mistaken, as there might have done, had we err'd in the opposite Opinion.

VII. To proceed; tho' according to our present design, we are engag'd only to treat of what's good, and what evil, what just, and what unjust; leaving the enquiring about Things profitable and⁴ unprofitable to another Part of Knowledge; yet it will not be much out of the Way, if we here consider in short, what Rules the Understanding ought to have regard to, in Deliberations concerning Usefulness and Convenience; especially because the Directions already laid down depend very much on these; the Profit or Advantage of Things bearing a great Force in our Proceedings; according to that of the Apostle, 1 Cor. vi. 12. All things (that is, all Things which he had been there speaking of) are lawful for me; but all things are not expedient. And in Civil Business, Affairs are many times committed to the sole Wisdom and Conduct of the Person employ'd; in which Cases a Man is conceiv'd to have acted ill, if, by Imprudence or by Negligence, he has taken the less profitable Course. In Debates therefore, arising about such Things to which we are bound by any Necessity, or any determinate Obligation (for Necessity excludes all Deliberation and Debates, and determinate Obligations leave nothing to the Agent, but the Duty of Execution) this is laid down for a Foundation, That nothing ought to be undertaken, from which, in moral Esteem (or as far as human Foresight can pierce into the Obscurity and Uncertainty of future Events) there does seem likely to follow as much Evil as Good⁵, or more Evil than Good. The Reason of which Maxim is evident: For as much of Evil as any Thing has join'd with it, so much it loses of its Goodness; and consequently, when the Good and Evil are in equal Degrees, the former is swallow'd up by the latter, and the Thing is depriv'd of the Nature and Denomination of Good. Hence that Field is reckon'd very unprofitable, which does not in the Value of its Fruits exceed the Charges of Tillage⁶. For those Matters which make the Subjects of such Deliberations as we are now speaking of, are undertaken purely on Account of the Use and Advantage which may accrue to us from them⁷. As Corollaries from this general Truth, we may subjoin the three Rules establish'd by Grotius⁸:

1. If the Thing under Debate has an equal Efficacy or Ability for the Production of Good and Evil, that is, if we may as easily gain as lose by it, we may then venture on it, when the good Confe-

Xenophon's Words at^b are inserted according to the Original.

¹ Cato de R. R. l. i. 1. A Field that is fertile, if it be at the same time chargeable, turns to little Account.

² Xenophon. Rer. Græc. Lib. vi. They are very far from deserving Commendation, who having carried off Glory and Victory from many Encounters, do still continue to engage, till being at length shamefully overcome, they lose their former Honour and their former Labour. The Case is the same with those Gamesters, who once meeting with a Run of good Fortune, are entic'd to venture on, till they lose double to their former Gains, and, in Conclusion, are commonly Beggars. These Examples ought to warn us in our Martial Affairs, that we never suffer our selves to be drawn into such a Combat, where we must of Necessity either win all, or lose all.

² This hath Place commonly in Regard to those Judgments, which we are obliged to make ex tempore, upon some urgent Occasions, wherein Necessities of Life oblige us to act. See Biblioth. Univers. Tom. v. p. 344.

³ As for Example, If the Debate be about putting a Person to Death, it is better to run the Risk, and let a Criminal escape, than punish an innocent Person. This was the Decision, both of several antient Philosophers, which are quoted by Grotius, Lib. ii. Ch. xxiii. §. 5. n. 2. and of the Emperor Trajan, who would have no Man condemned for Suspicion, as he writes in his Rescript to Assid. Severus. For it is better that the Crimes of the Guilty escape unpunished, than that an innocent Person should be condemned. Digest. Lib. xlviii. Tit. 19. De penis, Leg. 3. For, as Mr. Eruyere speaks, in his Chapter of Certain Customs, p. 506. If a Criminal be punished, 'tis a Terror to the Gang; but if an innocent Person be condemned, all honest Men are affrighted. In fine, War brings Evils upon many innocent Persons: If then Judgments be divided, we must incline to Peace.

⁴ The Author does not mean by the Word Inutili, unprofitable, but noxious, or hurtful, as he plainly uses it, Lib. ii. Ch. i. §. 9. see the Note, and Ch. iii. §. 10. It is certain, that in Matters of Morality and Politicks, that which is oppos'd to profitable, is noxious.

⁶ Here is a plain Inversion of the due Order of Things, contrary to the right Way of Reasoning, and Sequel of the Discourse. This Blemish is so notorious, that 'tis a Wonder the Author did not mend it in his last Editions.

quence is a greater Good, than the ill Consequence is an Evil: that is, if we are like to gain more by being successful in the Attempt, than we can lose if we prove ^a unsuccessful. Thus it would be no Rashness or Imprudence to hazard Ten Pounds, suppose in a dangerous Adventure, when we may get an Hundred, if the Chance prove fortunate ^a.

2. If the Good and Evil which may proceed from the Thing in Debate, appear equal, we may then choose it, with this Provision, that it has a greater Efficacy or Ability for producing the Good than the Evil: that is, if 'tis more easy that Gain should arise from it than Damage. In which Point we cannot omit the noble Argument of Arnobius ^b: "Since that (says he) is the Condition of future Things, that they cannot be felt or held by any anticipating Touch, is it not much the clearer Reason, of two Uncertainties, the Expectation of which is equally doubtful, rather to believe that which brings some Hopes along with it, than that which brings none? For in the former Case there can be no Danger, tho' the Matter expected never come to pass: but in the latter we incur the highest Damage, if what we disbelieved should not prove a Falshity in the final Event of Things ^c." 3. If the Good and Evil seem to be unequal, and the Ability of the Thing to produce them not less unequal, then we must determine our Choice by one of the two Conditions, either that the Ability for producing Good compar'd with that for producing Evil, be greater in Proportion, than the Evil itself compar'd with the Good (that is, if the Excess of Evil be less than the Ability for producing Good) or, if the Good be greater, compar'd with the Evil, than the Ability for producing the Evil, compar'd with that for producing the Good: that is, if the Power and Efficacy which seem to incline towards the Production of the Evil, be less considerable than the Degree by which the Good exceeds the Evil. To which we will add this fourth Rule, That where both the Good and the Ill Effect of a Thing, and likewise its Ability for producing of both, remain uncertain and undetermin'd,

'tis the Part of a wife and cautious Man to abstain from such a Matter, unless he is driven on it by urgent Necessity.

VIII. When the Judgment of the Understanding is at a loss, and cannot discern whether a Thing be good or Evil, and consequently, whether it ought to be perform'd or omitted, we call this a ^a doubtful Conscience. Concerning which this Rule ought to be observ'd, That as long as the Judgment cannot, by the Force of any Arguments, be inclin'd to one Side more than to the other, the Action is to be suspended; and that therefore, he who proceeds to do a Thing, about which his Conscience still hangs in an Aequilibrium, commits a ^b Sin; because, as much as in him lies, he has transgress'd a Law. For he declares his Mind to this Effect: I am not indeed certain, whether or no this Action is repugnant to the Laws; but whether it be or no, I am resolv'd to undertake it. 'Tis good Advice (says ^d Tully) to forbear doing a Thing, where ^e we doubt whether it be just and just, or foul and injurious: For when we are certain the Thing is just, we have a clear Light and Guide to proceed by; but to act with an unsettled Judgment, does not free us from the Thoughts and Intentions of offering an Injury. Grotius ^e says, That this Rule, of abstaining from a doubtful Action, does not hold when we are oblig'd to do either this or that, and yet are unsatisfied in either, whether it be just or not; for then we are allow'd to choose that Side which appears less evil or unjust. For whensoever we are under the Necessity of making a Choice, the lesser Evil assumes the Character of Good. This Observation, we think, ought rather to have a Place in Evils of Damage, than in those of Morality; because in the former it is reckon'd a Gain and an Advantage, to avoid a greater Evil by admitting a less. But it cannot be applied to moral Evils, without a very dextrous Construction. Properly speaking, therefore, of two moral Evils, neither is to be chosen. Yet it frequently happens, that two Laws, either both Affirmative, or one Affirmative and the other Negative, shall seem to clash with one another, so that we cannot

MR. BARB. NOTES.

¹ Our Author, in his last Editions, quotes an excellent Passage of Arnobius to this Purpose: "Since future Things are of that Nature, that no Man can clearly discover them, nor foreknow their Events; no Man of Sense, but of two Things equally uncertain, will choose that from which he may hope for some Good, rather than that from which he can hope for none." In short, if the Evil that threatens us, has no Effect, we run no Risque; whereas we are expos'd to very great Danger, and hazard All, if, when the Time comes, we find by sad Experience, that we were not afraid without Cause. Adv. Gentes, Lib. ii. See Lib. ii. Ch. iii. §. 21. n. 6. Our Author mistakes, in annexing this to the first Rule of Grotius, whereas Mr. Pascal, in his Thoughts, Ch. vii. proves it ought to be join'd to the second.

² Mr. Thomassius, in his Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 59. affirms, That there is no such Thing as a doubting Conscience, because Doubting is no Determination of the Soul, but a Suspending the Judgment only. But Mr. Titius will not allow this to be a sufficient Reason to take away the Distinction; for besides the Suspension, there is a Determination, by which the Conscience is put upon an Action, the Doubts which ought to prevent it still remaining.

⁴ 'Tis a Maxim of Holy Scripture, which teaches us, That whatsoever we do without Faith, i. e. without a thorough Conviction of the Goodness of it, is Sin. And all the Heathen Wise Men, both Greeks and Barbarians, have given us the same Rule. Qui in vero dubitat, male agit, cum deliberat: He that doubts of the Truth, does ill while he deliberates. Publ. Syr. See Grotius Lib. ii. Ch. xxiii. §. 2. The Scholars of Zoroastres had this Rule, if it be dubious, whether an Action be good or Evil, we must not do it, till we are inform'd by our Doctors. Hyde in: addit. Persa 50.

satisfy both at the same time^a. In this Case ignorant Persons are apt to fancy, that a Comparison is made between two Evils, or Sins of Omission, and that we are to do that, which it would have been the greatest Sin to have left undone. But in Reality, we do not here of two Sins choose the lesser; but that Action, which without this clashing and interfering had been a Sin, now ceases to be sinful, when we are oblig'd to a contrary Duty, by the Force of a stronger Law. Thus, for Example, when there seems to be a clashing between the affirmative Command, Give Alms, and the Negative, Do not steal, without doubt we must not be guilty of Thievery to gather Matter for our Alms; according to that of the Apostle, we must not do Evil, that Good may come of it. Yet in this Case, not to give Alms, is not properly a Sin, because Affirmative Precepts exert not their Force of Obligation, when there remains no Supply of Matter to furnish out the Action. So again, when a clashing is made between the two Affirmative Precepts, Obey God, and Obey the Magistrate, no Question but we ought to obey GOD rather than Men^b: Not because, of two Evils the least is to be chosen, but because it is not an Evil to deny Obedience to the Magistrate, when it cannot be given without violating the Duty we owe to GOD. For a weaker Obligation always yields to a stronger, when both cannot be fulfill'd together.

IX. To a doubtful Conscience a scrupulous one is very nearly related; and this is, when the Judgment of the Understanding is possess'd with an anxious Fear, lest the Thing which we fancy to be Good, should prove Evil, or vice versa. Now when such Scruples are founded on probable Arguments, the Action is to be suspended, 'till they can be taken away and clear'd up, either by the Force of Arguments, or by the Authority of wise Men: But when they proceed only from a melancholy and a superstitious Softness and Indiscretion, they are by all Means to be discouraged, and forcibly driven out of our Thoughts. Therefore 'tis a good Remedy which Cartes^c prescribes against Fluctuation of Mind, and the Bitings of Conscience which precede an Action, to accustom our- selves to the forming of certain and determinate Judgments of all Things that offer themselves to us. But we must observe farther, that these Judgments ought to be drawn from genuine and solid Science, or from the Doctrine of the Laws of Nature, and from the Christian Religion, purg'd from the vain Additions of superstitious Men. For tho' without this Security, the Mind may indeed be so far harden'd, as not to perceive any Fluctuation, or to feel any Remorse of Conscience; yet such a Firmness and Obduracy is neither of long Continuance, nor free from the Imputation of Sin. Whence we cannot approve of the latter Part of Des Cartes's Prescription, where he tells us, We should always think our Duty is discharg'd, when we have done what we judg'd best, altho' we have made the worst Judgment that can be. For this is not to cure the Disease, but by an ill-temper'd Opiate, to bring a Drowsiness and Stupidity on the Mind.

X. When the Knowledge of the Understanding is wanting, as to the Performance or the Omission of any Thing, we call this Ignorance. Which, as far as concerns our present Design, may be divided, either with Respect to its Influence on the Action, or with Respect to its Origin. With Reference to the former, it is of two Sorts, one being the Cause of the Thing ignorantly done, and the other not. The first may be call'd Efficacious, and the other Concomitant. The first is the Negation of such a Knowledge in the Understanding, which, had it been present, would have hinder'd the Action. Such was Abimelech's Ignorance, Gen. xx. 4, 5. who, had he known Sarah to have been Abraham's Wife, had never entertain'd any Thoughts of taking her for himself. The latter is a Negation of such a Knowledge in the Understanding, as would not have hinder'd the Fact, so that the Man, tho' he had known what he was indeed ignorant of, yet would have done the Thing nevertheless. As suppose a Man should kill his Enemy by a chance Blow, whom he would otherwise have kill'd, had he known him to be in that particular Place, where he now threw his Weapon casually, and without any Intention of Hurt^d. Thus the Boy who flung a Stone at a Dog, and by mistake

^a This was the brave Declaration of Socrates, I honour and esteem you, O ye Athenians; but in point of Obedience, my Duty to GOD is to be satisfied before my Obligation to you. Plato Apolog. ^b De Passion. Art. 170, & 177.

² This Saying of Socrates is by many learned Men compared with the Passage in the Acts, Ch. iv. ix. v. 29. but, as Mr. Le Clerc observes, Ars Crit. To. i. he speaks of his Daemon or Genius, and not of the True GOD.

⁵ This Definition comes near the Opinions of the Peripateticks, which distinguish the Sorts of Ignorance and Error, by the Sorrow or Penitence which the Agent shews, or not, after the Action, Ethic. Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. ii. which, if it be allowed, scarce any one but would easily avoid the Imputation of his Crimes. But Mr. Pufendorf's Definition, depends not only upon a false Supposition, but is incompleat, because it agrees not to Actions allowable and indifferent. Nothing but want of Knowledge, which hinders acting, renders Error efficacious, and consequently not to be imputed. Now such Ignorance is thus distinguished; 1. It is efficacious, when it respects the necessary Knowledge of the Action we are about, either as to the Nature of the Thing, or Intention of the Agent; such Ignorance hinders Consent, and being involuntary, can't be imputed. This may be easily applied to particular Actions, as well lawful as unlawful. On the contrary, 2. Concomitant Ignorance is that which respects that Knowledge which has no Relation to the Affair we are about, and which, not hindring Consent, can't preserve us from Imputation. It is voluntary or involuntary, and having no Influence upon the Business in Question, can't contribute any thing to cause an Alteration. Tr. Obs. 25.

hit his Mother-in-Law, and kill'd her, said ¹, Τ' αὐτόμαλον ἡμῶν καλλίω βελεύεται, Fortune had a better Aim than I. Some distinguish these two Species of Ignorance in this Manner, That what is done by the former shall be said to be done out of Ignorance, what by the latter, to be done by one that is ignorant. Yet even in the latter Case, no Murder, according to the strict and proper Sense, is committed. For tho' that ill Affection of Mind was in itself vicious, yet it contributed nothing to the Fact. With Reference to its Origin, Ignorance is divided into voluntary and involuntary. The former is by some term'd consequent and vincible, the latter antecedent and invincible. The former, whether it be directly affected, or proceeds only from Idleness and Unattention, is when a Man knows not that which he could, and ought to have known: the latter, when a Man knows not such Things, as he had neither Ability nor Obligation to know. This invincible Ignorance is either such *in itself*² and not in its Cause, or else both in itself, and in its Cause too. The former is, when in doing a Thing a Man is not able to overcome the Ignorance from which it proceeds, and yet is in Fault for falling into that Ignorance. Thus frequently when a drunken Man commits a Sin, he does not know what he is doing, yet he is culpable for not knowing it. The latter is, when a Man not only is ignorant of such Things as could not be known before the Action, but is also free from any Blame upon the Account of his falling into that Ignorance, or his continuing in it. On this Point is observable what Aristotle has said in his Ethicks, Book iii. Chap. i, ii. and what Eustathius has commented on the Place. Where he distinguishes between what is done by one being ignorant, and what is done out of Ignorance. For Instances of the former, he brings the Actions of a drunken, or of an angry Person; for such Men, tho' they often know not what they do, yet the Ignorance is not the Cause of their acting, but the Drunkenness, or the Anger, of which 'twas in their Power to decline the former, and to restrain the latter. He adds farther, that those Persons cannot be said to do a Thing unwittingly, who sin upon account of not knowing what was to be done, or what to be avoided, which Ignorance he calls *Ignorance in Election*³, or *Ignorance of Universals*⁴: for these every Man was oblig'd to know. But that Ignorance of Particulars is the Thing, which renders an Action capable of being construed involuntary. These Particulars are, who, what, about what, and in what, with what Instrument, for what Cause, and by what Manner. All these no Man in his Senses can be ignorant of together, because he is at least apprehensive of his own acting, and therefore can resolve the first Question (U'bo?) But⁵ in all the other Circumstances Ignorance may intervene. Thus Persons offend who say⁶ what they ought not, not knowing that what they have said ought to be kept secret. And the same is the Case of a Man who intending to shew his Friend some shooting Engine, should let it go off, and kill him. An Instance of Ignorance about what, and in what (which are the same Thing) may be, when a Man kills his own Son, mistaking him for his Enemy. Ignorance of the Instrument is, suppose a Man should throw a pointed Spear at another, and kill him, taking it to have had no Point. For what Cause comes to be consider'd in Ignorance, in such a Case as this: Suppose a Man should apply a Remedy to another, with design of preserving his Health, and the Remedy should (against his Knowledge) prove mortal. The last Circumstance is, in what manner; as if a Man in teaching another should intend only to give him a slight Blow, but should by Accident desperately wound him⁷. The Roman Lawyers have treated under a peculiar Head concerning *Ignorance of the Law, and Ignorance of the Fact*⁸. But they did not consider Ignorance so much for the Force and Use it had in moral Actions, as for the Influence it had on Matters of Right, and as it made for the keeping, or⁹ acquiring, or losing of any legal Possession or Qualification. But their numerous Reasonings about both Kinds may be reduc'd to this short Issue, That Ignorance of the Law is, for the most part, join'd with some Degree of culpable Negligence¹⁰, but Ignorance of the Fact is not; and that therefore Equity

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

² This Division is not very necessary, for only the last sort of Ignorance is involuntary or invincible; for in Matters moral, voluntary comprehends not only what is formally consented to, but what precedes Consent, if it be a necessary Consequent of it. Titus Obs. xxviii.

³ i. e. When we are ignorant which of two Things propos'd to us is most advantageous, or with what View we must act; as for Example, when we prefer a profitable or agreeable Good before an honest one.

⁴ Such is the Ignorance of the Law of Nature, at least of its common Principles; and the Ignorance of the Civil Laws of the Government to which we belong: So that tho' we may kill or poison another without any such Design, we can't innocently persuade ourselves that Murder or Poisoning is allowable.

⁵ There are some other particular Circumstances, the Ignorance of which is as inexcusable as that of general Principles. As for Example, If one shall shoot off a Gun in a publick Place, and kill a Man, it will be no Excuse that he thought no Man would pass that Way, because he must needs imagine that such Places are much frequented.

⁶ Thus says Aristotle; Aeschylus the Poet, being accused for publishing the Mysteries of Venus Elufina, was acquitted, because he knew not, that those Things which he had spoken were to be kept secret. For the Ignorance of a Thing as to the Quality, or what, consists not in being ignorant of what is done, but of its being of such a Nature, or having such a Quality.

⁷ Two other Circumstances may be added; as, 1. The Time; for we may be ignorant whether a Day be holy or not, a Festival, or Working-day, &c. 2. The Place, whether it be consecrated or common.

⁸ See the Digest. Lib. xxii. Tit. vi. and Cod. Lib. i. Tit. xviii. see also Mr. Daumat's Civil Laws in their natural Order, Part. i. Lib. i. Tit. xviii. §. 1.

¹⁰ The Reason is, because the Law may, and ought to be clear and determinate, but Facts are often very intricate, so that the wisest Men can't unfold them; and thereupon, in Matters of Fact, when Ignorance is gross, it can't be alledged as a Reason available. Ibid. Leg. ii. & vi. & ix. §. 5. see Cujas Observ. v. 39.

directs us to interpret the former to the Man's Prejudice, and the latter not.

XI. When not only a Knowledge of the Truth is wanting in the Understanding, but a false Persuasion has intruded into its room, which passes itself for Truth, then we say a Man has an erroneous Conscience, or that his Mind is possess'd by an Error. This Error is (like Ignorance) either vincible or invincible: The former is that which a Man could and ought to have overcome, by applying such Diligence as is morally possible, or as the common Condition of Humanity admits and allows: The latter is such as a Man could not vanquish by all Diligence morally possible. Where it must be observ'd, that should we approve of that Saying of the Emperor Antoninus, Book ix. Chap. xlii. Whosoever sins, does in that decline from his propos'd End, and is certainly deceiv'd^a; yet if the Error were not insuperable, the ill Actions proceeding from it cannot be exempted from the Number of Sins properly so call'd, nor ought to be pardon'd in Gross by a promiscuous Indulgence^b.

XII. But it ought especially to be remark'd, that Error has different Effects in Actions, which a Man may undertake or omit as he pleases, or the Exercise of which is left to his free Will; and in such Actions as are enjoin'd or forbidden him by the Law or the Command of a Superior. In the former kind of Actions, the Error is suppos'd to intercept our Consent: And therefore those Consequences do not flow from it, which are otherwise apt to follow on such an Action as we have thus consented to; especially if the Error did not steal on us thro' supine Carelessness and Neglect. And therefore in Bargains an Error about a Thing, or about its Quality, upon Prospect of which a Man was induc'd to come to such an Agreement, renders the Bargain void. For in this Case the Man is not conceiv'd to have agreed absolutely, but upon Supposal of the Presence of such a Thing or Quality, on which, as on a necessary Condition, his Consent was founded: and therefore the Thing or Quality not appearing, the Consent is understood to be null and ineffectual. Which Point shall be discuss'd more fully in its proper Place.

XIII. But the Case seems to be very different in necessary Actions, or in such as are commanded or forbidden by a Superior. Where we must first enquire, whether the Error arises in the Theory, or in the Practice; that is, whether a Man entertains a false Opinion concerning the Necessity of some Actions, thinking those ought to be omitted which should have been perform'd, or vice versa; or whether some Error occurs in the very Exercise of an Action, by Means of which the Action is not applied so rightly as it ought to have been. The former Kind of Errors do not, in our Judgment, at all hinder the Imputation of an Action to the Agent, according as it shall appear to agree or disagree with the Rules prescrib'd him, because they must upon all Accounts be esteem'd superable: For he that would restrain the Actions of another by a Rule, ought at the same Time to make a sufficient Declaration of his Will, that it may be clearly known by the Person whom he is to oblige. For otherwise 'tis the most unjust Thing in the World to require Obedience to a Law, when either the Law is unknown, or the Discovery of its Sense exceeds the Capacities of those whom it affects. Therefore, if a Man errs in Theory, that is, if he fancy a Thing to be commanded which is really forbidden, or, vice versa, he is suppos'd not to have apply'd sufficient Diligence, and therefore he cannot refuse to bear the Imputation of Faults committed upon such an Error. This Doctrine is by some Casuists thus explain'd in other Words: If the Conscience entertain a vincible Error about an evil Thing, the Man sins, as well if he acts for it, as if he acts against it: That is, if he has persuaded himself that an Action was commanded, which was indeed forbidden, or that an Action was forbidden, which was indeed commanded, he sins by performing the former, and by the forbearing the latter; because such a Performance and such a Forbearance are repugnant to the Law, but the Agent might and ought to have known the Law, according to its true Import and Signification: And yet^c the same Man has sinn'd no less, if he has forborn an Action which was indeed forbidden, but by him believ'd to be commanded; or if he has perform'd an Action really commanded, yet such as he imagin'd to be forbidden. For tho' in these Cases there be no external Acts repugnant to the Law, yet because the Man thinks his false Notion and Construction of the Law to be right, therefore the contrary Intention shall be imputed to him as Sin: For the evil Intention of the Agent makes the Action appear evil, at least with Respect to the Agent himself. From all which it appears, that from an erroneous Judgment no Action can proceed which may be imputed as good and right to the Actor, and that

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ For 'tis a Rule of the Law, That Ignorance of the Law hurts any Man, but of the Fact not. Digest. ibid.

² See Ch. vii. §. 16. The Questions about invincible Ignorance and Error, have been much debated in France, in order to maintain the Rights of Conscience in Matters of Religion, against the Attempts of such Teachers as are against a Toleration, and are for prosecuting all that differ from them; for which 'tis convenient that the Curious consult the Books.

when a Man is falsly persuaded that such a Thing is unjust, the Thing is unlawful for him to do, so long as his Persuasion shall continue uncorrected. Add. Lib. lxxvi. §. 8. D. of Thefts.

XIV. But if a speculative Error be entertain'd concerning a Thing indifferent; that is, if a Man should be persuaded that he ought to do, or to omit somewhat, which was indeed left free on both Sides, he will only sin, if he acts contrary to what this false Opinion suggests, upon the account of the Pravity of his Intention, but will not sin, if he acts according to the Directions of his Error. For indifferent Things are plac'd without the Bounds of the Law; which cannot be transgress'd by their Performance or Omission: And that Error appears very harmless, which does not give Occasion to sin. Yet it is plain, the Actions undertaken upon the Motions of such an Error, cannot obtain those good Effects which otherwise follow the like Instances of Obedience to the Laws: Thus, if a Legislator had constituted such a Reward to those who comply'd with his Injunctions, this Reward could not be challeng'd by one, who through Error and Mistake should have observ'd some indifferent Things, fancying them to be positively determin'd, and legally enacted.

XV. But 'tis much more usual that an Error should intervene in the Practice and Exercise of Actions commanded by the Laws: As suppose the true Object of the Action should be remov'd, and another substituted in its Place; or if we should mistake the Time or Place of the Execution enjoin'd. Such Actions, as they are not follow'd by those Effects which are otherwise due to Actions rightly apply'd; so neither are they attended with the Effects proper to bad Actions, because the Error was not contracted by any culpable Negligence: Which some Authors thus express in other Words, An intervening Error hinders the Action from being imputed on either side, making it neither good nor evil. Whoever (says Seneca Herc. fur. v. 1237.) gave Error the Name of Wickedness? Thus, tho' otherwise you would be freed from your Obligation by paying a Man what you owe him, yet should you pay him undesignedly, and by pure Mistake, you will not indeed have committed a Sin, but you will by no Means have cancell'd the Obligation. Thus when a Man has, with an honest Intention, tho' with an inconsiderate Liberality, conferr'd a Kindness on a wicked Person, who will abuse it toward the maintaining of his Disorders; he cannot at all boast of having done a good Action, yet he shall be excus'd from any Share in the consequent Wickednesses, and not be reckon'd to have contributed any Thing toward their Commission. But when a Man has been particularly commanded to discover and observe precisely the Object, the Place, or Time of acting, it will be a hard Matter for him to escape the Imputation of those Effects which shall proceed from the ill applied Action, unless he can demonstrate his Error to have been morally insuperable and unavoidable. Thus if you give your Servant a strict Charge to wake you at such a certain Hour of the Night, it will not serve him for an Excuse of his Default, to say, that he mistook in telling the Clock; yet if by any Casualty the Clock went wrong, or was out of Order, the Servant shall be free from all Offence and Blame.

XVI. It frequently happens too, that an Error intervenes in the Exercise of a bad Action, while the Actor misses the Object at which he aim'd. In which Case, the Malice of the Actor shall continue the same as if he had not mistaken, but the Action itself shall be esteem'd more or less heinous, according as the Object is on which it casually lighted. Thus a Person who intending to kill his Enemy, accidentally kills another Man, shall be nevertheless guilty of Murther. See Lib. xviii. §. 3. D. of Injuries, & Lib. xiv. D. L. Cornelian de Sicariis, & Grot. in Sparf. Florum ad h. l. Yet the Murther shall receive more or less Aggravation, according to the Dignity or Meanness of the Man, who has been so unfortunately slain. Hitherto must be refer'd the Case of a Man's killing another outright, whom he intended only to wound, or to hurt in a less Degree; for here the Fact itself must be the Rule to go by in Judgment: But when in the Exercise of a faulty Action, a Man by Mistake lights on a lawful Object, such an Action will be no farther evil, than as it flows from an ill Intention in the Actor; so that this Error shall hinder the Fact from coming under the Name of the Vice design'd to be committed. And therefore that Saying of Seneca, of the Constancy of a wise Man, Ch. vii. will not hold, at least² in human Courts and

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ 'Tis on this account that the Roman Law has decreed, that he that takes away any Thing from another, thinking that he does it without the Consent of the Owner, commits a Robbery, tho' afterward he find that the Proprietor was willing he should take it and have it for his own; but he that has as much as in him lies committed the Robbery, can't be prosecuted in Law as a Thief. The Law is this; If I against the Will and Consent of the Owner, as I believe, do meddle with his Goods, tho' the Owner is willing I should, whether am I guilty of Theft? And Pomponius says, I am a Thief: yet it is true, that if I am willing he should have the Use of them, tho' he know it not, he can't be impleaded as guilty of Theft. Digest. Lib. xlvii. Tit. ii. Of Thefts, Leg. xlvii. §. 8.

² Indeed before God it is real Adultery; for, as the Author has observed more than once before, and as he hereafter speaks, Chap. vii. §. 4. an evil Intention renders the Action evil, which otherwise is good and innocent, as to the Matter, and in itself: tho' a good Intention is not sufficient to render an Action materially evil, or good. Whereas, on the contrary, if a Man designs to do a good Action, and happens (thro' Mistake) to do an ill one, there is no doubt but God will accept of that Intention, as if he had effected the Good that he propounded to himself to do; and although it gives Place, by Accident, to some Sin of another Nature, 'tis no less commendable for the Good which he would have done, unless the Execution of a pious Design either become unprofitable, or be hindered by the Change of certain Circumstances. So that the Maxim which our Author has laid down in the last Section, I mean, That every Action, in doing of which we may fall into an Error, can neither be imputed to us as Good, nor Evil: This Maxim, I say, had need be understood with some Restrictions. Nor is it generally more true, that these sort of Actions must always want, before human Judicatures, those Effects which they would have, if they were well applied. As for Instance, If a Man not knowing it, marries a Woman who hath a Husband already, or is a Relation within the Degrees forbidden, as he is no Adulterer or incestuous Person, supposing that it be a real Error, so their Children cannot be reputed Bastards, provided that both the Father and the Mother be under an invincible Ignorance in that Respect. This is the very Example that Mr. Hertius alledges here, and we may also consult his Discourse of a Supposed Marriage, Tom. i. of his Commentaries and small Works. Printed in 1700.

THE most wise Creator being pleas'd to make Man an Animal governable by Laws, for this Purpose implanted a Will in his Soul, as an internal Directress of his Actions; that the Objects being propos'd and known, this Power might, by an intrinsic Principle, and without any physical Necessity, move itself towards them, and might choose that which seem'd most agreeable and convenient, and reject that which appeared unsuitable and incommodious. The Will is concern'd to govern human Actions by the Administration of two ^rFaculties, by one of which it is said to act spontaneously, and by the other ^rfreely. To Spontaneity, if we may so speak, are attributed certain Acts and Motions, of which some are interior, commonly call'd ^rEliciti, others exterior, generally term'd Imperati. The former are such Acts as are immediately produc'd by the Will, and terminated in the same Power. Some of these are employ'd about the End, as Volition, Intention, Fruition; others about the Means, as Consent, Election, and Use. Volition is that Act of the Will by which it is simply carried toward some End, without Regard had whether the End be present or absent; or that Act by which the End is barely approv'd of. Others call this the Will of simple Approbation, by which a Thing is understood to agree with the Nature and Inclinations of some Person, though he has not yet actually and effectually mov'd himself towards the producing or obtaining of it. Intention (or Proæresis) is a Desire efficacious toward the obtaining of an End, or it is an Act of Will, by which it effectually tends toward an absent End, and endeavours actually to produce or to acquire it. This Act being join'd with the Hopes and the Attempts of procuring an End, we may easily conceive what sort of Things it is employ'd about: and they, to be sure, must be Things possible in themselves, and Things in our Power; as Aristotle has more largely observ'd, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. iv. Election is concern'd only about those Things which are in our Power. Every Man purposeth to do that alone which he imagines himself able to compass. Again, Lib. vi. Ch. ii. What is already done, cannot be the Object of our Choice and Pursuit; for no Man consults of what is past, but of what is to come, and is changeable and contingent. Whereas what is already done cannot be alter'd or recall'd. And therefore Agatho well says, This alone is beyond the Power of God himself, to make that never to have been done, which hath really been done. For it enters into the very Definition of Intention or Προαίρεσις, that it may be made with Reason and with Thought. Tho' there be many Degrees of Intention, with Reference to its different Height and Force; yet as far as concerns the Occasions and Purposes of civil Life, 'tis sufficient to divide it into plenary and semi-plenary. The former is that by which the Will determines on any Thing after a full Ex-

MR. BARB. NOTES.

^r See what is said about this unprofitable and ill-designed multiplying of Faculties in the second Note of the first Chapter foregoing.

^r Mr. LOCKE seems to have Reason to believe, That Liberty is nothing else but a Power properly appertaining to Agents, and not an Attribute or Modification of the Will, which is itself nothing but a Power. See his Philosophical Essay about the Understanding, Lib. ii. Ch. xxi. where this whole Matter about the Will, and Liberty in general, is treated on at large. Mr. LE CLERC, in his Latin Treatise about Spirits, sect. 1. Ch. iii. is of the same Opinion with Mr. LOCKE, as to the Seat of the Will (as I may speak) but he elsewhere enters upon a more particular Matter of the Hypotheses of that great Philosopher, and shews, that his Notions are neither exact nor clear. See his Choisite Biblioth. Tom. xii. Art. iii. p. 83, &c. and Tom. xvii. Art. vi. p. 236, 237.

^r The Author makes use of the School Distinction here, of Actus Eliciti; i. e. Acts springing up (as we may say) from the very Bottom of the Will; which being Terms not used in the French Tongue, they are better expressed by, The immediate Acts of the Will.

^r Our Author in all this Quotation follows very unfitly some Latin Translation, which had rendred the Greek, προαίρεσις, Election, instead of Deliberation, Consultation, or Counsel.

^r This Writer being deceiv'd by the Latin Interpreter, translates, ὅσα αὐτῷ ἐν ἑαυτῷ δι' αὐτῶν, quæ ex sese fieri posse existimaverit, i. e. which he thinks may be done of themselves; which being a Mistake, the English Translator has truly avoided it, as I have done, by rendring it, which he believes himself able to execute.

amination

amination of the Matter, and without being driven to it by the Violence of the Passions. The latter, when due Deliberation has not been taken, or when the Hurry of the Affections has created a Confusion and Disorder in the Reason. Fruition ¹ is the Rest, or the Delight of the Will in the End now obtain'd and present to it. To which is oppos'd Repentance, or an Aversion (commonly join'd with Shame or Grief) to somewhat which we have before design'd or affected. Consent is our simple Approbation of Means, as we judge them proper for our Work: And these Means, when they are plac'd within our Reach and Power, imply the two remaining Acts mentioned in our first Division; for Election determines, and Use applies them to the compassing of the End propos'd.

Those Acts are call'd Imperati, or enjoin'd, which are perform'd by other human Faculties upon the Motion and Appointment of the Will.

II. Liberty is a Faculty of the Will, by which, all Requisites of acting being given, it may out of many propos'd Objects choose one or more, and reject the rest; or if one only Object be propos'd, may admit that, or not admit it; may do, or not do it. What we call the Requisites of acting, some express by the single Term Occasion ²: now from these the last Determination of the Agent is conceiv'd as a distinct Thing, which being added to the other Requisites, we immediately proceed to Action; and therefore those Requisites, mention'd in the Definition of Liberty, do not include that Share which the Man himself bears in the Action, but are contra-distinguish'd to it. But more particularly, we call ³ the Faculty of choosing one or more out of many Objects, Liberty of Specification, or of Contrariety, and the Faculty concern'd in the Admission or Rejection of one only Object, Liberty of Contradiction, or Liberty of Exercise.

Now Liberty is suppos'd to superadd to Spontaneousness, first an Indifference of Acts as to their Exercise; so that the Will is not oblig'd necessarily to exert one of its Acts, as to desire or refuse: For tho' in general it is impossible but it should affect Good, and refuse Evil, as such, yet in Reference to any particular Object propos'd, it may determine on which Side it pleases, tho' perhaps it may seem to have a greater Propension toward the one than toward the other. Another Thing that Liberty superadds to the Notion of Spontaneousness, is the Freedom of Determination; so that the Will may, upon an internal Impulse and Motion, exert either of its Acts of wishing or loathing, just in such a Place, and at such a Time. We must add farther, That tho' the Reason, which makes a Thing desired or avoided, does not depend upon the Will, but upon the Condition of the Object, according as it bears the Face of Good or Evil; yet that Appetite, and that Aversion, which thus follow the Appearance of the Object, are not of so much Force and Sway, but that there still remains in the Will a Liberty, whether or no it shall determine itself to any external Act about such an Object; especially since such an evil Thing may bear the Countenance of Good, and consequently be desirable, as long as it shall be set in Opposition to a greater Evil. And therefore to refute that Notion of Hobbes, De Homine, Cap. xi. §. 2. that Appetite and Aversion necessarily follow our Pre-conception of some Pleasure, or of some Uneasiness likely to proceed from the Object; no room being thus left for Free-will, we must carefully distinguish the Volition of simple Approbation, from effectual Intention or Προαίρεσις ⁴, of which the latter does not so necessarily depend on particular Objects. In the Words following this Assertion, he applies a very idle Piece of Nicety, while he observes, That when we say a Man has free Will of doing this or that, we ought always to understand it with this Condition, If he pleases; for 'tis absurd to say that a Man has free Will of doing this or that, whether he will or no. For no Body is so stupid as not to apprehend this Contradiction: And 'tis extream foolish to add the very same Thing which the Proposition asserted as a Condition to it. To say that a Man may freely will the doing of a Thing if he will, is the same thing as to say, Peter runs if he runs: And who would ever give this Clause the Name of a Condition? From what has been said it likewise appears, how we are to judge of those Notions laid down by Monsieur Le Grand in his Institutions of Philosophy, Part iii. Art. v. as if it were impossible for a Man not to desire what he clearly and distinctly perceives to be good; and as if a Man sinn'd only upon this Account, in not having a clear and distinct Perception of Evil ⁵.

III. But the chief Affection of the Will, and what seems immediately to flow from its Nature, is an intrinsic Indifference, upon the Account of which it is not restrain'd to any certain, fix'd, and unalterable way of acting; and which cannot be entirely extirpated by the Force of any external Means. And this Indifference we are the more firmly to assert and maintain, because, upon the Removal of it, ail the Morality ⁶ of human

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ This Term (Fruition or Enjoyment) is very improper (as any Man may observe) because the Notion of it, which he here lays down, is the Effect of Fruition, and not Fruition itself. It is true, that the Latin word Fruitio comes something near it; but it is very hard to find a word in French (or any other modern Language) fit to express the Moralists Notion upon which these Divisions are built.

² See Chap. v. §. 5 following.

³ This Distinction does not appear to be very necessary. The Liberty of Contrariety implies no more than a double Act of the Liberty of Contradiction. As for Example, If a Man is to choose, whether he shall read Greek or Hebrew, he consults with himself, 1. Whether he shall read Greek or no, and resolves in the Negative. Then, 2. Whether he shall read Hebrew or no, and chooses the first. This Instance is taken out of Mr. Le Clerc's Latin Discourse of Spirits, Sect. 1. Ch. iii. §. 12.

⁴ That is to say, Altho' we can't but be sensible of such Impressions as particular Objects make upon us, yet we are not necessarily carried to search for them, or avoid them; but a Man may by Reason deny himself the Pleasure which the Apprehension of it may flatter us with, and, on the contrary, expose himself to that Grief and Uneasiness, from which he might be exempted without those Considerations, which have induced him to undergo them. See Note 5. upon Ch. v. §. 13. following.

⁵ See the former Chapter, Pag. 32. Note 4. and Chap. v. §. 13. following.

⁶ We may add to these Quotations another Saying of the same Epictetus; Ἀντὶς προαιρέσεως ἔ γίνεσθαι, τίρπονθ' ἔ γίνεσθαι, No Man is a Thief or a Tyrant of his own Will. See Gataker's Notes upon Marc. Antoninus, Lib. xi. §. 36. where the Emperor quotes the Words of the same Philosopher.

Actions is inevitably overthrown. So Arrian on Epictetus, Lib. i. Ch. xvii. *What can overcome an Appetite? Another Appetite. What can conquer a Desire or an Aversion? Another Desire, or another Aversion. You will say, He that threatens me with Death compels me. I deny it; 'tis not the terrible Proposal which lays the Force upon you, but 'tis your own Choice which inclines you rather to the Commission of such a Deed, than to the Desire of Death. In this Case therefore, as well as in all others, nothing compell'd you but your own Opinion; that is, nothing overcame your Will but your Will. Idem Lib. i. Ch. xxix. The Will is not conquerable by any Thing but by itself. Add. Simplic. ad Epictet. Ch. i. p. 22. Of which wicked Design those Men are in a great measure guilty, who fancy some strange Kind of physical Predetermination in human Deeds, by which the Motion in itself, and as it is a natural Being, is so determin'd by the first Cause, that it cannot be done in any other Manner; tho' it afterwards receive its Morality from the second Cause. Nor are they in a less Fault, who from the Divine Preſcience would derive an absolute Necessity on all our Proceedings. For tho' this Attribute of GOD cannot be deceiv'd, yet that it does not take away the Indifference of the Will, may be easily understood, if we either clear the Word Preſcience from the Imperfection which it seems to imply, as do all other Terms taken from human Things, and applied to the Divine Nature (since in GOD there can be no Succession of Time) or if we say, that the Divine Concurrence does in such a Manner accompany second Causes, as still to leave them the Power of acting in the way originally assign'd them by their Creator, not debating them with Reference to moral Actions from principal into merely instrumental Causes. Add. Lucian, Niñoce, & Jupit. Confut. Anton. le Grand Inst. Philosoph. Cart. p. 8. Ch. xvii, xviii. How prejudicial such Notions are to a State or Kingdom, Grotius is well aware, when he observes, *Observ. de Dogmat. Reip. Nox. That those who utterly discard the Doctrine of Free-will, can hardly avoid making GOD the Author of all Wickedness; an Attempt which Plato himself declar'd ought not to be born with in a Commonwealth; De Repub. Lib. ii. Τῶν κακῶν ἄλλ' αἴτια δὲ ζῆλειν πᾶ ἀίτια, ἀλλ' ἑ τὸν θεόν. We ought to ascribe any other Cause of Evil, but never to refer it to GOD. To the same purpose Suetonius speaks well when he makes Tiberius (Lib. lxix.) a Contemner of all Religion, say, Quod omnia fato agi crederet, for believing the World to be guided by Fate. For thus Proclus (ad Timæum) divides Actions into three Ranks and Orders; two of which he makes those who deny GOD the Care of human Actions and Affairs; and those who attribute such a Care to GOD, as imposeth an absolute Necessity on all Events, utterly depriving Men of their Freedom and Choice. So also Salust the Philosopher speaks in his Book De Diis & Mundo: To attribute Injustice, or Lust, and Wantonness to the overruling Influence of Fate, is to make ourselves good, and the Divine Natures wicked. Again, in Plautus (Aulular. iv. 10.) when one says, I believe this was the Will of the Gods, for otherwise I am certain it could never have come to pass. Another answers him merrily, And I, for my part, believe, 'tis the Will of the Gods, that I should take you and hang you up for a Rascal.

IV. For the right Understanding of this Indifference of the Will, somewhat ought to be premis'd concerning the Nature of Good in general: Now tho' Good by many of the Philosophers is consider'd absolutely, so that every Being really existent may be pronounc'd Good; yet we without regarding this Signification, which we judge to be very usefess, will only consider Good, as it denotes Respect to others, and as it is said to be Good to one, or for one. According to which Sense the Nature of Good seems to consist in that Aptitude, by which one Thing is dispos'd to benefit, preserve, or compleat another; because this Aptitude, depends either upon the Nature of the Things themselves, or such Properties as they have naturally, or by Virtue of human Industry; and therefore this Good, to which we may give the Name of natural, is firm and uniform, and has no Dependance on the erroneous and various Opinions of Men. But because Good does not excite the voluntary Appetite of Man, unless it be known, at least under a confus'd Notion; and because Knowledge arising from Sense, gives but a gross Representation of the genuine Natures and Consequence of Things, so that the Understanding is often clouded with Error, and disorder'd by the violent Noises of Sense and Passion; hence it comes to pass, that many Men invest things falsely with the Name and Notion of Good, and this is what we call imaginary Good. And farther, every particular Person, as he understands a Thing to make for his Profit, his Preservation, or his Perfection, loves and desires it; and, on the contrary, what he conceives to be Evil for him, he hates and

MR. BARB. NOTES.

* The whole Sentence of Plato, of which our Author cites only the last Part, is very emphatical; GOD, because he is good, can't be the Cause of all Things, as some assert, but is only the Cause of some few Things among Men; and no Cause of many; for good Things are much fewer than evil among us, and none can be the Cause of good Things but God; but we must seek out some other Cause of Evils than him. These Words are but a little before the Place where that Philosopher delivers the Words which Grotius refers to, κακῶν ἡ αἴτια, &c. We must with all Zeal oppose them who assert, That GOD, who is good, is the Cause of any evil: Nor must it be endured in any well-governed City, that any Man whatsoever, either young or old, no not so much as a Poet by way of Fiction, should but lightly, much less plainly, either speak, or hear any such Things, as are neither pious, convenient, nor consonant in themselves to be mention'd, when spoken.

† All the Metaphysicians.

‡ According to the Definition which Mr. Locke gives of Good (in his Philosophical Essay upon the Human Understanding, Lib. ii. Ch. xv. §. 2.) every Thing is so called, which is proper to produce and increase Pleasure in us, or to lessen and shorten any Grief; or is able to procure or preserve us in the Possession of any other Good, or a Freedom from any Evil. And, on the contrary, every Thing is accounted Evil, which is proper to produce or increase Grief in us, or lessen any Pleasure; or is able to cause any Evil to us, or deprive us of any Good. This Definition, which respects the Effect chiefly, that Things good or evil work upon our Spirits, is consequently more natural than that of our Author, which refers to the Dispositions and Qualities of the Objects, as to the Effect which they produce, with relation to the Constitution of our Nature in general, not distinctly expressing the Sense of Pleasure or Pain, which in all Languages, and in the Opinion of all Men, are comprehended under the Notion of Good and Evil. In fine, Tho' the Philosophers distinguish sometimes between agreeable and profitable, and in some Cases these two Things may be oppos'd one to the other, yet 'tis certain that every real Good is both agreeable and profitable, as every real Evil is disagreeable and disadvantageous, if not at present, yet at least in the Consequents, and at the End of a certain Time.

avoids. But as it is not requisite to the Nature of Good, and to its Power of moving the Appetite, that it should be consider'd precisely as Good only for the Person desiring, and abstracting from the Advantage of others; especially since upon account of the Society and Conjunction of Men, the Good of others may redound to our Benefit and Use; so amongst Mankind there is so fair an Agreement about the general Nature of Good, and its chief Parts and Species, that barely on the Score of their being divided about some Particulars, there's no manner of Reason either why we should deny the universal, and unshaken, and uniform Notions of Good, or why, in a State of natural Liberty, we should make it depend on the bare Opinion of every private Man, in a State of Government on the sole Judgment of the supreme Magistrate, as the only proper Measures and Rules for its Determination. Add. D. Cumberland, De L. N. iii. where he refutes Hobbes's Notions of Good, &c. Ch. i. §. 20. As for the moral Good which appears in human Actions, it shall be discuss'd by and by in its proper Place.

From the foregoing Observations this manifestly appears to be the Nature of the Will, that it is always desirous ¹ of Good in general, and always averse to Evil in general: For it implies an open Contradiction, ² not to incline towards that which seems agreeable, and to incline to that which seems disagreeable to us. And therefore in this general Inclination of the Will there can be no Indifference admitted, as if it could (with the Appetite of simple Approbation) sometimes desire Good and sometimes Evil. But they are the particular Goods and ³ Evils, which give room for the Indifference of the Wills of particular Men, who at different Times, and upon different Occasions, are very various in their Scents and Pursuits. And there is this evident Reason why it should be so, because there are scarce any Goods or Evils which appear to a Man in their native Colours, and without suffering any Mixtures, but commonly they are blended and shuffled together; Good is adulterated with Evil, and Evil is sweetned with ⁴ Good; to which, if we add the strange Inclination which we find to some good Things in particular Persons, and how all Men have not the Ability to distinguish solid and durable Enjoyments, from those which are ⁵ only painted and transitory; we shall see how there must needs arise hence an infinite Variety in the Wills and Inclinations of Men; and how all pursue what they think their own good, but in different Paths, and by different Means. Besides, many Men do not know what Things are good for them, and therefore do not desire them; many more prefer the fair Face and Semblance of Evil to real and substantial Good, and so reject what they ought to desire, and desire what they ought to reject. To which purpose Aristotle well observes, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. vi. That to be desireable by the Will, simply and properly speaking, which is truly Good, but that to be desireable by every particular Man which he imagines so. What Gunter writes to Li-gurinus may be here applied, Lib. iii. ver. 289.

-----Tantum falsa loquendo

Fallere nemo potest: veri sub imagine falsum Influit, & furtim deceptas occupat aures.

When Falshood bare and undisguis'd appears,
It never can deceive: but when it wears
The Garb of Truth, it cheats the heedless Ears.

Thus then in almost every Thing and every Action many Species of Good and Evil, both real and apparent, crowd themselves into our Thoughts, and when these have for some time variously agitated the Mind, and driven it one while to favour one, and one while another, at last the Will by an intrinsic Force determines itself to the embracing of one Object, and discarding the rest. And an Action perform'd in this Manner, is call'd spontaneous or voluntary, which Aristotle thus defines, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. iii. Τὸ ἐκείσσιον δὲ βίαιον εἶναι, ὃ ἢ ἀρχὴ ἐν αὐτῷ, εἰδότες τὰ καθ' ἕκαστα ἐν οἷς ἢ πράξει. That is to be esteem'd spontaneous, the Principle of which is in the Person acting, who likewise understands the Particulars in which the Action consists. Eustratius comments on this Place to this purpose: Both these Conditions are necessary to the constituting a spontaneous Action, that the Principle be in the Actor, and that the Actor know the Particulars. For he that acts out of Ignorance, has the Principle of acting in himself; and he that knows the Particulars, may yet act by the Compulsion of others. And therefore neither of these Conditions by itself can make a Thing properly voluntary.

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

¹ This is what is implied by that common Maxim, That all Men naturally and unmoveably desire their own Happiness; for true Happiness consists not only in the Enjoyment of all good Things, of which they are capable, but in a Freedom from all Evil: the least Pain being sufficient to mar our greatest Pleasure.

² The Quotations which are annexed by the Author a little lower (viz. at the End of the Paragraph in the English Translation, and are noted by a, b, c) are more properly to be put in here, and especially the last of them. I shall add, upon this Occasion, a Passage out of the Emperor Marc. Antoninus, τὴς δὲ ὀργῆς ἐστὶ, &c. Is it not a cruel Thing to hinder Men from pursuing Things, which they believe to be useful and agreeable to them? Lib. vi. §. xxvii. See Gataker's Notes upon the Place, where he has gathered several Sentences out of ancient Writers to the same Purpose.

³ Such are all those that concern this Life.

⁵ Mr. Locke in his Phil. Essay of Human Understanding, Lib. ii. Ch. xxi. §. 58. speaks well to this Purpose: The present Judgment of Good or Evil, which we make, is always right. Indeed, Things considered as we actually enjoy them, are what they seem to be, so that in this Case, Good apparent and real are the same thing; for Grief and Pleasure being esteem'd so as we feel them, and no more; the Good or Evil present is really no greater than it appears: and, by Consequence, if every one of our Actions be respected in itself, without any regard to its Consequences, we can never mistake in our Choice of Good, but must always infallibly adhere to the better Part. Compare these Words with what goes before and follows, where that great Philosopher clears this Matter with much Solidity and Exactness.

V. But it does not always fall out that the Mind shall maintain a kind of Æquilibrium, and apply itself to acting or not acting, without any considerable Advantage on one Side more than on the other. But for different Reasons, and by different Causes, it frequently bends with great Violence one way; and sometimes external Violence bears so hard upon it, as to take away its Strength, and to disable its Powers. As the Mariner does not always cut the Sea with an even and prosperous Gale, but sometimes oppos'd by furious Winds, he hardly holds the Helm, and sometimes being violently shaken out of his Seat and his Command, he is oblig'd to commit his Vessel to the Rage of the Tempest.

Among the Things then which are forcible in drawing the Will to one Side, are the peculiar Genius's and Dispositions of Men, by which many Persons are render'd extremely inclinable to some kind of Actions. These Dispositions arise in a great measure from the Nature of the Climate and of the Soil, as Lucan. Lib. viii. ver. 366. speaks,

-----Emollit gentes clementia cæli,

-----The Heavens sweet Clemency
Softens the Tempers of the Men.

And Herodot. Calliop. It is the settled Appointment of Nature, that soft Soils should breed soft Men; and that the same Land should never be famous for the Excellency of the Fruits, and for the Vigour of the Inhabitants. To which add Charron de la Sagesse, Lib. i. Ch. xlii.) from the Temperature of Humours in Mens Bodies (occasion'd by the Food, the Age, the Diet, the Health, the Studies and Pursuits of particular Persons) from the Conformation of those Organs, which the Soul employs in performing its Duties, and from the like Causes^a. Concerning all which it must be in general asserted, That none of them, as they belong to the Production of a moral Action, are of so great Force and Vehemence, as to render it impossible for the Will to take^b the contrary Side^c. And tho'^d as to some particular Impulses^e arising from the Difference of Constitutions, the Will sometimes seems unable to hinder their Existence, or their breaking out into Action, yet it may provide so far, as to see they shall not break out into Sin. Thus, if a Man be so far vanquish'd by the warm Motions of Love, as to raise his Passion above Restraint, a Power is still left him of satisfying his Desires in an innocent and lawful Manner. See 1 Cor. vii. 2. And thus Plato disputes well, De leg. Lib. xii. "That however the most unnatural of Lusts had prevail'd in the Grecian State, they might yet be suppress'd by the Laws, if rightly fram'd and apply'd." By the same Rule we must judge of what Horace de Arte Poet. and others have deliver'd concerning the different Manners and Inclinations of the several Ages of Life: Thus, for Example, if old Men are violently inclin'd to Covetousness, yet 'tis in their Power to seek Wealth without injuring others, and without usurping the proper Goods and Possessions of their Neighbours. Add Huart. Scrutin. Ingen. Ch. v.

VI. Another Thing that inclines the Will vehemently to some particular Actions, is the frequent Repetition and Custom of those Actions; whence it comes to pass that they are undertaken very freely and with great Dispatch, and that when the desired Object presents itself, the Mind seems, by a kind of Magnetism, to be drawn towards it^f. And these Inclinations being join'd with an exceeding Desire and Dexterity of acting, pass commonly under the Name of Habits, which, as they are concern'd about moral Actions, either good or evil, are call'd either Virtues or Vices. There's no Reason why we should tire ourselves to reckon up these according to their full Tale and Number, since most Authors, who have hitherto profess'dly treated of moral Philosophy, have fancied the main Part of their Business and of their Science discharg'd, by explaining only the eleven Words that stand for so many Virtues. It will suffice to observe in general, that those Dispositions of the Mind are Virtues, by which a Man is inclin'd to Actions making for the Preservation of himself, and of human Society; and that those on the ^f A little Care and Diligence (adds this Author elsewhere) seldom fails of taming, and considerably amending these natural Dispositions. But if sometimes it doth not perfectly succeed, it at least prevents the Commission of such outward Acts as are punishable in the civil Judicatory, and the Difficulty which we find in conquering these kind of Inclinations, is abundantly recompens'd by the Honour consequent upon such a Victory. The Duty of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 12.

^g Socrates's Words signify no more than this, as Charpentier has very well translated them; It is my Opinion, that all Virtue depends upon Exercise and Use; that is to say, to preserve them, we must practise them; and the Series of the Discourse will not suffer us to doubt that this is Socrates's Meaning. So that these Words are nothing to the Purpose of our Author, who being deceived by the Latin Translation, thought they signified, It is my Opinion that all Virtues may be acquired by Exercise.

^h See Chap. xiii. of Tome i. of Mr. Bayle's Answer to the Questions of a Provincial, where you'll find some curious Passages about the Power of the Constitution. But if we reflect seriously upon this Matter, we must acknowledge, that those over whom Nature has such an absolute Command, are commonly such Men as will take little or no Pains to conquer their Inclinations, or have taken no proper Methods to do it. These depraved Inclinations are a kind of natural Distemper, yet not altogether incurable; as Cicero very well observes, who alleges a notable Example to this Purpose, viz. that of Socrates, who freely confessed, that he was naturally inclin'd to those Vices which a Physiognomist charged him as guilty of, but that he conquered them by the Assistance of Reason: Cicero's Words are, Qui autem naturâ dicuntur iracundi, &c. Such Persons as are said to be by Nature passionate, merciful, envious, or the like, are so made by some evil Dispositions of the Mind, but are curable; as Socrates is said, when Zopyrus, who profess'd himself to know every Man's Nature by the Figure of his Face, had in a great Assembly loaded him with many Vices, for which he was laugh'd at by all the rest; but Socrates cleared him of any Mistake, by saying that he had once such Inclinations, but he had mastered them perfectly by his Reason. Tusc. Quæst. Lib. iv. Ch. xxxvii. See also the same Author concerning Fate, Chap. v.

ⁱ We may add, Or if it be absent, it hopes for it with very great Expectation; as our Author speaks in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, &c. Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 5, 13.

contrary are Vices, which addict us to Actions destructive of ourselves, and of the Community to which we belong. And here Mr. Hobbes must fall under Censure for that Assertion in his Book De Homine, Ch. xiii. §. 9. where he declares, That, except in civil Life, there can be no common Measure found out applicable to Virtues and Vices, and that, consequently, in a State of Nature there can be no such Measure establish'd, by which, as by a Standard, those Things which we call Virtues and Vices may be settled and determin'd. For the Definition which we but now set down, will reach even to a natural State: and whatever Things are enjoin'd as Virtues in civil Communities, ought to agree to that Definition; and if any Things should be ordain'd contrary to it, they ought to be reckon'd absurd and unreasonab'le Commands.

The Diversity which appears in the Laws of several different Communities^a, does not hinder, but that there may be some universal and uniform Definition of the Virtues. For this Diversity either is concern'd about such Things as are plac'd without the Sphere of natural Laws, or it arises from hence, That what is really a Precept of the Law of Nature, is in one Place invest'd with the farther Force of a civil Law, and in other Places not; or lastly, it is an Evidence, that some Legislators, in framing their Edicts, were not befriended by good Reason. Of which we shall have more to say by and by^b.

Farther, tho' Vices and ill Manners confirm'd by long Use and Habit, seem to pass into a kind of second Nature, so as not to be without great Difficulty resist'd, as Calpurnius Flaccus speaks, Declam. ii. When Modesty hath once lost its Influence, no Ruin, no Horror appears deform'd to Minds bent upon Wickedness; and Lucian against an unlearned Man, A Dog that is accustomed to eat Tripes, can hardly be brought off from it, (Add. Bacon's Essays, Ch. xxxvii) yet Actions proceeding from them ought nevertheless to be reputed voluntary. And altho' Actions which precede any Habit, and by which it is introduc'd, are undertaken with a fuller Intention, and with a more urgent Endeavour, than those which are perform'd after the Habit has been contract'd, when as it were without staying for the Command of the Will, the other Faculties rush swiftly upon the Object: yet neither the Goodness nor Pravity of the Actions seem upon this Account to be at all diminish'd. For 'twould be a Thing of very ill Consequence, if a good Action were therefore to be reckon'd less good, because it has been often repeated, or if a Man were to be esteem'd less a Sinner, because he had frequently sinn'd. Especially, since every Man is the Cause of his own obtaining a Habit, or of his acting so suddenly and expeditiously. Aristotle has an Observation very close to this purpose in his Ethicks to Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. viii. Οὐχ ὁμοίως δὲ αἱ πράξεις ἐκείσιν εἰσι, καὶ αἱ ἕξεις. Τῶν μὲν γὰρ πράξεων ἀπ' ἀρχῆς μέγχε τέλος κύριοί ἐσμεν, εἰδότες τὰ καθ' ἕκαστα τῶν ἕξεων δὲ τ' ἀρχῆς, τ' καθ' ἕκαστα δὲ ἡ προῖδησις ἢ γινώσκουσι, ὡσπερ τ' ἀρρώσιων. ἀλλ' ὅτι ἐφ' ἡμῖν ἦν, ἔτιως ἢ μὴ ἔτω χρήσασθαι, διὰ τῆτο ἐκείσιν. Actions and Habits are not spontaneous in the same Manner; for as to our Actions we are Masters of them from the Beginning to the End, because we understand all the Circumstances that belong to them: but of Habits the beginning only is properly in our Power, continual Additions being beyond our Knowledge or Prevention, just as it happens in the Increase of Distempers. But because we had originally the Power of doing so, or otherwise, therefore the Habits likewise are to be construed as spontaneous, upon account of the Principle whence they spring. On which Place Eustratius thus descants; We have a Command only over the Beginnings of Habits, not over their Increase or their End. For the Progress and Improvement of them is unperceiv'd and unregarded, while they rise and advance by silent Degrees; whence it happens, that some Men run deeper now and then into Wickedness and Vice than they intend'd. This may be seen particularly in Drunkenness and Uncleaness, in which Men sometimes going on freely and heedlessly, as if it were left to our Pleasure whether we should get a Habit or no, by a Continuance of bad Practice, contract a Habit before they are aware. Nor is it in Vices only that the Additions and Augmentations are undiscover'd, but in Virtues likewise the Advances are made by such secret Steps, that a Man may sooner observe his own Proficiency, than he can know how he came by it.^c

VII. Those Motions of the Mind which they call Passions or Affections, chiefly excited by the Appearances of Good and Evil, have likewise a great Force in driving the Will violently to some certain Actions, besides their ill Influence on the Judgment, which they frequently cloud and obscure^d. How many these are, by what Means they are either rais'd or allay'd, and what Use and Service they have in Life, is most excellently shewn by Des Cartes^e and his Follower Le Grand^f; to whom may be added Mr. Hobbes^g. It is enough to our Design, if we only remark, that however violent the Affections may prove, they can never quite extinguish the Force of our Will.

The Observation of Grotius on Matthew v. ver. 22. is very applicable to our present Purpose: He considers three distinct Things in Anger, the Παθή or Affection, the Ὀρμή or Impetus, and the συγκατάθεσις or Consent. The Παθή or Faculty, enabling us to be angry, being implanted in us by Nature, cannot be extirpated; but it should be rank'd among those indifferent Things which we may make either a good or a bad Use of ¹. But because that Part of the Mind where the Παθή or Passions are seated, is in itself irrational, hence it comes to pass, that without expecting the Judgment of Reason, the Ὀρμῆ or sudden Sallies, ex-

Indeed, as Mr. Montagne says (Essays, Lib. iii. Chap. xiii.) if a Man looks closely into the Motions and Circumstances of his Passions, which prevail usually upon him, he may observe how they come, and abate a little of their Furioufness and Course. They don't fall upon him all of a sudden, and, as I may say, take him by the Throat, but they threaten, as it were, and creep on him by Degrees. Seneca has some fine Reflections of this Nature, which I can't pass over without Notice (Epist. cxvi. at the End, and De Ira Lib. ii. Ch. xii, xiii. which deserve also our Perusal) Scis quare non possumus ista? Quia nos posse non credimus, &c. Do you know why we can't command our Passions? 'Tis because we can't believe we can. There's more in't. We love our Vices heartily, and therefore we become the Defenders of them, and instead of banishing them, we do all we can to excuse them. Nature has made us able enough to resist them, and to free ourselves from their Dominion, if we would make use of our Forces, if we would rally them, and employ them wholly in our own Cause, or at least would not turn them against ourselves. Our only Hindrance is, we will not, and the Inability that we plead is a vain Pretence. There is nothing so hard but the Mind of Man may compass and accustom itself to it, by frequent and daily Meditations. There is no Passion so fierce and commanding, but Education and Care can tame. The Soul can govern itself as it pleases. Some have found out a Way to restrain Laughter altogether, others have forborn Wine, Venerie, and all sorts of Drinks; others have accustomed themselves to long and almost perpetual Watching, unless with Slumbers for a small Moment; others have learned to dance upon a Rope, to carry vast Burdens, which have seem'd to be above all human Abilities, and to dive very deep into the Sea, and stay a long time without breathing. See what shall be said on Chap. v. §. 13. Note 6. & Heliod de Oper. & Dieb. ver. 290, &c. Edit. Cleric.

² That is to say (as our Author speaks in his Apology, §. 22.) at least, that they do not produce any Action that is punishable in human Judicatures. Indeed if we examine all the Laws of the World, we shall find none that wholly excuse Offences committed in a violent Passion; an Evidence, that all Legislators suppose, that it is in the Power of a Man to restrain his Passions. Aristotle has observed the same Thing in these Words, Τοις τοις ὁ νόμος. &c. To these Things agree not only what's done privately by every one, but what's done by Law-givers themselves, who punish and correct all sorts of Offences, except such as are done through Force or Ignorance, of which they are not the Cause. Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. vii.

³ Dist. loc. Art. v. & Cicero Tusc. Quest. Lib. iv. Ch. xiv. speaks thus, All Diseases and Disturbances of Mind arise from the Scorn and the Neglect of Reason.

⁴ There is a Place in Xenophon's Cyropædia, i. e. the Book of Cyrus's Education, which contains some notable Reflections to this Purpose: "A Mede, named Araspes, maintains there, That Beauty has no Force naturally to incline a Man to depart from his Duty, whether he will or no; for if it were so (adds he) it would have the same Effect upon all Men, as Fire burns every one that comes near it. But we see that some are affected with Beauty, and some not; one loves one Beauty, and another, another. In a word, 'tis a voluntary Thing, and every one loves whom he pleases. A Father does not fall in Love with his Daughter, nor a Brother with his Sister: Fear and Law restrain us from entertaining a Desire of such Persons as others love. Whereas were there a Law strictly forbidding Men not to be hungry, because they have nothing to eat; or not to be thirsty, because they have nothing to drink; nor to feel Cold in Winter, and Heat in Summer; no Man would obey such a Law, because 'tis above their Power to do it. But Cyrus objected to this Assertion, If it be in our Power to love or not, why can we not cease to love as we please? How comes it to pass that Love tyrannizes over so many Men, who sacrifice all to that Passion, and put themselves upon a thousand mean Actions to please the Object loved? What is it that makes their Chains so strong, and makes them avoid all Means that may free them from their Slavery? Araspes answers, They are Men of vicious and loose Tempers, lazy Souls, and Slaves to their Appetites, who tho' they wish a thousand Times that Death might deliver them from their Torments, yet they have not Courage to undertake it themselves, tho' nothing were more easy, if they desired it. Men of this sort scruple not to thieve to satisfy themselves, and as they are in the Judgment of all the World punishable, because nothing could force them to rob another, so we may say, that the fairest Countenance does not force a Man to love it, or seek that which he ought to abstain from. So that a Man who gives himself up to his Lusts, without Reserve, absurdly accuses Love of constraining them, when as indeed 'tis nothing but his own Weakness. Such as stand upon their own Honour and Integrity are subject to these Affections, as well as others, they love Money, fine Horses, and handsome Women, but they easily pass them by when they can't be attained without a Crime." This is the Substance of Xenophon's Words, Και ὁ νόμος ἄριστος. &c. Xen. de Instit. Cyr. Lib. v. Chap. i. §. 5, 6, 7. Edit. Oxon. See also Chap. ii. §. vi. Pag. 19. Note 2.

⁵ See Seneca of Anger, Lib. ii. Ch. iii, 4.

ert their Force; and unless these are diligently kept under, the συγκατάθεσις or Consent certainly follows, when the Power of the Soul, which was constituted for the governing and restraining of the Affections, idly lets go the Reins, and permits itself to be dragg'd by those it ought to guide. This συγκατάθεσις then, or Consent, he declares to be voluntary, and to be perform'd at the free Pleasure of Man: But he tells us farther, that from diligent Attention and Exercise, but more especially from the holy Spirit of God, sufficient Assistance may be obtain'd, even against these first Motions (which the Philosophers compare to the twinkling of the Eyes) so as to hinder them from any long Continuance, or any forcible Sway.

Besides, that Man is arm'd by Nature with some peculiar Instruments for moderating the Passions, and that he is engag'd by a stricter Necessity to restrain them, in as much as he incurs a far greater harm to his Health and Life from their Violence and Rebellion, has been fully made out by Dr. Cumberland ^b. To conclude this Point, since some of the Passions are excited by the Appearance of Good, others by the Appearance of Evil, and accordingly spur us on toward the procuring the one, and avoiding the other: This difference is observable between them; that the former Kind afford little or no Excuse, if any Thing be done otherwise than it ought to be, by their Instigation; but the latter deserve the greater Degree of Favour and Pardon, according as the threatening Evil which excited them was more ungrateful to human Nature. For 'tis much easier to want a Good, not necessary to the Preservation of Nature, than to admit an Evil tending to the Destruction of our Nature: Whatever Aristotle^a has affirm'd to the contrary in that Maxim of his, καλεπώτερον ἰδοῖν μίχρῃσιν ἢ θυμῷ, 'It's harder to resist Pleasure than Anger. When a Man has done an ill Action out of Obedience to an itching Lust, he is suppos'd for the sake of the present Pleasure, voluntarily to run the Hazard of bearing whatsoever Evil may thence ensue; and therefore when he has already had the Enjoyment, which he thought equivalent to the Evil that might arise from it, he cannot upon any Pretence plead for the Mitigation of that Evil. But he that has done amiss upon the Fear of an impending Evil, has all the Infirmary of human Nature apologizing and interceding in his Behalf, since the only Cause of his Miscarriage was his being willing to admit what he imagin'd to be the least of the Evils likely to befall him. But of those Cases we shall hereafter have a larger Field to consider and determine, viz. in Lib. viii. Chap. iii. §. 19, 21.

VIII. Lastly, The Vice² of Drunkenness is a great Inciter of the Will to some particular Kinds of Actions; and this is procur'd either by Drink, or by some other Sorts of Fumes, or by Opium, a Thing of so universal Use in the Eastern World, the Effect of which is, that it disturbs and drives along the Spirits of the Blood with a most violent and not much less to Anger and Rashness: Upon which Account Lycurgus us'd to call Wine an evil Potion (or a magick Draught) because it chang'd and turn'd Mens Minds. Hygin. Fab. cxxxii. Iſocrat. ad Demonic. The Mind, when debauch'd with Liquor, is in the same Condition as a Chariot that has lost its Driver: The latter is not more fatally hurried into Danger, than the former into Sin. And for the same Reason the Cretians receiv'd this, among other Laws, of their famous Minos, Μη συμμιξεν ἀλλήλοις εἰς μέθην^b, Not to drink with one another so far as to Disorder and Excess. Among the Indians Drunkenness lies under the heaviest Censure, being rank'd in the Number of their five most heinous Sins, which are said to be these: 1. To lie with one's Mother, which takes in both a Mother in Law, and the Wife of a Master or Teacher. 2. To kill a Brachman. 3. To steal Gold. 4. To be drunk. 5. To converse and keep Company with Persons guilty of any of these Crimes^c. Mahomet too, under the Notion of Religion, found Means to prohibit his People the Use of Wine, tho' they were naturally more addicted to it than most other Nations³.

Whosoever is voluntarily guilty of this Vice, since he knew, or at least might presume what Effects would follow it, can with no more Reason desire to be freed from the Imputation of Faults committed under its Guidance, than he can with a good Grace complain of a Shower of Rain falling into his House, when he himself,

Mr. BARB. NOTE S.

¹ Our Author might have observed, that Aristotle contradicts himself, for elsewhere he thus speaks, καλεπώτερον ἔσθαι, &c. It is harder to bear Grief, than to abstain from Pleasure, Lib. iii. Ch. xii. See also the Beginning of Chap. xv and Lib. vii. Ch. vii. where he maintains, that Intemperance is more voluntary and shameful than the Transports of Anger. Muretus endeavours to prove the Truth of the first of these contradictory Propositions in his posthumous Comments, printed at Ingolstadt, 1602, but his Reasons are very weak; and I don't observe that he speaks any Thing about those Places that I shall quote presently, to reconcile them with that he was treating of. He had a good Opportunity, and I doubt not but he might have prevented so palpable a Contradiction. All that can be said for Aristotle is, that after he had advanced such a Paradox, he thought it necessary to maintain his Proposition, and forgetting himself, reason'd at length from the Light of common Sense and Experience; for the Philosophers hold this as a constant Maxim, That he that yields to Pleasure is more to blame than he that is overcome with Grief, because 'tis easier to conquer the first than the last. Aristotle does but repeat what his Master Plato asserted before him, Α θ. Νῦν ἐν πόσει, &c. Ath. shall we say that he is worst who is conquered by Grief, or by Pleasure? Cl. He seems to me worse who is conquered by Pleasure, for we all agree, that he who is conquered by Pleasure is shamefully baffled by himself, but the former is vanquished by grief. To this we may add the Authority of the Imperial Philosopher Marcus Antoninus, Lib. ii. Ch. x. where he thus speaks: Theophrastus, in his Comparison of Crimes, following the common Opinion, determines as a great Philosopher, That those which come from Lust, are greater than those that proceed from Anger; for those that are moved by Anger seem to act against Reason, contrary to their Purpose, and with a secret Remorse; but they that follow their Lusts, and are conquered by their Pleasure, appear more intemperate, and effeminate in their Faults. So that it is with great Reason and Truth, which is an Honour to Philosophy, that he adds, The Crime that is done with Pleasure, is greater and more punishable, than that which is committed with Sorrow and Grief. Indeed he that is angry resembles a Man, who having received an Offence, is provoked by Grief to revenge himself, whereas the Voluntary is moved by his own Passion to do an Injustice for his own Satisfaction. See further what is said on Chap. vi. §. 14. Note 4.

² This Author elsewhere joins those sort of Vices, which deprive us of the Use of our Reason, either for a Time, or for the rest of our Life. But, to speak truly, the Effect of those Vices, as well as Drunkenness, is not so much to incline the Will to certain Things, as entirely to destroy the Principle of human Actions, because in that a Man knows not what he does. Titius Obs. xxxvii. upon Putendorf of the Duty of a Man and Citizen, Chap. i. §. 15.

out of a petulant Humour, has been pulling off the Roof. Plautus has a merry Jest to this purpose; Wine (says he) would be too cheap at the Price it now brings, if a drunken Man might do whatever he pleas'd, without being call'd to an Account.

Yet in indifferent Actions, which are left to every Man's Pleasure to perform or omit, Drunkenness is allow'd this Favour, that the Effect which would have follow'd any such Action, had it been¹ deliberately perform'd, shall now be utterly invalid, since the overtaken Person acted with much Disadvantage.

And those Causes which we have hitherto reckon'd up, are the most considerable among such as impose a kind of physical Bias and Tendency on the Will. That which morally inclines it most, or at least, ought to incline it, is Obligation: And yet this, how great soever, neither takes away the Will's intrinsic Liberty, nor renders the Action voluntary, tho' the Lusts and Passions may strive vehemently to oppose it. Hither may be refer'd that Sentence of Aristotle, ἀτοπον τὰ ἀκρίσια φάναι, ὅν δ' εἰ ἐρέμεθα, 'Tis absurd to call those Things involuntary, which we ought to desire and to pursue, Ethic. Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. iii.

We say, Obligations ought to incline the Will; for such is the perverse Disposition of human Minds, that frequently the very forbidding of a Thing, raises a Desire of doing, or of enjoying it², as Ovid Amor. iii. 4. speaks,

*Nititur in vetitum semper, cupimusque negata.
Quicquid servatur, cupimus magis; ipsaque furem
Cura vocat.* —————

Warm when deny'd, and fiercer by Restraint.
What's closely kept, improves in our Belief;
To hoard the Gold is to invite the Thief.
Forbidden Pleasures have a quicker Taste.
They that have Freedom use it least; and so
The Power of Ill doth the Design overthrow.
Sir Charles Sidley.

Which Unhappiness, if we consider its closer and nearer Causes, may be refer'd, partly to the vicious Curiosity of Mortals, who admire every Thing that they are Strangers to (which Opinion is strongly confirm'd by the Harshness of the Edict, and by the Care and Trouble of Obedience) and partly to the Hatred and Obstinacy which we bear towards the Forbidder, whence we disdain that our Liberty should be abridg'd by a Person who looks so ill in our Esteem; whereas, on the contrary, it's the Nature of Love to make us willing to comply with the Commands and Desires of the Party we affect.

IX. It is farther observable, That sometimes upon the Approach of extraordinary Dangers, and such as are suppos'd to exceed the common Strength and Firmness of human Minds, the Will is so vehemently urg'd and press'd, that it gives Consent to somewhat, which had it been free from that Necessity, it would have utterly abhor'd. Actions of this Kind have the Name of mixt, being partly voluntary, and partly involuntary. Thus far they are to be esteem'd voluntary, in as much as their Principle is in the Agent, who is acquainted with the Nature and Circumstances of the Thing he is going about: And in as much as the Will for the present Time and Necessity, inclines toward them as toward a lesser Evil, or toward one Part of an Evil, when otherwise a greater or an entire Evil must be undergone: And this lesser or partial Evil turns into a kind of Good, when both it and the Evil compar'd with it, cannot be both avoided together. Aristotle Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. v. Ch. vii. says, A lesser Evil, if it be compar'd with a greater, may be esteem'd a kind of Good. So Quintil. Instit. vii. Ch. iv. In comparing Evils, that which appears lightest, must pass for Good. Aristot. Ethic. iii. 1. Simply and absolutely speaking, no Man in his Wits willingly throws away his own Goods, but for the Security or Preservation of himself and others. Such Actions then are to be account'd mixt, tho' they approach nearer to voluntary than to involuntary.

But the same Actions are likewise in some Degree involuntary, because the Will seems to be driven on them contrary to its Inclinations, and would never undertake them, if the impending Evil were by any other Means possibly to be escap'd. For which Reason they have this Quality in common with involuntary Actions, that the moral Effects and Consequences attending Actions merely voluntary, do in these, in a great Measure, if not totally, fail³. For tho' sometimes a Man may have so strait an Obligation laid upon him, that even upon the Threats and Appre-

¹ If we will make a more curious and exact Distinction of the Effects of Drunkenness, we must observe how a Thing may be imputed to a Man which is done in his Wine, according to the several Degrees of Drunkenness, viz. The one moderate, which does not hinder a Man's acting freely, and with Deliberation; the other strips him entirely of the Use of his Reason. This last Sort, if it be also involuntary in the Original, that is to say, if a Man falls not into it by his own Fault, brings forth Actions altogether involuntary, and consequently furnishes him with a sufficient Excuse; but if Drunkenness be voluntary in its Principle, then we must distinguish Actions indifferent from Actions unlawful. As to the first, If a Man, for Example, make a Contract, that hinders the Effects of an Imputation, because those sort of Actions require a particular Knowledge of what is done, and the Fault which went before them, and from which they derive their Original, is not sufficient to make it of Force. See Lib. iii. Ch. vi. §. 5. But it is not the same in unlawful Actions; for if a Man be in an Estate, from whence 'tis his Fault if he fall, because he might and ought to hinder it, his perfect Drunkenness will not excuse him from the Crimes which he has committed thro' Excess of Wine. And if he puts himself into that Condition on purpose to execute some ill Design, he deserves a double Punishment. Titus Observ. xxxviii.

hensions of Death, the most terrible of natural Evils, ^a he ought not to recede from it; yet where this does not expressly appear, it is not easily presum'd and suppos'd, as being too sharp and rigorous for the Condition of Humanity: And where there is no such severe Obligation impos'd, it would be downright Folly not to come off as cheaply as we can, and not to suffer as small a Share of Evil as we may compound for. And therefore many Things, which ^b would have deserv'd Reprehension, had they been undertaken without such a Necessity, when they are done under the Urgency of so hard a Case, are commended by all fair and equitable Judges; ^c other Things deserve Pity rather than Revenge; others again are for the same Reason, either entirely, or for the most part ^d excus'd, and in others the Odium and Fault of the Action is devolv'd upon the Person ^e who reduced him to that unhappy Extremity ^f, the Man who perform'd the Deed being declar'd innocent. Aristotle discourses well on this Point ^g, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. i. For these kind of Actions, says he, Men are sometimes commended, when for the sake of great and honest Things, they have sustain'd some Indecency or Hardship. To some Things, tho' we allow no Praise, yet we grant a Pardon, when a Man has done what he ought not, upon the fear of Evils exceeding human Nature, and not tolerable by mortal Strength. And there are some Things perhaps, which no Man can be forc'd or compell'd to commit, but ought rather to endure the utmost Extremities, and Death itself. Add. Eustrat. ad loc. But I question whether it were proper (especially for a Christian Bishop) to give this Example of a mixt Action, Familiarity with another Man's Wife, though in itself foul and sinful, yet ceaseth to be so, if undertaken on the Account of killing a Tyrant.

X. Lastly, since to make an Action voluntary, there is requir'd not only that the Principle of Motion be in the Agent, or that the Agent address himself to work by the Impulse of his own Will, but likewise that he knows what he is doing; upon the want of both, or of either of these Conditions, the Action is rendered involuntary, as Aristotle speaks, Ethic. ad Nicom. iii. 1, 2. Those Things seem to be involuntary, which are done either upon Force, or upon Ignorance. An Action cannot be said to have been perform'd involuntarily out of Ignorance, unless it be follow'd with Sorrow and Repentance. ^h Now a Man is properly said to be compell'd, when by the Force of a stronger extrinsecal Power, he is brought to apply his Limbs otherwise than he would, so as to express his Aversion and Dissent by manifest Signs, and especially by corporal Resistance and Reluctancy. As if (to use Aristotle's Examples) the Wind, or Men superior to us in Power, should violently carry us any where against our Consent. Tully in his second Book of Invention, Lib. ii. Ch. xxxii. gives an Instance after this Manner: The Rhodians had a Law, that whatever beak'd Vessel should at any time be found in their Harbour, it should be condemn'd as Prize, and expos'd publickly to Sale. Now the Question is, Whether a Vessel of this kind, being driven into their Ports by a Tempest, ought nevertheless to suffer the common Penalty? 'Twas upon this Topick, that the Friends of the ravish'd Lucretia ⁱ comforted her under her deep Affliction, by turning all the Guilt on the vile Author of the Crime, telling her, That the Mind only properly sinn'd, and not the Body; and that there could be no Fault where there was no Deliberation or Design.

This Reluctancy in Civil Courts is presum'd to have been us'd in such Actions or Passions, as are not vulgarly thought to be willingly perform'd or undergone, and where all Signs of an actual Consent are wanting; whence arose the Term of interpretative Reluctancy.

Thus, whereas by the Jewish Law a Virgin is suppos'd to have suffer'd Ravishment, if she lost her Honour in the Field, without Witnesses; yet Philo the Jew ^j denies the Favour of this Law to reach a Maid, who admitted a Debauch willingly, tho' in a Solitude: As neither can the same Law hurt a Maid in the City, who in the like Danger either could not cry out, or cried to no Purpose, and without Relief.

A forc'd Thing may be so either in itself, and ^d As for Example, When a Woman, or Maid, slays the Man that makes an Attempt upon her Chastity. See Lib. ii. Ch. v. §. 11. following.

^e Such is the Case of a Woman, who, in a Famine, is forc'd to eat her own Child, as it happened in the Siege of Jerusalem, as J. Josephus tells, Lib. vii. de Bell. Jud. Ch. viii. and as it befel the seven Englishmen, of which our Author speaks, Lib. ii. Ch. vi. §. 3.

^f As when a Woman, or Maid, slays herself to avoid the Loss of her Chastity, with which she is threatned by an extravagant Man, who will satisfy his Lufts at any Rate. See Lib. ii. Ch. iv. §. 19. following, where Mr. Hertius refers us to what the Author speaks, Lib. ii. Ch. v. §. 15. of an Husband who slew his Wife's Gallant, or his Wife, when he took them in the Heat of their Lust. But this is the Effect of a furious Anger, and Desire of Revenge, which ought to be referred to §. 7. above, and not to mixt Actions, such as our Author calls them. I say the same of an Example which Mr. Hertius gives of a Woman, that poisoned her Husband and Son, because they had killed a Son of hers by a former Husband. See Valer. Max. Lib. viii. Ch. i. in the End, and Aul. Gell. Lib. xii. Ch. 7.

^g See the following Chap. §. 9. Mr. Hertius makes an Application, not very proper here, out of Justin, of the Phœceans, who seeing themselves deprived of their Lands, Wives, and Children, went and robbed the Temple of Delphos. for the Historian reflects upon it as a Thing not to be excus'd altogether; though they that committed it were less worthy of Blame, than those who had brought them to this Case of Despair. For so he speaks, The Fact of the Phœceans, though all Men abominated it upon the Account of the Sacrilege, yet the Thebans, by whom they were compelled to this Necessity, were more detested than they. Lib. viii. Ch. i.

^h Mr. Pufendorf might have joined with Eustratius, another Bishop more famous, who fell upon a loose Thought about a Subject something near it, but of more Difficulty. Read Mr. Bayle's Dictionary under the Head Acynidius. See further concerning these Sort of mixt Actions, upon the Account of which some Evil in itself is committed, what is said upon the following Chap. §. 9. Note 2.

ⁱ See Ch. iii. §. 10. Pag. 30. foregoing, about the beginning Note 5.

^j In fine, Sextus did not use an immediate Force upon Lucretia, as when a Woman defends herself, as much as she can, with her Hands, Feet and Teeth. She was not forced, any otherwise than such are, who resolve to cast their Goods into the Sea for fear of Perishing. She resist'd his Threatnings of Death: but when Sextus threatned to expose her Reputation to eternal Disgrace, she did what he wish'd, and slew herself. So that this Example does not well agree to this Place, where he is treating of mixt Actions. See Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

not in its Causes, or else both in itself and in its Cause. The first is, When a Person remains in such a State at present, as to be unable to repel the offer'd Violence, and yet was in a Fault for getting into such a State. Of this Kind was the Rape of Dinah, Jacob's Daughter^a; for the Virgin ought not to have wander'd among Strangers. The latter is, When the Person has, not by his own Fault, been brought into those Streights, which now occasion the Compulsion of him to any Fact. By the not being his own Fault, we mean, if he has done nothing but according to the Laws of Prudence and of his Duty. For if a Man performs the Office enjoin'd him, or uses his Right any other way, and acts not rashly or inconsiderately, whatever Violence over-powers him, he will have no Guilt imputed to him, and no Sin to answer for.

HAVING, in Pursuance of our Design, examined and explained the Will and the Understanding, as the Principles whence human Actions obtain the Privilege of being ranked in a different Class from the Operations of Brutes, the next thing which we are concern'd for, is the general Disquisition of moral Actions, since in discovering their Rectitude, or Pravity, the Science we are now engaged in is chiefly employ'd. Moral Actions then, are the voluntary Deeds of Men consider'd in common Life, as they include the Imputation of their Consequences and Effects. We call those voluntary Deeds, which in such a Manner depend on human Will as on a free Cause, that without its Determination (proceeding from its¹ internal Acts drawn forth by the previous Knowledge of the Understanding) they would never have been perform'd; and which therefore, as to their being done or not done, must be referr'd to the Power of Man. And these Actions are here consider'd, not as they are bare Motions produc'd by some Power according to the natural Constitution of Things, but as they proceed from the Determination of the Will; a Faculty dispos'd to embrace either Part of two contradictory Choices. For a voluntary Action contains something material and something formal; the first is nothing else but the Motion of a Power existing by Nature, or its Exercise consider'd barely by itself; the other is the Dependence of that Motion or Exercise on the Determination of the Will, as on a Cause that is truly free, and acts by its own Resolution. The Exercise consider'd separately and by itself, is, for Distinction sake, rather call'd, an Action of the Will, or of the willing Power, in a Man, than a voluntary Action.

We may farther consider the *Action*² of the Will, either in itself, and absolutely, as it is a physical Motion, undertaken upon the previous Injunction of the Will, or else reflexively, as the Effects of it may be imputed to the Actor. Now voluntary Actions, as they comprehend this Reflexion, are, by a special Appropriation of the Word, call'd human Actions. And because from these Actions, as they are perform'd well or ill, as they are agreeable or repugnant to their Rule, the Law, one is said to be a good or an ill moral Man (the Inclinations of the Mind resulting from frequency of acting, being likewise term'd Morals) hence it comes to pass that moral Actions seem only another Name for human.

II. The Essence of moral Actions,³ according to the last Way of considering them, may be divided into two Parts or Notions, a Material

² The Original is, Actio Voluntatis; which Expression, tho' 'tis used in all the Editions, and his Elements of the Universal Civil Law, yet 'tis a plain Mistake of the Author, contrary both to his own Distinction, and the following Part of his Discourse; for he says positively, When moral Actions include in, &c. The English Translator was not aware of this.

On §. 2.

³ That is to say, As they are voluntary Actions, whose Effects may be imputed unto Men.

and a Formal. The material Part, or the Matter of a moral Action, is of a very wide Extent: Such may be first any physical Motion, whether it be of the locomotive Faculty; or of the sensitive Appetite; or of the external, or of the internal Senſes; or of the Underſtanding, ſo far as concerns the Exerciſe of Apprehenſion. For the Act of Judgment depends ſo much on the Quality which appears in the Object, that it is not capable of the Direction of the Will, tho' in forming of that Judgment, our Free-will and our Induſtry are allow'd ſome Influence and Power. The Act of the Will it ſelf may likewiſe be the Matter of a moral Deed, if we conſider it in its natural Condition, or as it is preciſely taken, for an Effect produc'd by a physical Power, as ſuch. So likewiſe may be the Privation of any physical Motion, which a Man might have produc'd either in it ſelf, or in its Cauſe: For a Man may render himſelf obnoxious to Punishment, as well by Omiſſions as by Commiſſions. As alſo the Inclinations of the natural Powers toward certain Objects (acquir'd by the voluntary Actions that have already paſſ'd) at leaſt ſo far as they are Spurs and Incentives to acting. Nor are my own Motions and Habits, or the Privations of either, alone the material Parts of my moral Actions; but the ſame Motions and Habits or Privations proceeding immediately from others³, provided they could or ought to have been directed by my Will. Thus the Spartan Inamorato's were to⁴ ſuffer for the Faults committed by their Minions⁵. Nay, the Operations of Brutes, of Vegetables, and of inanimate Things, may furniſh out the Matter of my moral Actions, when my Will ſhould have guided their Proceedings. Thus even in the Law of GOD, a Miſchief done by a going Ox is imputed to the Owner, in caſe he knew before-hand that the Beaſt was faulty this way⁶. Thus a Vine-dreſſer is reſponſible, if, through his Negligence, the Vine has ſpent all its fruitful Strength and Vigour in ſending out numerous and unneceſſary Suckers. Thus the Damages by Fire are repairable by the Perſons who occaſion'd it; and Waſtes cauſed by the breaking in of the Sea, or of Rivers, are to be made good by him who has either broke down, or neglected to keep up the Banks. Quintilian^c has propos'd two Declamation Lemmas much to our preſent Purpoſe. A Piper had play'd a Pbyrgian Ayre to a Man who was offering Sacrifice; the Man running Mad, and throw- *ing himſelf down a Precipice, the Piper is accuſ'd as the Perſon who had cauſ'd his Death. A Club of young Perſons, who had frequent Meetings and Entertainments, one day made an Agreement to ſup together by the Sea-ſide; one of the Society being abſent, the others wrote his Name upon the Stone Table which they had reared: The young Man's Father at his Return from a long Voyage, landing in this Place, and reading the Inſcription on the Stone, took it for his Son's Monument, and hang'd himſelf for Grief. The Company is hereupon impeach'd as acceſſory to his Death. Laſtly, the Admiſſions or Receptions of another Man's Deeds, as far as my Default contributed to their Production, may be the Matter of my own moral Actions. Thus a Rape is partly imputed to the Woman, if it appear that ſhe raiſhly ventur'd into ſuch a Place, where ſhe might have expected to meet with ſuch violent Treatment.*

III. The Formality of a moral Action conſiſts in the Imputativeness of it, if we may ſo ſpeak, by which the Effect of a voluntary Action may be imputed to the Agent, or eſteem'd as ſomething properly belonging to him, whether he himſelf physically produc'd that Effect, or whether he cauſed it to be produc'd by others. And from this Formality of the Action, the Agent likewiſe has a Share in the Denomination of Morality, being call'd a moral Cauſe. Whence we may eaſily underſtand, that the Ratio Formalis of a moral Cauſe, in Strictneſs and Propriety of Speech, conſiſts in Imputation, conſider'd with Reference to the Perſon in whom it terminates; and that therefore ſuch a Cauſe can be nothing elſe but a voluntary Agent, to whom the Effect is, or muſt be imputed, upon account of his being either wholly or partly the Author of it; and that therefore, whether it be Good or Evil, both are to be reckon'd as owing to him, and he is liable to give an Account for both. Thus one Man is the moral Cauſe of Hurt in another Man, whether he has made his Head ſwell by Blows of the Fiſt, or whether he has broke it with a Club, or whether he has ſet Dogs or Murderers upon him. Thus Anah was the moral Cauſe^a of Mules, he being recorded in Genesis xxxvi. v. 24. to have firſt found them out, or to have join'd the Mare and the Aſſes together for their Production. So Jacob was the moral Cauſe of the different Colours in Laban's Sheep, Chap. xxx. v. 37. And thus Lyſius (Orat. contra Ayorat) pleading againſt an Informer, upon whoſe Accuſations many Perſons had been executed, calls

² If we will find the Author's Meaning, we muſt remember what he has ſaid, Ch. iii. §. 2.

³ That is, when one may or ought to engage others to do a certain Thing, or hinder him from it, or contribute towards the begetting a certain Habit, or prevent it, he is reſponſible for that which he did not properly do, and in which he was guilty of nothing but pure Negligence or Want of Acting, which is yet looked upon as a real Action in reſpect to the moral Effect. This reſpects all them who are charged with the Management of others. See §. 14. following.

⁴ See Alian's Various Hiſtory, Lib. iii. Ch. x. and Mr. Perizonius's Comment on it. But that Example ſeems to be ill choſen, ſince there are many other which are commonly to be had. It is poſſible that this being ſo unlike our Opinions and Cuſtoms, made this Author think fit to give this Inſtance. For they pretended, that this Love, ſo dear and conſtant, had nothing but what was honeſt in it, and ſerved to inflame thoſe young Men who were the Objects of it with the Love of Virtue, tho' in Time it degenerated into an infamous Converſation, chiefly among the Greeks. See Poster's Antiquities of Greece. Theſe Inamorato's being then, as Alian ſpeaks, The continual Guardians of thoſe they loved, 'tis no wonder that they were to answer for their Behaviour.

MR. POLEY.

Yet it does not always happen, that a Man who has barely given Occasion to the Fact of another Man, should be² reputed the moral Cause of that Fact: and therefore the Sentence pronounc'd by Piso, which Seneca speaks of, was extream foolish as well as cruel, when ordering a Soldier to be led to Execution, upon Suspicion of whose Murder another Soldier had before suffer'd Death, he gave his Reason in these Words³, I order you to be executed for being the Cause of the Condemnation of your Fellow Soldier. There seems no great Necessity that we should here, with the Author of the Treatise *De Principiis Justi & Decori*⁴, distinguish between a moral Cause by it self, and a moral Cause by Accident. For a Cause by Accident is a Term of vast Obscurity, and very likely to create and encourage vain Disputes: And besides, if we cannot rightly impute the Effect of an Action to a Man, we cannot upon any Account, call him a moral Cause by Accident, tho' he contributed never so much to the material Part of the Action. Yet thus far we must plainly acknowledge, that in weighing and rating the Greatness of the Imputation, it is a very important Query, whether the Action proceeded from such a Person as the Principal, or as the Accessory? as likewise, whether the Agent directly intended such an Effect, or whether it proceeded from his Inadvertency, or any other concomitant Reason? For if the last of these Cases appear true, the Consequence will be, that the Action shall not be imputed to the Person, as if committed against the Laws of Justice, but against those of Prudence and Fore-sight; and that therefore he shall not be reckon'd to have acted wickedly, but only rashly or unadvisedly. It will not be amiss to examine more closely what the above-mentioned Author lays down in the same place. First, therefore, he establishes this as a Maxim, Whatever is Evil in its own Nature, so that it can never be chang'd into Good, yet may by Accident follow upon the Exercise, or upon the Defence of my Right, without my incurring the Guilt of Sin; and therefore I am not oblig'd to decline the Use of my just Right in such Cases. Grotius likewise⁴ proposes a Rule much to the same Purpose, in his Third Book⁵, but judiciously tempers it with⁶ a good Restriction. But our Author proceeds: A Sin is said to follow by Accident upon another free Act, when upon the Use of a Thing, to which I have a Right, some Effect follows, which I have otherwise no Right to produce. For an Instance in this Case may be alledg'd what Divines call Scandal or Offence taken; concerning which they tell us, That a Man ought not to omit an honest, a pious, or a due Act, though a wicked Person should take never so much Offence at it; and this Rule they confirm by the Authority of our Saviour. But now this very Example might have taught our Author to lay aside his Term of Causa per Accidens; since even in that restrain'd Sense it would be little less than Impiety to call him the Cause of Evil, who is the Spring and Fountain of all Good. We ought rather to say, That a Man who exerts a good and necessary Action, is by no means the Cause of Sin in another Man, who shall thence take Occasion of offending. Thus we commonly say, He who uses his own Right, does no body any Wrong. But he further adds, *Since every Man has a Right of preserving his Health, it is lawful, for the Recovery of Health, to make use of a medicinal Potion, tho' upon the taking of this Potion should follow Distraction (for some little time) or Drunkenness, or (voluntary) Pollution, or Abortion*⁶ (in case both the Mother and the Fetus must otherwise infallibly perish) and that therefore the Person who takes the Medicine is only the Cause of such Effects by

MR. BARB. NOTES.

² He must (as our Author speaks in his Elements of the Universal Civil Law, p. 3, 4.) either do, or neglect to do something that he was obliged to, otherwise another Man's Action has so necessary a Connexion with what he himself does or neglects, that it cannot otherwise happen. Further, we must consider how far he, that gave the Occasion, might know the Effect that would follow upon it, and that it is not necessary that he should certainly know it, 'tis sufficient that there was some Probability. I will explain this by an Example: If I leave a Pistol charged, or some other dangerous Weapon, upon a Table, in a Room where every body has Liberty to come, I am not sure that a Child, or any other Person will come, who, not knowing the Danger of the Weapon, will run the Hazard of killing or hurting himself, by meddling with it out of Curiosity; nevertheless, because the Thing is possible, I might fear such a Thing might happen, and I am certainly to answer for it. The same may be said concerning the Good of which we have given Occasion. As it can't be attributed to us, if we were the Cause of it without our Knowledge, and had no such direct Design, so on the other side, 'tis not necessary that we be sure of the Success of what we undertake for another's Advantage; 'tis sufficient, that we had Reason to believe it; for tho' the Effect was not obtain'd, the Intention is very commendable at all times; as, on the contrary, the Neglect is not altogether excusable, although it luckily had no ill Consequence.

⁴ This Rule (according to Grotius) takes place in the just Defence of a Man's self, which this Author explains in another place. And so it does also when we labour after the Recovery of what belongs to us; for if we can recover the full Value, we have a Right to take it, nevertheless, upon Condition that we return the Over-plus, if any be. So also we may cannonade a Ship full of Pirates, or an House full of Thieves, altho' we know there are some Children, Women, or other innocent Persons in it, who are in Danger of being involved in the Ruin of those that deserve it, Iib. iii. Ch. i. §. 4. Num. i.

⁵ He further adds, in the same place, Num. ii. That those Things that a Man hath an indisputable Right to do, are not to be allowed him to do in all Respects. Love to our Neighbour often hinders us from using that Right, and obliges us likewise to avoid those Things which do, or may happen, contrary to our Intention, at least, if the Advantage we aim at be not greater than the Damage which may justly be feared; or if there be an equal Probability of Benefit and Damage, or the Hope of the Benefit be not better grounded than the Fear of Damage; but this must be left to every Man's Judgment and Prudence. But this ought only to be observed, That where there is a Doubt, we ought to incline to that Side, that is more favourable to another than to ourselves, as the surest Part. See what follows, and Ch. xi. §. 8. of the same Book. See also what has been said above, Ch. iii. §. 7.

⁶ See Book vi. Ch. ii. §. 6. following.

Accident. On which Doctrine we only observe, that it had been much plainer to have said, that those Effects are not to be accounted Sins in the Cases here mention'd. Neither do all the Examples brought by the same Author to illustrate the moral Cause per se, or that which is truly and properly such, rightly hold. For a Criminal, as he speaks, who is to suffer, tho' he go on to the Place of Execution, and ascend the Ladder, cannot merely upon this Account be call'd the moral Cause of his own Death, because if he had refus'd to go willingly, he had been dragg'd along by the publick Officers. And yet there is no Reason why one Man who drinks immoderately, or another who wastes his Strength in honest and necessary Labours, may not be reputed the moral Cause of their own untimely Deaths; tho' the former Person sins, and the latter not; and tho' neither, properly speaking, can be call'd a Murderer. But such a one we should rightly call the moral Cause of his own Death, who is therefore condemn'd, because he would not declare such Matters as might demonstrate his own Innocency.

IV. It must be farther observ'd, that this Imputativeness which we have made the Formale of a moral Action, bears the Nature of a positive Form, from which, as from the Spring and Root, all the Affections, Properties, and Consequences of such an Action result. And therefore a moral Action may be call'd a Positive Being (at least in the Order of Morals, if not always in the Order of Naturals) whether the Matter of it be a physical Motion, or the Privation of a physical Motion. For to constitute a positive Being in Morality, 'tis sufficient that we conceive something in it, from which there arise true Affections of the same Kind; since as a Non Ens can have no Affections, so whatever has certain and positive Affections cannot upon any Account be stil'd a meer Non Ens.

V. Now, that a moral Action should belong, or should be imputed to any Man (in which we have asserted the ratio formalis of it to consist) there can be no other Reason or Cause, but that the Man had Power and Ability to do it, or not to do it; to perform or omit it. And this is so manifest a Truth, that the most ignorant and unskilful Mortals, when they are accus'd of any Omission, or of any Fact, think they cannot bring a fairer Excuse, than to say in the first Case, That they could not do it, and in the other, that they could not help it. So that it is to be establish'd as a prime Maxim in Morals, That a Man is accountable for those Actions, the Performance, or the Forbearance of which were both in his Power: Or (what comes to the same thing) that every Action dirigible by a moral Rule, which a Man is able to do, or not to do, may be imputed to him: And, on the contrary, that whatever neither in itself, nor in its Cause, was in a Man's Power and Disposal, cannot be rightly imputed to him¹. Nor is it any Breach of this Rule, that sometimes a Man is oblig'd to perform a Business depending on Chance, and consequently not in his Power. For this Case can never happen, unless the Man voluntarily takes on himself such an Obligation². Thus much therefore is in the Man's Power, to bind himself to repair a Damage, proceeding from Causes not capable of human Direction. To conclude then, that an Action or Fact should be imputed, it is sufficient that it was not involuntary, according to our Discourse in the preceding Chapter, §. 10. and that it was subject to the Guidance of our Will. But to make an Omission truly imputable, 'tis requisite that there have been both Power and Opportunity for Performance, which Conditions of Power and Opportunity seem to conclude these four Things, First, That the Object be ready at hand. Secondly, That we have a commodious Place, where we may neither be hindred by others, nor suffer any Evil from them upon our acting. Thirdly, That we have a convenient Time, in which we are not call'd to the Discharge of more necessary Duties, and which is equally seasonable for those who are to concur with us in the Action. And, Lastly, That our natural Powers administer sufficient Strength for the Business. When any one of these Conditions is wanting without the Fault of the Man, it would be most absurd and unjust to lay the Omission of any thing to his Charge. Cicero de Invent. Lib. i. Ch. xxvii. Occasion or Opportunity is a Part of Time implying a Convenience of doing a thing, or not doing it. See Cartes of the Passions. Art. 144, 145, 146.

VI. Thus much being premis'd in general, it will be worth our while to consider more distinctly and in particular, what Things may be imputed to a Man, which proceed from a physical Necessity, or from any Cause placed beyond the Direction of Men. And therefore 'tis a simple³ Practice they tell us of the Kings of Mexico, that at the Commencement of their Reign they us'd to promise their Subjects, that they'd take Care the Sun should rise and set at due Times; that Rain should fall as often as there was Occasion; and that the Land should bring forth Fruit. Neither can it be imputed to Man, that natural Causes produce this and no other Effect, or that they produce it in this and no other way; as for Instance, that the Fire warms, and not cools us. Yet thus indeed the Effects of natural Causes furnish large Matter for Imputation, as their active Force is drawn out, or confirm'd by Man, applying Actives to Passives, or exciting their internal Strength by proper Means. On which

NOTES on Chap. V. §. vi.

³ This Author ought to have mention'd the Historian who relates this Fact. Mr. Titius (Observ. 47.) relates a favourable Explication, which a certain Person (viz. Keib's Treatise De Lig. & Lapid. Part. I. Class II. Sect. ii. §. 1.) gives of this Promise. According to him it is the Effect of great Wisdom, and these good Kings would have Men understand no more by it than this: That a Prince by his good Laws, and by the Prudence and Justice of his Government, can in some measure so order the Stars and Elements, that they shall promote the good of his Subjects. Upon this Foot their Assertion, as absurd as it may seem at first Sight, is not altogether without Ground, and proves, that even the American Princes are less barbarous than many European.

Account a Plenty of Fruit is imputed to the Husbandman, inasmuch as his diligent Culture obtain'd it from the Earth: Thus the Damage of Fire is imputed to him that kindled it; and thus the varied Colour of Laban's Lambs may be imputed to the Subtilty of his Shepherd Jacob^a. A natural Effect may be farther imputed to a Man as he has mov'd the supream Cause and Director of all Things to determine^a such an Effect. Thus the Three Years Drought might be imputed to Elias^b. As in fabulous Story a long Drought is said to have ceas'd on the Prayers of Aacus^c. Thus too, the Death of the Men who fell in the Pestilence^d, might in some measure be imputed to David, tho' not to the Degree of a Murther.

VII. Neither may we impute to a Man the Actions and the Effects of vegetative Faculties which appear in his Body, as they arise from his Birth, or from other Causes beyond his Disposál. Yet thus much is in a Man's Power, to supply those Faculties with convenient or with unfuitable Objects, which may either maintain and cherish, or weaken and extinguish their Force; as also to distort and abuse their proper Organs. Thus he to whom Nature has given a large, a sound, and an able Body, is liable to no Imputation of Merit on that Score. But to correct a weak Constitution by Industry and Exercise, and to increase the natural Powers, gives just Occasion for Commendation; and, on the contrary, to break or destroy the same Powers by Idleness and Petulancy, turns to a just Shame and Reproach.

Hence no Man can be fairly reprehended for a weak, or a tender, or a diminutive Body; for distorted, or for maim'd Limbs, or for want of Strength, provided that none of those Infirmities were contracted by this Default. ^a Aristotle talks very pertinently to this purpose, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. vii. Οὐ μόνον δὲ αἰ τῆ ψυχῆς κακίαι, &c. "Not only Faults of the Mind (says he) are Voluntary, but those of the Body too in some Persons, whom we therefore discommend. For we do not blame those that are naturally deformed, but those who are grown so by neglect of Exercise, and by a careless way of Life. And the Case is the same as to any Meanness or Unfightliness arising from Distempers, or from the maiming of any Part of the Body. For Men will not reproach, but rather pity his Blindness who had it from Nature, or from a Distemper, or from an honourable Wound: But he will justly fall under universal Scorn or Censure who has lost his Eyes by Drunkenness, or by any other kind of "Intemperance." Plutarch de Audiend. Poet. speaks to the same Purpose: Ulysses doth not upbraid¹ Therfites with his Lameness, his Baldness, or his Crook-back, but with his Scurvility and Impudence. Thus the wise Poet silently derides those who are ashamed of Lameness, Blindness, or the like Defects; it being his Judgment, that nothing can be Blame-worthy which is not vicious, and nothing vicious the Cause of which is in Fortune, not in our selves. As those who brush or strike Cloaths touch not the Body, so those who censure others for their Imperfections of Birth or of Fortune, vainly and foolishly strike the outward Parts, but never reach the Soul, nor those Blemishes which really deserve Reprehension and Correction. Ibid. Add. Sympos. Lib. ii. Qu. i. Yet it was not without Reason, that among the ancient Gauls, as Strabo relates, Lib. iv. The young Men were fin'd for exceeding the Measure of their Girdle: Because they took it for granted, that such a large Paunch, at such early Years, could proceed from nothing else but Laziness and Gormandizing. So says Nichol. Damascen. de Mor. Gent. The Iberians use a Girdle of a certain Measure, and whoever suffers himself to grow beyond those Bounds, is look'd upon as highly infamous.

The same may be said of the other Faculties which Nature, and not our own free Pleasure, has implanted in us; as that a Man has sharp or heavy Parts, quick or dull Senses, a firm or a deceitful Memory; unless these natural Abilites have been improv'd or impair'd by the Man himself. Hither must be referr'd that Observation of Aristotle in his Ethicks^c, Many Things according to our Nature we do and suffer, which we are truly conscious of, and yet which cannot be call'd Voluntary or Involuntary: as to grow old, and to die. These Things therefore are not proper Matter of Imputation. Neither can the getting of wicked Children be imputed to Parents, provided they have not encourag'd them in their Vices by ill Education. Whence the witty Turn of Vindex will not hold in strict Truth, when he said, That Nero's Mother was justly put to Death by her Son, for bringing such a Monster into the World^e 2.

VIII. It's evident likewise, That those Things cannot be imputed, which exceed our Strength, either as to the Hindrance or the Performance of them: Provided that this Inability has not been of our own sinful¹ Procurement. On which Foundation are built those common Maxims, That Impossibilities are incapable of Obligation²; That no Man can be conceiv'd to have enjoin'd impossible Duties in a Law; and that therefore if any such³ Thing occur in a Statute, or a Covenant, or a Will, it is either to be esteem'd as null, or else a more commodious Interpretation of it is to be found out ^a. To this Purpose we meet with a pleasing Passage in Herodotus ^b; he tells us, that when Themistocles desir'd a Supply of Money from the Inhabitants of Andros, supported by the two strong Goddesses Persuasion and Necessity, the Andrians oppos'd him with two stronger Goddesses, Poverty and Impossibility. But here it must be carefully observ'd, that it is one Thing to be physically, and another Thing to be morally impossible. The former Impossibility lays an Obstacle, which binds up the Will in such a Manner, that either it cannot break out into Action, or else that it shall lose all its Labours and Endeavours. But a moral Impossibility lays no Impediment surpassing the active Power which inheres in the Will, but on the contrary arises wholly from the Will itself. And in this Manner, we say, 'tis impossible that all Men should conspire together in delivering down a Lie to Posterity, without any Prospect of Advantage: Or that any Man should lead a Life of such exact Holiness and Circumspection ^c, as not to offend (at least through the Precipitancy of his Passions) in some smaller Instance of Duty. Hence the Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justi & Decori ^e infers, That a Legislator cannot indeed enjoin what is physically impossible, but he may exact Obedience to Things which include a moral Impossibility. Because in this he commands nothing contrary to the Liberty of the Will, since all the Difficulty of obeying arises from the Will itself. Thus 'tis not impossible for any Man to frame a Lie gratis; and if not for any Man, then not for the whole Multitude; and yet 'tis certain that the whole Multitude will not do so. In the same Manner every Man has the Power of speaking Truth, and consequently a whole Society or Community; and yet 'tis most certain, that a Commonwealth will never be so happy, as to have all its Members abstain from false Speeches: yet this Impossibility does not take away the Liberty of particular Men, or excuse them from sinning. Thus too we say,

¹ In this last Case we may lawfully be treated in the same Manner as if we were in a State of acting. Otherwise, as soon as any Obligation we are under becomes in the least punishable, or incommodious, we shall find a Way to avoid it, by putting ourselves on purpose into a Condition unable to fulfil it.
² Impossibile nulla obligatio est. Digest. Lib. l. ut. 17. ³ See Lib. iii. Ch. vii. §. 2, &c. following.

NOTES on §. 9.

¹ Our Author here speaks of the Extremity that one is reduced to by the immediate Violence of a Person, who will force us to suffer, or do some thing. But he ought also to have set down what a Man is constrained to do by other Circumstances, which are not less pressing, and no less exclude all Imputation. In a word, we ought to reduce to this Head all the Effects of Necessity in general, of which we shall elsewhere see the Benefit, Lib. ii. Chap. vi. where the Passages in the Margin may refer to the Cases of Necessity, which are omitted.

² Which he may suffer in that very Instant, as this Author adds, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Chap. i. §. 24.

Execution of some Enormity to which he is otherwise exceedingly averse; yet so that he shall not be the Author of the Deed, but the other Person who compell'd him to it. Examples of the former kind are, when a Man by Superiority of Strength violently thrusts another upon a third Person, or strikes him with a forcible Bend of the other Man's Hand: Or when any one commits a violent Rape upon a Woman that did not provoke his Lewdness by her own Fault. Her Body indeed, in this Case suffers Dishonour, but the Blemish doth not reach her Soul. The Body is stain'd, but the Mind is pure, says Lucretia in Livy, Lib. i. Ch. 58. See Hen. Stephens's elegant Discourse on that Story in his Apolog. for Herodot. Ch. xv. But a Nymph will not have the Benefit of this Interpretation, when with a faint Resistance she lets her Ring be stolen off from her digitus male pertinax, as Horace calls it. An Instance of the latter Compulsion may be when a Sergeant, or a Guardsman is commanded to kill a Man whom he knows innocent, under Pain of being immediately kill'd himself upon Refusal: For he can by no Means lie under an Imputation in this Case, since nothing is enjoin'd him but the bare Execution, which in itself is agreeable enough to his Person and Character, and ought not to be refus'd upon the Hazard of losing his Life: Especially since tho' he threw away himself, he could not by that Means save the other innocent Party. Yet it must be confess'd, that the bare Execution of some Acts is so very foul and detestable, that it is a generous Bravery for a Man rather to die, than to apply his Body to such Operations, tho' if committed, the Fault of them would not light on himself, but on others. To which Case the Passage of Aristotle relates, above-cited: An Instance of it may be, Suppose a Man should be commanded to commit a Rape on his own Mother, which Fact, in Oedipus, tho' committed out of invincible Ignorance, yet tormented him so, as to make him tear out his own Eyes. But when Aristotle, Ethic. Nicom. Lib. iii. Ch. i. alleges for an Instance of a forced Action, the doing a base Thing, upon the Command of a Tyrant who has our Parents or Children in his Hands, and will save or kill them, according to our Obedience or Disobedience; what he then calls αισχρον τι, or a base Thing, must be understood in a limited Sense, so as not to reach those more odious Villanies we are now speaking of.

X. Ignorance likewise takes off all Imputation, so far as it renders the Action involuntary. This Point may be illustrated from several Passages of Aristotle's Morals; Magu. Moral. Li. i. Ch. xxxiv. Ὅταν μὲν γὰρ ἡ ἀγνοία αἰτία ἢ τῷ προῆξαι τι, ἢ ἐκὼν τῷ ἀσφίττει, &c. "Whensoever (says he) Ignorance has been the Occasion of doing a Thing, that Thing is not done willingly, and consequently cannot be injurious. But when a Man is himself the Cause of his own Ignorance, and out of that Ignorance commits a Deed, he plainly offers an Injury, and may in Justice be accountable for the Crime. This is the Case of drunken Men, who if they commit any Disorder under that Condition, without Dispute do a real Injury, since they themselves have been the Causes of their Ignorance. For 'twas in their Power, whether or no they would tittle themselves so far out of their Senses, as to make them (for Example) beat their own Father. The same Rule will hold in all other Instances of Ignorance, the Cause of which is in the Agent; so that he who injures another upon the Strength of those Pleas, is nevertheless properly unjust. But those Persons cannot by any Means be called unjust, who offend out of Ignorance, not of their own procuring. For such Ignorance is to be

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

* Our Author then believes, that this last sort of Compulsion, as well as the first, excludes all Sorts of Imputation. He explains himself better upon this Head, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 24. where he maintains, That we can have no more Ground to impute the Actions committed in the like Circumstances, than to the Spear, or Ax, that is used to kill an Enemy with; At least, says he, whoever is reduced to that Necessity, is not under any Obligation to sacrifice himself for the Person to whom he sees himself constrain'd, upon Peril of Life, to do some great Mischief. I own that this Sort of Compulsion much lessens a Sin, but yet it doth not seem to me (as Mr. Turtius remarks, Observ. xl. and xlviii.) to free it from all Imputation at the Judgment-Seat of God. For indeed the Instance of the Spear and Ax is not well apply'd, for they are Instruments purely passive; whereas a Person forced by the Threatnings of some great Evil, without any physical and irresistible Violence, acts with a kind of Will, and consents in some Manner to the Action, visibly evil, which he performs. So that tho' before a civil Judicature he ought not rigorously to be punished for the like Action, he can't attempt it without Hurt to his own Conscience. Here also we may apply those Principles which we shall lay down, Lib. ii. Ch. vi. §. 2, 3. following, for in the Example which our Author there alleges, of an Officer, who was commanded, under Pain of being put to Death himself, to put a Person to Death, for a Crime of which he knew him innocent, the Evil he does to such an one, is as great as if he would warrant it himself, otherwise this Execution were an uncertain Means, because it depends entirely on him who laid the Obligation on him. And who is there that can assure himself, that the Person who forces a Man to do such Things, shall have a greater Respect for him that executes his Orders, than for him against whom he has used this Force? This last Reason has yet a great Strength, as any one may see, when a Son is forced to lie with his Mother: An Action which our Author seems to take some Pains to excuse, when he is treating of the Case of Compulsion. See what is said upon Lib. ii. Ch. vi. §. 2. and upon Lib. viii. Ch. i. §. 6. Note 4. and Mr. Thomasius's Divine Civil Law, Lib. ii. Ch. ii. §. 149. and 161, &c. as also Wherner's Elements of the Law of Nature and Nations, Ch. ii. §. 9, 10.

* The Author refers to these Words of Horace, Lib. i. Od. ix. Pignusque direptum Latertis, aut Digito male pertinaci. See also to the same Purpose, Lib. ii. Od. xii.

----- Aut facili Sævitia negat, Quæ poscente magis gaudeat eripi.

* Mr. Pufendorf unwarily followeth a bad Latin Translator, who has rendered these Words ill, though plain enough in themselves. They that do it, shall escape, and they that will not do it, shall perish, as if the Greek had been, περὶ γὰρ τῶν, &c. whereas it is, πράξαντες, He that does it. The English Translator has amended this Fault.

* But why must this Case be excepted, if our Author's Principles be found? Or what Rule doth he give us to distinguish these sorts of Things, where Force excludes not Imputation? The Truth is, we must either excuse every Act of Compulsion, how infamous soever it be in itself, or account every Thing vicious, which we cannot do innocently of ourselves, and in our own Name, let the Threatnings of him that would constrain us, be never so terrible. See Note 3. of this Paragraph. The Change of our Author, and the small Connexion there is between his Notions in this Matter, shew that he had not considered it with sufficient Attention.

“esteem’d Natural; as when little Children strike their Parents, their natural Ignorance, which is the Cause of the Fact, hinders it from being still’d Unjust; the Ignorance not at all depending on their own Power”. So also Seneca Phœnif. vel Thebaid. ver. 249.

Sed nunquid & peccavit?*

————— An Infant with untimely Fate,
Dies in the Womb before the Gift of Light;
And has it therefore sinn’d?

But this must be extended no farther than human Consideration.

But in reference to Infants, it is farther observable, that we chide and beat them for some Actions, not because in human Judgment they be strictly Crimes, but meerly for the sake of Amendment, that they may not prove troublesome to others by such Tricks, or may not get an ill Habit when they are little, and so keep it when they are grown up. And the same must be said of delirious Persons, provided their Disease was not occasioned by their own Fault. For the Blows given to one in this Condition, have no more the proper Nature of a Punishment answering to a Fault, than those we give to a kicking Horse, to break him of that Custom. Vid. Anth. Matthæ. de Crimin. Proleg. Ch. ii. §. 5, 6, 7, 8.

But he who is the Cause of his own Ignorance, and who has wittingly and willingly hindred himself from the Knowledge of those things, which he might, and should have known, is in the same Case as if he had offended upon Knowledge and Deliberation. Aristot. Magn. Moral. Lib. i. Ch. ix. We then blame diseas’d, or deform’d Persons, when we judge them to have been the Authors of their own Distemper or Disfigurement; because it was in their Power to have kept sound and perfect.

And more fully, Ethic. Lib. iii. Ch. vii. Legislators correct and punish those who commit Evil, provided they did it neither upon Violence and Compulsion: nor out of such Ignorance as they did not themselves occasion. For otherwise, Ignorance it self is punishable, when contracted by the Person’s own Fault. Hence there is a double Punishment ordain’d against Drunkards, because the Spring of that Vice is in a Man’s self, he having the Power of avoiding it; and therefore what he doth through Ignorance in that Condition, is nevertheless to be charged upon him. In like manner they punish those who plead Ignorance of the Laws,

^a These are properly the ἀμαρτηλώα of Aristotle.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. X.

⁵ Apud quosdam lex erat, ne quis Diana vitulum immolaret. Nauta quidam, cum adversâ tempestate in alto jactarentur, voverunt, si portu---potius essent, se vitulum immolatuuros. Casu erat in eo portu sanum Dianæ, &c.

⁶ The Roman Law is this, That when one gives a Potion to cause a Miscarriage, or to cause Love, although the Party who gives it has no Design to do Evil, nevertheless by reason of its Consequences, he should be condemned, besides some Part of his Goods Confiscated, either to the Quarries, if he were of a mean Condition, or to Banishment into some Isle, if he were of a good Family. But if the Man or Woman, who had taken the Potion, died of it, he was condemned to Death without Mercy, Digest. Lib. xlviii. Tit. xix. de Pœnis Leg. xxxviii. §. 5. In fine, that we may have a just Idea of invincible Ignorance, as to Imputation, let that be remembered which we have observed Chap. iii. §. 10. Note 2. For Ignorance purely concomitant, in the Manner we have explained it, be it vincible, or invincible, doth not hinder Imputation, and to know whether it be invincible or no, we must judge according to common Estimation, Titius Observ. xlv. See Chap. vii. §. 16. following.

when the Points were easy, and such as ought to have been known. The Case is the same with all that are ignorant by their own Neglect, they being Masters of their own Powers, and capable of Diligence and Application. Ignorance of Universals, and that which we were oblig’d to know, does not take off Imputation; but only Ignorance of Particulars, and of what concerns the present Fact. Aristot. Ethic. Lib. iii. Ch. ii. He that is ignorant of his Duty or Interest, ought not to be said to act against his Will; for Ignorance upon Choice doth not produce an involuntary, but a wicked Action. An Ignorance of Universals renders Men liable to Reprehension; but an Ignorance of Particulars, or of the Circumstances of the Action, deserves Pity and Pardon, in as much as the Person thus offending doth truly proceed involuntarily. An Example of this Ignorance is thus given by Tully, de Invent. Lib. ii. Ch. xxxi. ^a There was a Law in some certain Place, forbidding to sacrifice a Calf to Diana; now a Company of Mariners being in Distress at Sea, made a Vow that if they gain’d the Port which was now in sight, they’d offer a Calf to the Deity who presided there. It happen’d that in that very Port there stood a Temple of Diana, to whom no Calf was to be offer’d by the Laws; but the Mariners not being acquainted with these Laws, offer’d the Calf which they promis’d: and upon this Fact they are accus’d^a.

If an Action be done without any malicious Design, and not with Ignorance voluntarily contracted, but such only as crept in by Inconsideration and Inadvertency^a, the Imputation is not altogether taken away, yet it is considerably diminished. And thus far only may we allow the Saying of Quintilian, Inst. Lib. i. Ch. vi. Even an Error is commendable in those who follow great and noble Guides. Vide Aristot. Ethic. Lib. v. Ch. x. Hither we may refer the Case propos’d by Aristotle^b, of a Woman that gave a Love-potion to her Gallant, of which he died. Now the Athenian Judges absolved the Woman from this Indictment, because she did the Fact undesignedly, and only mis’d the Effect of her Potion, and procur’d his Death instead of his Love, which was her only Aim. But to make this Sentence equitable, it must have been suppos’d as a Principle, that the Woman never so much as thought the Potion she administred was any way hurtful. For otherwise it were more rational to proceed according to^c the Law of the Roman Lawyers. Add. Anth. Matth. de Crimin. ad l. 48. D. tit. 5. Ch. v. §. 6.

XI. Farther, Since the Images form’d by the Fancy in Sleep are not in our Power, nothing can be imputed to us which we seem to do in a Dream, only as far as by thinking on such things * in the Day-time with Delight, we have fix'd the Ideas deeply in our Minds^a. Hence the Man whom Tacitus^b speaks of, and reports to have seen the Emperor Claudius in his Sleep, cover'd with a Crown made of Ears of Corn, was not guilty of any Crime. And the Fisherman in Theocritus^c entertain'd a very vain Scruple, when he appear'd concern'd for an Oath he had made in his Sleep, never to venture out again to Sea^d. Neither was Julius Cesar guilty of Incest, upon account of his strange Dream, recorded by Sueton.^e Yet Byblis was not altogether innocent, when, as Ovid tells the Story, Met. ix. 469.

XII. Lastly, It is against Reason, that the Imputation of any future Crime should be as it were antedated, or that it should affect us backwards: unless, perhaps, the future Crime should depend on some * past or present Act of ours, as a necessary Effect does on its Cause: For it is a common thing to impute the Effect to him to whom the Cause properly belong'd. Indeed it is not at all absurd, that by Imputation of Favour a future Deed shall procure some good Thing to the Agent, or to some Body else, long before it is perform'd. For since any Man may (if he pleases) do a Kindness gratis, it is certainly in the Power of a Benefactor, who knows what will afterward happen, to confer a present Favour under some Term and Condition hereupon to be fulfilled. But since ill Actions cannot be imputed, but by way of Debt or Guilt, it would be the highest Absurdity, to reckon so far backwards, as to lay Imputation on Persons who neither had any Knowledge of Futurity, nor any Obligation or Power to hinder the Thing from being done; nor, lastly, any Communication of Action with the Author of the Fact^s.

XIII. Beyond these Exceptions no Human Action ought to be reckon'd involuntary or incapable of Imputation, tho' to undertake it be never so contrary to right Reason, or tho' any Disorder of Mind violently hurry us into the Commission. Indeed Plato^h lays it down for a Rule, That "in those Injuries which 'tis impossible to repair, no Man is voluntarily injurious, because no Man is willing to admit the greatest of Evils into any of his Concerns, and much less into those Things which are most dear to him, and most excellent in themselves; such as is his Soulⁱ." To the same Purpose Aristippus says in Diogenes Laertius, "That all Mistakes (by which he means all smaller Offences) "deserve Pardon, because no Person is mistaken willingly, but as he is compell'd by ² Some of these Quotations of our Author are not much to the Purpose. He puts the Third Book of Claudian de Raptu Proserp. for the Second, and one Work for another; for his Quotation is taken out of his Preface to his Poem in VI. Consul. Honori. Omnia que sensu voluntur vota diurno, Pectore sopito reddit amica quies. See Lucretius Lib. iv. ver. 959, &c. and Cicero's Somn. Scip. Ch. i. Here he ought to have spoken of the Actions of such as walk in their Sleep, who have beaten, wounded, and killed others, while they were in that State. The Canon Law in the Clementines propounds such a Supposition, and determines, that their Actions are involuntary, and consequently not punishable. Si furiosus, aut infans, seu dormiens hominem mutilet, vel occidat, nullam ex hoc irregularitatem incurrit, Leg. de Homicid. vol. & cas. Lib. v. Tit. 4. But Mr. Hertius adds, with Reason (in his Treatise De Param. Jur. Germanic. Lib. iii. Param. 1. §. 4.) That if a Person that walks in his Sleep, being advertised of what he does in his Sleep, does not secure his Arms, and take other necessary Precautions to hinder him from doing any Mischief whatsoever, he is not excusable. See Tiraque. de Pan. temper. Caus. 5. Mr. Thomassius has published a Treatise of the Laws about Sleep and Dreams, which is the XI. of his Disputations held at Leipzig, and are collected into one Volume, Printed 1695.

NOTES on §. XII.

¹ 'Tis in the Original, Present or Future, which is a plain Mistake, and ought to be corrected thus, Present or Past, for that a future Crime be imputed by way of Retrospection, upon the account of some Action, which it is necessarily consequent upon, that Action must necessarily be produced. This is so true, that the Author himself, in his Elements of Universal Civil Law, P. 368, from whence these Words are copied, expresses himself exactly so. Neither the English Translator nor Mr. Hertius were aware of this Mistake, which quite spoils the Sense.

² Remotum est, quod ultra quam satis est, petitur, hoc modo: Quod si non P. Scipio Corneliam filiam Tiberio Graccho collocasset, atque ex ea duos Gracchos procreasset, tantæ seditiones nate non essent: quare hoc incommodum Scipioni ascribendum videtur. Cicero de Invent. Lib. i. Ch. xlix. See also the Thought of Vindex above, §. 7.

“ some Perturbation of Mind.” And the Emperor Antoninus frequently advanceth the like Doctrine^a. But Aristotle hath in many Places refuted this Opinion. As when^b he recites the following Argument of Socrates^c, design’d to prove, that it was not in our Power whether we would be good or bad: “ Because, supposing we should ask any one, whether he had rather be just or unjust, no Man would choose Injustice; whence it should appear, that if some Men are wicked, they are not wicked of their own Accord, and consequently none are of their own Accord good.” In Confutation of which Aristotle hath us’d these Reasons; “ That it would be absurd for a² Lawgiver to enjoin good Actions, and to forbid and to punish Evil, unless both were ἐφ’ ἡμῖν, in our Power: And that otherwise there would be no manner of Cause why Virtue should meet with Praise, or Vice with Disgrace and Reproach. In another Work^c he handles the Point more at large, and with good Reason³ rejects that common Argument of the Stoicks, All desire and follow what appears good to them; but now no Man is Master of his own Fancy, but the Ends he pursues appear to him just, according as he is inclin’d and dispos’d. For in spite of this Objection, the Understanding of what is just, and what unjust, must be acknowledg’d both to be in the Power of Man, and to be attainable without much Difficulty or Labour^d. In the same Place Aristotle well observes, that as Ignorance contracted by our own Fault doth not render an Action involuntary, so neither can an ill Habit, or a Mind corrupted by Frequency of sinning⁴. “ If (says he) a Man, not out of Ignorance, does Things which may denominate him unjust, he is voluntarily, unjust; but he cannot, at his Will and Pleasure, turn from unjust to just again (but this we are to understand⁵, either in a compound Sense, i. e. that he cannot be just and unjust at the same Time; or else in this Meaning, that the bare Will cannot presently abolish a confirm’d Dis temper of the Mind; tho’ by long and earnest Endeavour it may be overcome) “ no more than a sick Man can be found again when he pleath, tho’ his Sickness, perhaps, was voluntary, occasion’d either by his intemperate Way of Life, or by his Disobedience to the Orders of his Physician: Such a Person at first had it indeed in his Power not to be sick; but when he hath once neglected his Health, it is not in his Power to restore it: In the same Manner, as one, who hath thrown a Stone out of his Hand, cannot recover it again, though at first he had the Power of throwing or not throwing it. Thus the unjust and the intemperate, at first might have been otherwise, and therefore were voluntarily such, but being once under those Conditions, they are not at Liberty to be without them; that is, before they have reform’d and corrected themselves⁶”.

It may not be amiss to cast an Eye upon what the

MR. BARB. NOTES ON §. XIII.

¹ Σαυκράτης ἴφθ, ἐκ ἐφ’ ἡμῖν γινώσκῃ τὸ σπαρδαίως εἶναι ἢ φαύλως· εἰ γὰρ τις, φησὶν, ἐραστήσῃ ὅτινα ἐν, πίπτειν ἀν βέλονται δίκαιον εἶναι, ἢ ἀδίκον, εἰς ἐν λέγοντο τὴν ἀδικίαν ——— ὄντων ὡς εἰ φαύλοι· τινὲς εἰσιν, ἐκ ἐν ἑαυτοὶς εἴσαν φαύλοι ὡς ἐν δόλο· ὅτι ἐδὲ σπαρδαίως, Magn. Moral. Lib. i. Ch. ix. We may observe, that there is something of Truth in this Notion, viz. That ordinarily Men do not sin for nothing, nor do any ill Thing purely and simply for Evil-doing. ’Tis a common Maxim us’d by Salust, Men are wicked for Rewards, take away them, and scarce any Man will do Evil. Orat. 2. de Re- pub. Ordinan. See Lib. iii. Ch. i. §. 1. Note 5. following, and Lib. viii. Ch. iii. §. xix. Note 1, 2. The Use of this Principle is to make us merciful to our Neighbours Faults, a Consequence which the Emperor Antoninus draws from most of the foregoing Places; but when we deal with our selves, as we never are severe to our own Faults, let us turn the Balance, and always say, as Max. Tyrius, though a Platonist, expresses himself pithily and in a few Words. Εκείνου η̄ μαχθηρία ——— μισήται τὰ ἐκείνου Dissert. xli. p. 426. Edit. Davis.

⁶ Now that a Man may hinder himself from yielding to a Passion, and may reform an ill Habit at length, if he pleases to take the Pains, appears not only from the secret Checks which he finds in himself when he sins, and the inward Sense he has of the Freedom of Will by which he acts, but also by Experience. It oftens happens, that in the very Moment when a Man offends, the Presence of some considerable Person, or of a Magistrate, who has Power to punish the Action, is of Force to prevent the Commission; and there are some Men who can curb themselves in, when their Passions are strongest. Sometimes also a small Thing is able to make us resist a Temptation. Suppose, for Example, a Drunkard by Profession, being in perfect Health, and free from all Cares, comes thursty into a Tavern, where he finds his Companions with Glafs in Hand, who doubts, but that upon a Wager, he could, he could, and would resist all Allurements of the Objects which might tempt him, and the most earnest Entreaties of his Comrades? Since then the Hopes of a small Gain, or a little Vainglory, is able to oblige him to abstain from a Thing he loves so well, why may he not be able, by little and little, wholly to abstain from it, being moved with better Arguments, and a Principle of Virtue? It is certain, at least, that if a Prince resolves to make severe Laws against Drunkenness, and sees them well executed, he’ll soon put a Stop to that Vice. ’Twas by this Means that the Madness of Duelling, not long since so very common in France, Brandenburg, Saxony, &c. is almost quite laid aside, because of the severe Prohibitions of that pernicious Custom; and we should see fewer Examples of it, if the Laws against it were not eluded, by making a Duel pass for a single Encounter.

the Author of the Treatise De Principiis Justi & Decori, p. 165, &c. hath advanced on the Subject of moral Habits. "Those moral Habits which we commonly call Evil, are not (says he) really Sins, nor worthy of Punishment, if consider'd in themselves; because they do not touch the Effect with any moral Causality, so long as they continue Habits, but only as they break out into Acts. And if they prove a Hindrance to Virtue, this is done by an elicit Act of Mens Will, which Will is then the Cause of the moral Vice. But to establish a moral Cause superior to the Will, is to take away the Nature of that Faculty, it is to turn one elicit into an enjoin'd Act, and to attribute to Habits an actual Efficacy of operating without any Operation. For we operate only by the Will, and nothing truly moral can work before the elicit Act of that Power, from which alone proceeds the Morality of any Performance. For an ill Habit before the Act of the Will, is only a physical Thing, or a Mode of the Soul; but when the Soul works sinfully by the Will, then the Habit ceaseth, and is superseded. The Efficacy by which ill Habits dispose the Mind to ill Actions, is different from that (for Instance) by which lewd Discourse instils Wantonness into the Minds of the Hearers: Because that Discourse may be properly said to work antecedently to the Will of him to whom it is applied, though the Effect doth not always follow." Which abstruse Doctrine may fitly enough be explained by this Similitude: Splayness of Foot in itself, and as long as the Foot rests, is not a Fault against the Rules of Dancing, but when the Spark makes an ill Step; the moral Cause of that Miscarriage is not the turning out of the Toes too far, consider'd in itself, but the Will of him that hath so awkwardly mov'd them.

The same Author adds, That "the Reason why we hate ill Habits, is partly because the Persons got them by ill Actions, and partly because they are more prone to ill Actions on the Account of them:" And that tho' they are Diseases of the Mind, yet they do not deserve Punishment in themselves, but because they were voluntarily contracted. As if we should say, when we beat an unlucky Boy that puts out his Ankle by a wanton and negligent Leap, the Reason why we beat him, is not the putting out his Ankle (in itself) but the idle Leap that caus'd it.

XIV. A Man is not only liable to have his own Actions imputed to him, but likewise the Actions of other Men. Yet this cannot rightly be, unless he has some way or other efficaciously concurr'd in their Production. For otherwise Reason will never suffer that the Effect of a moral Action should be transferr'd from one to another, unless this other Person had some Influence on the Action, by some Performance, or some Omission of his own. Arrian. Epict. Lib. i. Ch. xxviii. 'No Man suffers for the Fact of another. Marc. Antonin. Lib. viii. §. 53. Unto my Free-will my Neighbour's Free-will (as his Life, or his Body) is altogether indifferent. For although we are all made one for another, yet have our Minds and Understandings each of them their own proper and limited Jurisdiction. Else another Man's Wickedness might be my Evil; which GOD would not have, that it might not be in another Man's Power to make me unhappy. Thus when a Sound arrives at our Ears against our Consent, the bare Hearing can be no Crime, if we proceed no further; unless, as Lucian De Imagin. speaks, You fancy any Crime in the bare Act of Hearing. Though sometimes indeed a quiet and silent Hearing is construed as a Token of Consent. And 'twas on this Account that the brave Germanicus, when on the News of Augustus's Death, his seditious Soldiers offer'd him the Empire, started immediately in Confusion from his Seat of Command, as if he had been already tainted with Rebellion, Tacit. Annal. Lib. i. Ch. xxxv. So also Themist. Orat. xix. Heretofore, in Crimes of this sort, no Distinction was made between Misfortune and Guilt: it being judg'd as heinous to bear a villainous Proposal, though against one's Will, as to contrive the Plot, or to attempt the Execution. But this was indeed to censure and reproach Nature for framing our Ears flat and open, and for not putting it in our Power to close and contract them, as we do our Eyes or our Mouth: since these alone, of all our Instruments of Sense, are plac'd beyond our Will and Command, lying ready to receive of Necessity every Thing that flows in, like a House without Gates or Doors. But you at length, have restor'd our Faculty of Hearing to its just Character of Innocence.

Sometimes, then, it happens that an Action is not imputed to the immediate Performer of it, but to him who commanded it to be done. As when a Superior, under the Penalty of the severest Evils, and such as he is really able to inflict, enjoins a Subject the bare Execution of some Deed. Thus,

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

See Chap. iv. §. 7. Note 2. foregoing, and Mr. Clerc's Ontology, Chap. xiii. §. 4. In a word, we may say, with an antient Greek Poet, That it is, in truth, hard to reform an ill Habit, that is become almost natural, but not impossible, since we have seen several Persons reform their Manners by good Advice given them by others, as his Words shew, Τὸ ἦδ' ἀποστῆναι χαλεπὸν Φύσει ἢ ἐξήλ' τις αἰεί. Καὶ τοὶ πολλοὶ ταῦτ' ἔπαυον.	Ἐνώπιος γνάμμαις ἐτέρων Μεταβάλλοιο τὰς τρίπυς. Aristoph. Vesp. ver. 1446.

7 Very well, but they are answerable for their evil Dispositions, because they have brought them on themselves; by their own Fault. In short, all these Reasonings contain nothing in them but the idle Speculations of subtil Philosophy.

 2 Lucian's Greek is this, Ἐκτός εἰ μὴ τινα νομίζεις ἀπρόαυτεῖ ἐνθυμῶν εἶναι. Apolog. in fine.
 3 Themistius's Words (Orat. xix. De humanitate Theodosii, p. 230. Ed. Par. Hard.) are, Καὶ πάσαι μ' εἰ δεικνύμετο ἐν τῷ τοιαῦτο ἐγκληματι ἀδίκημα δυσυχμαῖο, ἀλλ' ἐν ἰσῶ καθίσκη τὸ βασιλεύσαι τι τῶν ἀθέσμων, καὶ τὸ πειθεῖσθαι μὴ προελαμένον καὶ τοὶ φ' φύσιος ἐγκλημα ἢν τῆτο, ἐ τῆ ἀθεῶτα. ὅτι τὴν ἀκον ἐποίησεν ἀναπειλαμένῳ, καὶ εἶχε ὡσπερ τὰ βλεφαρα καὶ τὸ στόμα ἐφ' ἡμῶν κλείει καὶ ἀνοίγει, ἔτσι καὶ τὰ ὦτα. ἀλλ' αὐτῆ μόνῃ χειρὶ ἢ αἰδέσις σιπέφυγε τὴν ἐφ' ἡμῶν ἐξουσία, καὶ δεικνύει ἀνάγκη πᾶν τὸ πεισπαίειν αὐτῆ, ὡσπερ ἄνημα ἄβυρον καὶ ἀνεργμῶν. Σὺ δὲ τὴν μὲ ἀκον ἐξῆλες παντάσῃ τῶ ἐγκλημάτων.

as ^a Procopius Hist. Goth. Lib. i. well observes, “ An Ambassador, at the Command of him whom he represents, speaks such and such Words; in which if there appear any Fault or Offence, it ought not to be charged on him, but on his Master, whose Orders and Instructions he is under a Necessity of obeying.” When the Roman Senate declar’d the League with the Samnites to be base and inglorious, and voted the delivering up the General, the Author of it, to the Enemy; it was a very senseless Proposal mov’d by one of the grave Fathers, that the same Punishment should be inflicted on the Person who held the Swine during the Ceremony of making the Agreement ^{a b}. When Mithridates put to Death Attilius and other Conspirators against his Life, he pardon’d Attilius’s Freed-men, who were of the Company, ὡς δεσπότῃ διακονισαμένους ^c, as Persons that only obey’d thier lawful Master.

But it’s more usual that the Action shall be imputed both to the Performer and to the Commander of it. And this is chiefly done in these three Ways: Either, that the Commander shall be the principal Cause of the Action, and the Performer, the inferior and accessory Cause, or that both shall be deem’d equally guilty, or that the Commander shall be the inferior Cause, and the Performer the Principal. And in all Cases the Concurrence to another Man’s Action is made either positively or privately, by some Commission or Omission.

First then, he is esteem’d the principal Cause of an Action committed immediately by another Man, who commands something to be done by one under his Power and Sway, or who by his bare ^d Authority, not easily to be resisted, moves a Man to the Performance of some Deed, which he could not have enjoin’d by Command or Power, properly so call’d. And this last was the Case of Piso in ^e Tacitus, whom Tiberius himself excus’d from having any Guilt in the Civil War, since as he was a Son he could not decline his Father’s Orders ^d. But now his Father, by his paternal Right and Power, could not have oblig’d him to engage in such a Crime, and therefore he was mov’d only by his Authority.

Secondly, He who gives a Consent necessary requisite to the Performance, and without which the Agent had not proceeded. Comp. Valer. Max. Lib. ii. §. 8. §. 2. ^f Liban. Progymn. He is to suffer for the Fault, without whose Leave it had not been committed. Id. ibid. They are not so properly to be accounted the Authors of Crimes, whose Hands commit them, as they who gave the Power and Authority of committing them.

Thirdly, He who ought to have forbidden an ill Action, and did not; provided he had a full Obligation thus to prohibit it, and that upon the Account of that Obligation other Men had a Right of exacting such a Prohibition from him. Vide Lib. xlv. D. ad L. Aquil. Lib. ii. De Noxal. act. Lib. i. §. 1. D. famil. furt. fec. *Seneca Troad. ⁴ The Greek is this, Λόγους δὲ ὕστερ ἀν ἐκ τῆ περιψαυθῆ ἀκκηκῶς εἶπη, ἐκ αὐτὸς τῶν ἐντεῦθεν αἰτίαν, ἢ γε ἐκ ἀγαθοῦ τύχῳσιν ἀνέως εἰκότας ἐν λάσῃ. ἀλλ’ ὁ μὲν κλέστας φερατο ἀν δικάως τὸ ἔγκλημα τῆτο, τὰ δὲ προσεδότη τὸ τὴν ὑπερρίαν ἐκτελέσαι πᾶσι μόνον. Procop. Hist. Goth. Lib. i. Among the Greeks, where a Master had an absolute Authority over his Slaves, these were looked upon as meer Tools, whatever they did, whether Good or Evil, employed by their Master. See Baron Spanhemius upon Callimachus Hymn. in Cerer. Yet we ought to observe, that an Action perform’d at the Command of a Superior, is not altogether excusable at the Judgment-Seat of God, especially if he doth any Thing which he knows clearly to be Evil in itself. See §. 2. Note 9. So that we must by no means approve the Opinion of the Antients. That it is a sort of Virtue to commit a Fault in Obedience to a Master, as the Poet speaks, Pro Dominis peccare, etiam virtutis loco est. Publ. Syr. §. 567.

⁵ Authority here, signifies not a Power, or Command, which one has over another, but the particular Respect which a Person bears in his Mind to another, either upon the Account of his Merit, or Superiority, or some other Reason, which engages him to pay a great Deference to his Will and Pleasure (for which Reason the French Translation renders it, La Consideration, Respect, or Regard) according to Livy’s Distinction, speaking of K. Evander, Autoritate magis quam imperio regerat ea Loca, Lib. i. Ch. vii. He ruled more by his Authority than Command. And, on the contrary, of a King of Numidia, named Capusa, Quum magis jure gentis quam Autoritate inter suos, aut viribus obtineret Regnum. Lib. xxix. Ch. xxix. He obtained the Kingdom more by Law of the Nation, than by any Authority he had with his People, or Power to oblige them. Tacitus also speaks of the antient German Kings, Mox Rex, vel Princeps, prout atas cuique, prout nobilitas, prout decus bellorum, audiuntur, autoritate suadendi, magis quam jubendi potestate, Ch. xi. Then the King or Prince, as every one was more aged, noble, or warlike, was listened to more for persuasive Eloquence than commanding Power.

¹⁰ Tacitus’s Words are, Messalinus Cottam--- censuit cavendum esse Senatūs consulto, ut quanquam Infantes Magistratus, & culpe alienæ nescii, provincialibus Uxorū criminibus, perinde quam suis plesterentur. Tacit. Annal. Lib. iv. Ch. xx. num. 5. Senatē

Senate should pass to punish the Magistrates for the Crimes committed by their Wives, in Relation to the Government of the Provinces, whether they themselves were concern'd or unconcern'd in the Fact. And thus too, by the English Laws, the Husband is oblig'd to answer and to make Satisfaction for the Wrong his Wife doth to another, either by Word or Deed; because he neglected to use his Power of restraining her. Nay, if the Husband and Wife commit Felony together, the Wife is accounted neither a Principal nor an Accessary in the Crime, because she is suppos'd to have acted upon Necessity, by virtue of the Obedience she owed her Husband ^a.

Fourthly, He who commands, or hires a Person to perform a Villany ^b.

Fifthly, He who assists; as he who brings and holds the Ladder, while a Thief gets into a Window: He who strikes the Money out of a Man's Purse, that another Rogue may pick it up: He that drives away a Man's Cattle, that his Comrade may seize them, and carry them off ^c.

Sixthly, He that conceals or receives stolen Goods. Phocylid. Ἀμφοτέρω κλέπτες, καὶ ὁ δεξάμενⓄ καὶ ὁ κλέψας. They that receive arearrant Thieves no less than they that steal. Plato LL. Lib. xii. He that knowingly takes into his Keeping stolen Goods, shall be esteem'd equal in Guilt to the Thief himself. Lib. i. Princ. D. de fugitivis. Add. Ch. i. D. de receptoribus, & Edict. Reg. Theodoric. Ch. cxvi. Concerning the Assistants or Abettors in Adultery, see Lib. viii. Lib. ix. D. ad L. Ch. i. & ii.

Seventhly, He who did not assist the suffering Party, tho' he was oblig'd to do so. ^e Cicero Off. i. He that doth not, when he is able, guard and protect an injur'd Person, is as much in Fault as if he should desert his Parents, his Country, or his Friends. Add. Anth. Matth. de Crimin. Proleg. Ch. i. §. 15. Thus Soldiers, who are hired for a Guard in a Journey, if, on the Approach of a Number of Villains, whom they are able to grapple with, they refuse to fight, they are to be reckon'd themselves among the Villains. Thus a Fire shall be rightly imputed to the Watchman, who saw it kindling, yet neglected to stop it, or call for Help ^f. Thus among the Egyptians, if a Man on the Road saw another kill'd, or suffering any Violence, and did not rescue him though he was able he was obnoxious to capital Punishments. And if the Man was too weak to give Assistance and Deliverance, he was oblig'd to discover and prosecute the Actors: Upon Default thereof, he received a set Number of Blows, or was injoin'd a three Days Abstinence from Victuals ^g. And thus Abas King of Persia, to clear his Country of Thieves, publish'd an Order, that whenever any Person was kill'd, or plunder'd, the Inhabitants of the next Town should be accountable for the Fact ^h. So with ⁱ the Spartans, he that did not reprove a Person who offended in his Pretence, was punish'd as a Partner in the Crime. So ^k Cato exhorting the Magistrates to put the Laws in Execution against Offenders, told them, "That those who were able to restrain wicked Doers, and yet neglected this Power, did plainly assent, and contribute to their Enormities ^l." As for the Silence and the Dissimulation of the Magistrates, Plato ^m has given those Crimes their due Centure: The second Enemy to a State (says he) is the Man, who, tho' he be not strictly a Partner in this Villany (he means Treason) yet while he enjoys the highest Offices in the Commonwealth, does not observe the Conspiracy; and if he does observe it, out of a timorous Baseness neglects to succour and to deliver his Country. The Story of Scedasius's Daughters in Plutarch, Amator. Narration. Grotius ad Prov. xxix. 24. He that knows the Thief, and doth not, when requir'd upon Oath before a Magistrate, discover him, is in Guilt equal to him, Vide Levit. v. 1. ⁿ

For the same Reason, if a Keeper, who has undertaken the Care of a Madman, prove negligent, and the Madman happen to do any Hurt, the Keeper shall be answerable for the Fact, tho' the Madman be not capable of Imputation. Vide Lib. xiv. D. De Offic. Præsid.

Those Persons are reckon'd the inferior, or less principal Causes of other Men's Actions, who have advis'd, commended, or cajol'd them before the Facts, in such a Manner, as that their Counsel, or Praise, or Flattery, has had any Weight in promoting their Undertakings. For otherwise, a Man who barely commends a Crime, and yet by his Commendation contributes nothing to it, ought not to be punish'd for the Crime itself, but should suffer for his ill Thoughts and Designs ^o. It will not be very unjust to reckon those in the same Class,

MR. BARB. NOTE S.

¹ The Greek is τὰς προαγωγὰς πᾶσας κατεπόντισα. As to those who are Procurers for Adulterers, see Digest. Lib. xlvi. Tit. 5. ad Legem. Julian de Adulteriis, Leg. viii. & ix.

³ Plutarch's Words (Insit. Lacon.) are these, Ὁ δὲ μὴ ἐπιπλήτῳ παρόντιⓄ αὐτῷ ἁμαρτάνοντα, ἕοχⓄ ἢ τῷ ἰσῆ ἐπιτιμίᾳ, ὥσπερ καὶ ὁ ἁμαρτάνων.

⁵ The Author himself a little lower says, Nothing is to be imputed to the Madman; whereupon it would have been better to have put this Example among those Actions for which a Man is as much responsible as if they had been actually done by him. See Dig. Lib. i. Tit. 18. De Offic. Præsid. Leg. 14.

who by their Recommendation have prefer'd a Man to the Care and Management of any Business, since 'tis decent they should blush for his Faults and Miscarriages ^a.

But as to the Matter of Counsel, it's worth while to run over the Disputes of the ¹⁶ Civilians, where they are arguing whether the Words Ope and Consilio, by Help and by Counsel, are to be understood in a Conjunctive, or in a divided Sense. For if Counsel imports the same as Intention or Design, he only will be guilty of another Man's Theft, who assisted him in it, not out of Imprudency, but with premeditated Wickedness ^b.

If Counsel has been given without Help, it will be requisite to enquire, whether it were General or Special. The former kind is, for Example, when a Man, hearing another complain of Poverty, advises him to support himself by Stealing; and such a Counsellor will not, in human Cognisance, pass himself for a Thief. But if a Man has given special Counsel to another, as, if he has shewn him what way to break into a House, told him the fittest Time, and where the Things be that may be most conveniently carried off, or how he may hide himself after the Fact, such an one will have a very strong Twang of the Thief ^c. It is further observable, in reference to Counsel, and other like Influences on other Mens Actions, that by them the Guilt is only communicated; but not wholly devolv'd from the Actor to the Exhorter, unless the former were under an ¹⁷ Obligation to put his Advice in Practice. Hence Diodotus in Thucydides ^d complains with good Reason, "That the Orators in a State should be accountable for their Advice, and the People not at all accountable for hearkening to them." He adds ^e, "If he that believ'd, as well as he that persuaded a Business, were liable to be punish'd, you would proceed much more wisely in your Judgments. But now, when you fall into Passions on any Disappointment of your Hopes, you only punish him who gave the Advice, and not your selves, who have always born so great a Share in the Mistake, or Miscarriage. Hence Mr. Hobbes ^e thus declares in general, This is also incident to the Nature of Counsel, that whatsoever it be, he that asks it cannot in Equity accuse or punish it: For to ask Counsel of another, is to permit him to give such Counsel as he shall think best; and consequently he that gives Counsel to his Sovereign (whe- ther a Monarch, or an Assembly) when he asks it, let it please or displease, cannot be punish'd, because he gave it to such as were willing to bear it, whatsoever it should be. But he here should have added, If the Counsellor gives his Opinion bona fide, and has a perfect Knowledge of the Matter in Debate. For it is a Piece of Wickedness to pretend to give a Judgment about a Thing which we are unacquainted with. He presently subjoins; But if one Subject gives Counsel to another to do any thing contrary to the Laws, whether that Counsel proceed from evil Intentions, or from Ignorance only, it is punishable by the Commonwealth, because Ignorance of the Laws is no good Excuse, where every one is bound to take notice of the Laws to which he is subject.

Hence that Maxim in England, commended so highly by Dr. Bates ^f, cannot be receiv'd without some Limitation; That the King can never mistake, nor do any Man an Injury, because all the Fault and Punishment is deriv'd, as it ought to be ¹⁹, on his Ministers and Counsellors, whose Duty is to Admonish the Prince, to deny him their Assistance, when he enters on ill Designs, and rather to quit their Places than to obey him, when he commands the doing of any thing contrary to the Laws. Add. Gell. Lib. i. Ch. iii. Where he tells us of Chilon, that he was troubled with Remorse of Conscience, upon his having persuaded the Judges to ²⁰ absolve a Friend of his manifestly guilty, and whom he himself had in private condemn'd. 'Tis a remarkable Story which we find in the same Author, Lib. xi. Ch. xviii. of a Person's being convicted as a Man-stealer, for hiding, with a Cast of his Gown, a Runagate Slave, who was passing within Sight of his Master.

It is doubtful, whether we should rank under this, or under the former Class those, who by their Example excite others to such Sins, as they would have otherwise declined. Matth. xviii. v. 6. Juvenal. Sat. ii. 79.

¹⁶ The Words of the Roman Law are, Interdum quoque furti tenetur, qui ipse furtum non fecit, qualis est is, cujus ope & consilio furtum factum est. Instit. Lib. iv. Tit. 1. De obligationibus, quæ ex delicto nascuntur (and not De furtis, as this Author and Grotius cite it, for that's no Title in the Institutions.) See also Digest. Lib. 1. Tit. 16. De verborum signifi. Leg. 55. §. 2. and Lib. xlvii. Tit. ii. de furtis Leg. 36. §. 1.

¹⁹ In England, it is common to lay all the Faults of the Prince upon his Ministers, who are indeed very often most guilty of them, but the Fault of the Ministers does not always excuse the Fault of the Sovereign; for they have their Reason and Judgment, and may over-rule them; so that if they suffer themselves to be govern'd by those that are about them, 'tis their Fault. In most Affairs they ought to see with their own Eyes, and not leave themselves to be biased by a vicious and corrupt Ministry. But if they are not able to search into the Bottom of Things themselves, and distinguish between Good and Evil, they ought to leave the Governing the People to such as are able, for I do not see but the Saying of Charles Barromaus, which he spake of bad Bishops, who could not govern their Flocks, may be applied to Princes who manage ill. If they are incapable of such an Employ, why are they so ambitious as to seek it? If they are capable, why so negligent? Mr. Bernard, in his Nov. Rep. of Letters, speaks the same thing in plain Terms, which 'twere to be wish'd Princes would consider on as they are judiciously made.

²⁰ See the Reflections which Mr. De Sacy makes upon it, in his Treatise of Friendship, Lib. ii.

From all these Observations it is easy to perceive the Reason and the Limitation of those common Axioms; What a Man does by another, of that he himself is reckon'd the Author: We make those things our own, to which we grant our Consent^a. That which, in Matters relating to us, is done by others upon our Command, obliges us our selves: That is esteem'd our Action, the Execution of which we have impos'd on another; and the like. As for that Communication of Actions, which results from the Union of a moral Body, it will be hereafter explain'd in its proper Place.

When one is said to partake of another's Action, upon account of his own Permission, or because he did not hinder the Action, in this Case it is requisite not only that he should have been able by his natural Strength to have hindred it, but likewise that he should have had an Obligation incumbent on him to hinder it. When either of these Two Conditions fails, nothing can be imputed to him, who gives another leave to act at Pleasure. And therefore GOD ALMIGHTY is capable of no Imputation, upon the account of his Permission of Sins. For he is not oblig'd to restrain them in such a Manner, as to make them impossible to be committed: That is, by withdrawing our natural Strength, or extinguishing the Liberty of our Will: since upon the Removal of these, no sort of moral Actions could be perform'd by Man^b.

That Permission then of another Man's Action, is void of all moral Effect, which we give when to hinder the Action is beyond our Duty, or above our Strength; unless this Weakness and Inability is procur'd by our Fault, and unless the Ignorance arose thro' supine Negligence, and within that Degree of Diligence which we are oblig'd to observe.

Lastly, Nothing can be imputed upon the account of permitting a good Action, which we might indeed, but ought not to have hinder'd. Thus he can impute nothing to me (or I owe him nothing) who has given me Permission, or has not forbidden me to use my Right; that is, has done me no Injury.

^a Lib. ii. tit. x. D. Do eo per quem factum erit. ^b 'Tis a notable Saying of Lucian, de Merced. Conduct. GOD is not in the Fault, but the Man that makes it. And thus we intend no more than a Jest, when we say, on some Occasions, Now I'll give it leave to rain, or the like.

WE come now to consider of that moral Rule, or Law^a, by which moral Actions are to be squar'd, and according to their Agreement or Disagreement with which, they acquire peculiar Qualities^b. And here we must take Care in the first Place, accurately to distinguish Law from some other things which seem to bear some Relation to it, and which for that Reason are frequently confounded with it: And these are Counsel, Covenant, and Right. Now Law differs from Counsel in this, that by the latter a Man endeavours, with Reasons taken from the Nature of the Thing, to induce another Person to some Performance or Omission, over which Person, at least as to the present Business, he has no proper Power, so as that he can lay any direct Obligation on him, but must leave it to his Pleasure and Choice, whether he will follow the Counsel, or not^c. Yet Counsel indeed may administer Occasion to an Obligation, inasmuch as it furnishes a Man with some Knowledge, by which an Obligation may be produc'd or increas'd. Thus, a Physician cannot by Virtue of any Power, or Command, order his Patient to take such things, and to abstain from others; but while he shews one thing to be conducive, and another pernicious to Health, the Patient is bound to embrace the former, and to avoid the latter; not upon Account of any Right which the Physician holds over him, but by the Law of Nature, which commands every Man to take care of his own Life and Health. But Law, though it ought not to want its Reasons, yet these Reasons are not the Cause why Obedience is paid to it, but the Power of the Exactor, who when he has signify'd his Pleasure, lays an Obligation on the Subject to act in Conformity to his Decree, tho' perhaps they do not so well apprehend the Reasons of the Injunction. To which Purpose Mr. Hobbes^a thus expresseth himself; Counsel (says he) is a Precept, in which the Reason why we Obey, is taken from the Thing prescribed: But Law, or proper Command, is a Precept, in which the Reason of our Obedience is taken from the Will of the Prescriber. For no Man can say, Sic volo, Sic jubeo, so I will, and so I command; unless his Will is his Reason.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. I.

¹ Our Author ought to have treated in the beginning of this Chapter, of the Necessity of a Law in general, i. e. shew that it is not agreeable to the Nature of Man to live without some Law; which natural Order he follows himself, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. ii. §. 1. See also what he says, Lib. ii. §. 1.

² So the Civil Law teaches, Nemo ex consilio obligatur; etiam si non expediat ei, cui datur; quia liberum est cuique apud se explorare, an expediat sibi consilium. Digest. Lib. xvii. Tit. i. Mandati.

--- -----Stet pro ratione voluntas,

We obey Laws therefore, not principally upon Account of the Matter of them, but upon Account of the Legislator's Will. And thus, Law is the Injunction of him, who has a Power over those to whom he prescribes; but Counsel, of him who has no such Power. To do the Things enjoind by Law, is Matter of Duty; to do those appointed by Counsel, is Matter of free Pleasure. The End of Counsel is directed toward him who receives it: And this End he is at Liberty to weigh and to approve. But tho' Law too has commonly some End directed towards those who receive it, yet it does not leave them the Right of examining and rejecting this End, but actually determines it by enjoining it. Counsel is only given to those who are willing to have it, but Law reaches the unwilling. Lastly, The Right of a Counsellor ceases at the Pleasure of him who receives the Counsel; but the Right of a Law-giver cannot be taken away at the Pleasure of those on whom he imposes the Law^b.

II. Neither were those Antients accurate enough in their Expressions, who frequently apply to Laws the Name of ¹ Common Agreements^c. For, besides that, neither the Divine positive Laws, nor the Laws of Nature, had their Rise from the Agreement of Men, and therefore that Title can only be attributed to civil Laws; even ² these are not properly Covenants and Agreements, tho' there was indeed some Intervention of Compact at the Original of Civil Power. It is plain that the Grecians, as in their other politick Speeches, so in this too, had an Eye to their own Democratical Governments; in which, because the Laws were made upon the Propofal of the Magistrate, with the Knowledge, and by the Command of the People, and so, as it were, in the Way of Bargain or Stipulation, they gave them the Name of Covenants and Agreements before-mention'd. Tho' indeed, neither upon Account of the major Part of the Peoples consenting or agreeing to them, can democratical Laws be properly call'd Covenants. For this Agreement is only the Manner by which the supream Power, lodg'd in a general Assembly, exerts its Force; that being taken for the Will and the Decree of all, to which the greater Number gives Consent.

So that the Efficacy of a Vote given in Council by any Member about framing a Decree, is very different from the Consent which a Man declares at his Entrance on a Covenant: For in this last Case, a Person that dissent's is not bound, and the Party cannot proceed without him: Whereas in the former Case, even the dissenting Party is tied and obliged by the Plurality of Votes.

The remaing Points of Distinction between a Compact or Covenant, and a Law, are obvious. For a Compact is a Promise, but a Law is a Command. In Compacts the Form of speaking is, I will do so and so; but in Laws the Form runs, Do thou so, after an imperative Manner. In Compacts, since they depend, as to their Original, on our Will, we first determine what is to be done, before we are oblig'd to do it; but in Laws, which suppose the Power of others over us, we are in the first Place oblig'd to act, and afterwards the Manner of acting is determin'd. And therefore he is not bound by a Compact, who did not freely tie himself by giving his Consent; but we are for this Reason oblig'd by a Law, because we ow'd an antecedent Obedience to its Author^d.

III. As for the Term of Right, as it imports a Power of acting granted, or left free by the Laws, we must take care not to let it pass for the same Thing as the Law itself: That is, When we are said to have a Right by the Divine Law of doing such or such a Thing, we must not imagine that the same Thing is injoin'd and commanded by the Divine Law, and that therefore we may fairly do it, tho' it should be forbidden by the Laws of Men. For, since a Man hath a Power of doing all such Things as can proceed from his natural Abilities, except those which are forbidden by some Law, hence, by common Custom of Speech, those Things which are not prohibited by such or such a Law, we are said to have a Right of doing^e by that Law. Right therefore, in this Sense, denotes a Liberty; but Law includes some Bond

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. VI. §. 2, and 3.

¹ Κοινὰ συμβόλαια, ἢ ἐπιμορφοίαι, as the Greeks almost every where in their Writings do. So Aristotle defines the Law, νόμος αἰρεσιμότητος καὶ ὁμοιογένειαν καὶ τὴν πόλιος. A Law is an Order decreed by the Common Agreement of a City, Rhet. ad Alexandr. Ch. i. See also Chap. ii, & iii. So Isocrates calls an Act of Oblivion and Indemnity, συμβολήν πόλεως, the Covenant of a City. Orat. adv. Callim. Dionysius Halicarn. says, Συμβόλαια εἶναι κοινὰ πόλιων τῶν ἡμῶν, i. e. Laws are the common Agreement of the City, Lib. x. ch. iv. See also the Digest. Lib. i. tit. 3. de Legib. Senatusque Consult. & Longa Consult. Leg. i. & 2.

and Engagement, by which our natural Liberty is restrain'd ².

IV. In general, a Law may conveniently enough be defin'd, a Decree by which a Sovereign obligeth a Subject to conform his Actions to what he prescribes ¹. We call it a Decree, not as it remains in the Mind and Will of the Party decreeing, but as it is communicated to the Subject in such a Manner, as to let him understand the Necessity of his conforming to it: And therefore the Term Decree is here equivalent to Command. And we think it an indifferent Matter, whether one should call a Law a Decree or a Speech, provided it be not esteem'd necessary to it, that it be promulgated either vivâ voce, or in Writing; since it is sufficient that the Will of the Legislator be any way made known to the Subject, tho' it should only be by the internal Suggestion of Natural Light. Therefore we take it to be an useless Piece of Subtily and Niceness in Mr. Hobbes ³, when he maintains, that the Laws of Nature have no farther the Force of Laws, than as they are promulgated in Holy Scriptures by the Word of God; and not as they are certain Conclusions apprehended by Reason, concerning the doing, or the omitting of Things. For, from the bare Dictates of Reason, we do not only understand that the Observance of Nature's Laws is good and profitable to Mankind, but likewise that it is the Will and the Command of GOD, that Men should govern their Actions by those Rules; which is sufficient to the Essence of a Law. Tho' still indeed this Reply may be made, that natural Laws, even as they are the Dictates of Reason, cannot be conceiv'd any otherwise than in the Manner of Speeches, Propositions, or Sentences ².

As to Grotius's Definition ⁴, where he says the Law obligeth to that which is Right, we must observe, that he supposeth somewhat to be Just and Right before any Rule or Law; whence it must follow, that the Law of Nature doth not make what we call Right, but only denotes and points it out as a Thing already Existing. Concerning which Hypothesis we have already declar'd our Mind, Ch. ii. §. 6.

To conclude this Head, It is evident, that under the Name of Laws, not only those are comprehended which belong to Justice strictly so called, directing us, upon a full and perfect Obligation ⁵, to exhibit such and such Things to others; but those too which are concern'd about the other Virtues, and which extend no farther than the Agent's own Person. For which Reason Laws may, and frequently are, made against Drunkenness ⁶, and other kinds of Intemperance, which Vices are so very prejudicial to the Parties committing them ⁴. The same must be held as to Sumptuary Laws, which prescribe the Measure of Expences in Victuals, Cloaths, Building, and other Furniture or Provisions. In which Particulars, if any Man offends, he doth no one an Injury, provided he defray the Charges out of his own Stock: And yet there's no Question to be made, but that a Subject may by Laws be obliged to Frugality, which conduceth so highly to every Man's Interest and Advantage.

V. But since in the Definition of Laws it hath been asserted, that they proceed from a Superior, and that they have in themselves the Power ¹ of obliging, it seems necessary that we here shew what Obligation is, and whence it ariseth; as also who is capable of receiving an Obligation, and how one Man can oblige another, or, which is the same thing, how it comes to pass that one Man may, by Virtue of his Authority and Command, enjoin another such and such Duties.

Obligation, then, we have already defin'd, Ch. i. §. 21. as a moral operative Quality, by which a Man is bound to perform somewhat, or to suffer somewhat. In thus defining Obligation we consider it as it inheres in the Person obliged. Bishop Cumberland, Ch. v. §. 27. in his Definition proceeds another way, considering Obligation as it is an Act of the Legislator, by which he shews or declares, that Actions conformable to his Laws are necessary to be done by the Persons for whom the Laws are ordain'd. The Roman Lawyers call it ² the Bond of the Law, by which we are necessarily tied to this or that. For, by Means of it a kind of moral Bridle is put upon our Freedom of Action, so that we cannot rightly take any other way than what we are thus guided to. Not that it can so far restrain Mens Wills, as to render them unable to steer a different Course, tho' at their own Peril: For in this Sense Arrian's ³ Assertion will ever hold true, Περαιρέσεως ἀλλοτριζες ἐδὲς κώριθι, No Man is Master of another's Will.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. iii, iv, v.

⁴ This fully includes the general Notion of a Law. See the same Note.

⁵ This Definition agrees only to obligatory Laws, i. e. which oblige us positively to act, or not. But we shall shew in our second Note on §. 15. that the general Notion of a Law taken in the full Extent of it, as 'tis my Design to explain it there, comprehends that besides a Permission to act, or not act, in certain Cases, as we judge convenient.

⁶ To make the Arguing of the Author compleat, these Words ought to be added, But this is no Foundation for Mr. Hobbes's Hypothesis.

⁷ To understand this Distinction of perfect and imperfect Obligation, see Chap. vii. of this Book, §. 7. and Book iii. Ch. iv. §. 3. &c. See also what has been said before, Ch. i. §. 19. concerning Power.

⁸ To this we may refer a Law of Seleucus, commanding, That whosoever of his Subjects happening to be indispos'd, should drink pure Wine, unless upon the Advice of a Physician, if he recover'd, should suffer Death, for exceeding the Bounds of Temperance without express orders. Which Penalty was, no doubt, unreasonably severe. Ælian. in V. H. Lib. ii. Ch. xxxvii. But the learned Dr. Bentley is of Opinion, that all the Laws which pass under the Name of Seleucus, and of which we find divers Fragments in Authors, are all forged. See his English Discourse on Phalaris, p. 335. and Novell. de Repub. des Lett. by Mr. Bernard, June 1699. Art. v.

¹⁰ This is the Effect of all Laws obligatory, for as for the Laws of simple Permission, of which we shall speak Note 2. §. 15. the Effect is to give a moral Right, or Power, to have certain Things certainly and lawfully, or to do and require certain Actions of another, if we judge it convenient. See Chap. i. §. 19. 20. foregoing.

¹¹ This Author gives the general Definition of the Institutes, which properly respects Payments, or all other Engagements which Men enter into of their own Accord, with Relation to another; for thus it runs, Obligatio est Juris vinculum, quo necessitate obstringimur alicujus rei solvenda, secundum nostræ civitatis Jura. Institut. Lib. iii. Tit. 14. princ.

Now, altho' there are many other Things which have an Influence on the Will, in bending towards one side rather than the contrary, yet Obligation hath this peculiar Force beyond them all, that whereas they only press the Will with a kind of natural Weight or Load, on the Removal of which it returns of its own Accord to its former Indifference; Obligation affects the Will in a moral Way, and inspires it inwardly with such a particular Sense, as compels it to pass Censure itself on its own Actions, and to judge itself worthy of suffering Evil, if it proceed not according to the Rule prescrib'd. And hence alone we may understand how sufficient the Strength of the Obligation is to the bending and inclining the Will; since there's nothing but the Thoughts of that Good or Evil which our Actions may bring on ourselves or others, that can lay any Necessity of such a Performance, or of such an Omission, upon the Mind of Man whilst in Debate about future Concerns; supposing that the Will is allow'd its proper Liberty, and that such Actions are to be exerted, as may be properly imputed to the Agent. And in this Respect chiefly, Obligation differs from downright Compulsion, that altho' both do ultimately represent some Object of Fear, yet Compulsion only shakes the Will with an external Force, and drives it on to the Choice of an ungrateful Thing, by the bare Sense of approaching an imminent Danger: whereas Obligation doth farther engage the Person to acknowledge, that the Evil denounc'd against the Transgression of such or such a Rule, doth not undeservedly fall upon him, since by observing the Rule he might have declin'd and escap'd it.

VI. As to Man's being capable of receiving Obligation, one Reason how he comes to be so is, because he is endu'd with Will, which can turn to either Side, and so guide itself by a moral Rule; unlike those other Beings which by some intrinsic Constraint are determin'd to one and the same Way of acting. Whence it follows, that so far as no Necessity is interpos'd by any external Principle, Man must be conceiv'd to be perfectly free, and to have a Power of doing all those Things which fall within the Sphere of his natural Strength and Ability. Nay, when he hath once determin'd and resolv'd with himself, or when he hath once made any Choice, yet in the Determination, Resolution, or Choice, consider'd purely as they proceed from the Will, there is no such Force, but that he may, at his Pleasure, rightly change or relinquish them: unless there intervene some outward Restraint, forbidding any Alteration of the Will, when once settl'd and declar'd; for a Man upon once signifying his Will and Purpose; may put himself under such a Condition as that it shall be unlawful for him afterwards to recede.

Now a Man is suppos'd to have chang'd his Will, not only when he expressly declares his present Dislike of his former Choice, but likewise when he hath done any Thing inconsistent with his preceding Resolution. And from this Principle may be deduc'd the greatest Part of what the Civilians deliver concerning Repentance, or the altering of a Purpose. For, if we enquire after the general and ultimate Cause, why to repent of a Design should in some Acts be lawful, in others not, we shall find it to be no other but this, that some Acts are attended with an external Bond, which forbids any Change of Purpose once declar'd; whereas in the rest, the Will is left to the Exercise of its intrinsic Liberty. The former Case usually happens, when, upon Supposition of a Change in one Man's Resolution, some other Man would be highly injur'd and prejudic'd, and so Occasion would be administred to the breaking off of all Society and Commerce amongst Men. And therefore from a Signification of the Will, this other Man is said to obtain a Right, by Means of which he is now impower'd to make the promising Party stand to his Word, and upon Default may prosecute him by Force, either such as he himself can exert, or such as proceeds from the supream Ruler, according as the Persons live, either in a State of Nature or of civil Society. Therefore, when upon Declaration made of my Will, another Man doth not obtain a Right over me, I am then at Liberty to repent of what I have done. And such a Right over us is then not obtain'd, when the Sovereign, under whose Power we live, hath not given another Man Authority to require and exact that from us, which we have signify'd as our Intention². And hence it appears why positive Laws may be repeal'd by him that enacted them; because they do not convey to the Subjects any such Right upon the Legislator, by Virtue of which they may demand and require their Continuance. Tho' some Commonwealths have endeavour'd to preserve the Perpetuity of their Laws, by obliging the Members to declare upon Oath, that they will not consent to their Alteration. Nay, tho' at the End of the Statute or Ordinance a Clause should be affix'd, pronouncing all Decrees that may hereafter be made contrary to this, to be null and void, yet such a Clause cannot hinder the altering or reversing of a Law by which no Man has obtain'd a Right. For 'tis absurd that a former Decree should disannul a latter; since absolute Power cannot bind and restrain itself; and since that which is in its

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. V.

⁴ This is the Opinion of Bishop Cumberland, whose Words our Author transcribes. Another Englishman, in a Work which we hoped would have been turned into French, embraces the same Notion. According to him, the Duty or Obligation of a Man can be nothing else but a Reason and Motive propounded after an agreeable Manner, and necessarily determining him to choose and prefer one Manner of acting before another; and that Reason or Motive can be no other than a great Degree of Misery to be avoided, and Happiness to be attained; which can't be avoided or gained by acting after any other Manner. He owns no other Obligation, and if there be any other, he believes, that if it be looked into with Care, it will be found to end in that. Mr. Bernard expresses Dr. Gasfrel's Sense after this Manner, in his Nov. De la Rep. des Lettres, April 1700.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VI.

² It is a Rule of the Roman Lawyers, Nemo potest mutare consilium suum in alterius injuriam, i. e. No Man can change his Purpose to another's Prejudice. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. xvii. De diversis Reg. Juris. Leg. lxxv.

² We shall hereafter treat of several Cases in which 'tis lawful for a Man to change his Designs and Intentions. See chiefly Lib. iii. Chap. vi, vii.

own Nature subject to change³ cannot be made fix'd and irrevocable. The Athenians in Thucydides^b, laid up a thousand Talents in the Citadel, denouncing a capital Penalty against him who should either decree or persuade the employing that Money to any Use, except in Case the City were attack'd by a hostile Fleet: And yet upon the Revolt of the Inhabitants of Chios, their Fears engag'd them to repeal that Decree^c. When Princes^d add expressly in some of their Constitutions, that altho' they should hereafter order any Thing to the contrary in a particular Edict, yet the Magistrates and Judges shall not obey or regard any such Command, this Addition doth by no Means amount so high, as to prove they may not abrogate such Constitutions, but rather shews, that the latter Orders are not serious, or that they dropt from them unawares. And sometimes by this subtil Artifice they cut off and prevent the Importunities of sawcy Petitioners, whom perhaps it would not be safe for them absolutely to deny^d.

But there's need of distinguishing very nicely between the positive Law itself, and that Right which it occasions to be obtain'd. The Law itself may be disannul'd by the Author, but the Right acquir'd by Virtue of that Law, whilst in Force, must still remain: For, together with a Law, to take away all its precedent Effects, would be a high Piece of Injustice: For Example, 'Suppose it were a Law in any State, that as a^e Man dispos'd of his Possessions by Will, so the Right to them should stand. It would be very fair, in this Case, for the Sovereign to retrench this Liberty of Testaments, and to order that for the future all these Inheritances shall pass to the Heirs at Law. Yet it would be unreasonable to take away from Persons what fell to them by Will, whilst the former Law was in Use and Vigour. And by the same Rule we may judge of that Action of Pope Boniface VIII. when, out of Hatred to Philip the Fair, King of France, he recall'd all the Indulgences which his Predecessors had granted to the French Nation; which Harry Stephens hath so justly ridicul'd in his pleasant Apology for Herodotus^e.

We must take Care likewise to distinguish the other Acts of Sovereigns from their Laws, lest any should imagine that all their just Donations, Alienations, or Compacts, may be retracted by themselves, or⁷, by their Successors. For upon these Acts a Right is obtain'd by other Men, which ought not to be taken from them against their Consent. Hence it appears, that when a Man renounceth his Right, it is not necessary to add expressly, that neither he nor his Heirs will do hereafter any Thing contrary to that Renunciation; and that if they do attempt any such Matter, it shall be esteem'd void. For, since in Deeds of this Nature a Man plainly declares his receding from his Right to any Thing, and professeth to translate it on another Person, it would be evident, without that additional Clause, that he cannot (with any Force or Effect) afterwards dispose of that Thing, having no longer any Right or Title to it. And for the same Reason, because whilst the Testator lives, no Man hath obtain'd a Right by Virtue of his Testament, he may fairly alter it, even tho' he had strengthen'd it with a Clause, declaring all Wills that should hereafter be made to be invalid. For this indeed carries Grounds enough to make us presume the latter Will did not proceed from his serious Intentions; yet if that very Clause be revok'd in that latter Will, the former will be of no Virtue or Efficacy. And so in Deeds and Instruments of Conveyances and other Contracts, if a Dispute arise about any Point,⁸ that which bears the latter Date shall take Place of that which was made first.

VII. From what has been said, we may likewise gather the Reason why a Man cannot be oblig'd to himself, or why he cannot enter into any Agreement or Promise purely directed to his own Person, no other Party being concern'd with him. For he who obtains a Right by any Obligation, may fairly wave that Right, when by so doing he injures not a third Man. But now in this Case the obliged and the obliging Party, or he that owes the Right, and he that obtains it, are one and the same. Therefore should a Man never so much resolve to oblige himself, yet the Obligation would be in vain, since he could excuse himself from Performance at his Pleasure: And he that can dispense with himself in this Manner is actually free. Besides, such an Obligation could be of no manner of Use; because when a Man gives or denies any Thing to himself, he neither gets by the Performance, nor loseth by the Omission^f.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VI.

³ If Kings were infallible, as they would in the Case before us always take proper Measures, and command nothing but what is for the great Advantage of the State, we might believe that whatever Laws and Orders they make, ought never to be altered; but since the contrary is evident by Experience, it is as absurd, as prejudicial to a Society, to affirm, That what is once resolv'd and established, in what Manner soever it is done, should always continue in Force, whatever Inconveniences may arise from it. The antient Kings of Perſia, whose Laws were looked upon as unalterable, found themselves often obliged to hinder their Effect by some latter Edicts, (See Esth. viii. 8, &c.) and the Princes who in all Times have acted upon this Principle, altho' closely, must easily observe the bad Consequences of it, if they were careful to do their Duty, unless they were intoxicated with a good Opinion of themselves, and puffed up with a false Notion of Grandeur.

⁵ So in the Civil Law, new Laws and new Constitutions have no Force but for the future, they meddle not with what's past; as these Words import, Leges & Constitutiones futuris certum est dare formam negotiis, non ad facta præterita revocari. Cod. Lib. i. But whereas it is sometimes said, that a Man is obliged to preserve himself^a, the Meaning of this is no more, but that the Exercise of that Obligation, inherent in every Man, is terminated in a Man's own Person, but it hath likewise a reference to GOD, the Author of natural Law, as to him who hath a Right of requiring the Performance of that Obligation, and of punishing its Neglect: And therefore a Man is so far bound to consult his own Preservation, as he is a Servant of GOD, and a part of human Society, to which by the Divine Command he ought to shew himself a useful Member. In the same manner as a Master may rightly punish his Servant, and a Sovereign his Subject, who hath render'd himself unfit to discharge his proper Labours and Employments. Neither is this Maxim, that a Person cannot oblige himself, confin'd to single Men, but extends to whole Bodies and Societies^b. As for that which some Authors urge about a Man's swearing to himself, That he will, for Instance, refrain from this or that Enormity to which his evil Appetites incline him, this Obligation bears the Nature of a Vow, the exacting of which appertains to Almighty GOD^c.

VIII. Another Reason why, since the Will of Man is capable of conforming to a Rule, such a Rule may be prescrib'd to it, and an Obligation laid on it thus to conform, is, because he stands under the Command of a superior Power. These two Conditions put together, render Men liable to Obligations, proceeding from eternal Principles. For when the Powers of any Agent are so tied up by Nature to an uniform way of acting, as that it cannot by its inward Motion steer a different Course, the Action thus produc'd is rather physical than moral, and ariseth rather from Necessity than from Obligation. And, on the other hand, where a Person acknowledgeth no Superior, there can be no essential Principle apt to restrain his inward Liberty. And, altho' such an one should never so exactly observe a certain Method of proceeding, and constantly refrain from some kinds of Actions, yet this would not be taken for the Effect of any Obligation, but of his own free Pleasure. It follows then, that he alone is capable of Obligation, who^d can have Knowledge of a Rule prescrib'd him, and hath a Will intrinsically free, able to steer contrary ways; which Will must, however, when a Rule is enjoin'd it by a Superior, be sensible that it ought not to recede from it. And that such is the Nature of Mans every one's Observation may inform him.

IX. Obligations are laid on human Minds properly by a Superior, that is, by such an One as not only hath sufficient Strength to denounce some Evil against us upon Non-compliance, but hath likewise just Reason to require the retrenching of our Free-wills by his own Pleasure. For when any one is endued with these Qualifications, so soon as he shall command any thing, and shall farther signify the good and evil Consequent on Obedience and Disobedience, there must needs arise in the rational Faculty, a Fear mix'd with Reverence, the former proceeding from his Power, the latter from the Consideration of such other Reasons, as without that Motive of Fear, and barely by way of Counsel, ought to prevail on us to embrace the Command. Hence we conceive, that the Right of imposing Obligations on another, or, which comes to the same Thing, the Right of commanding another, and of prescribing Laws, doth not arise barely from Strength, or from the superior Excellency of Nature^e. Strength indeed, may of it self so far bend me contrary to my Inclinations, as to make me choose rather, for a while, to obey another's Will, than to venture the Experience of his Force: But this Inducement ceaseth, when once the Fear is over, and I shall then have no Reason why I should not act rather according to my own Pleasure, than according to his. And where a Man can bring no other Argument for my Compliance to his Orders, but Force and Violence, nothing hinders, but that if I judge it expedient for my Affairs, I may try all Means to repel the Violence, and to assert and vindicate my own Liberty^f.

X. It may not be improper here, to examine that Assertion of Mr. Hobbes, which he hath laid down in his Book, De Cive^g, and which runs thus, in the English Improvement of his Leviathan^h. The Right of Nature, whereby GOD reigneth over Men, and punisheth those who break his Laws, is to be deriv'd, not from his Creating them, as if he requir'd Obedience as of Gratitude for his Benefits, but from his irresistible Power. The Argument with which he defends this Notion is carried on to this Purpose: "All Right over others being either by Nature, or by Compact, that Right may be said to be granted by Nature, which Nature doth not take away." Now seeing all Men, by Nature, had a Right to all Things, they had a Right every one

Mr. BARB. NOTES, on §. VII, VIII, and IX.

¹ That is to say, That Man is the Object of the Duties that respect himself, but not the Foundation of them; and if he is obliged to preserve himself (for Example) or improve himself, he is not the Cause of it himself altogether, as if he could lay an Obligation upon himself, but because GOD will have him do so. See Lib. ii. Chap. iv. §. 16.

² This is, because these Bodies are looked upon as a single moral Person. See what is said above, Chap. i. §. 13.

³ These Words ought to be added, acknowledging a Superior, can—and the Author himself has not omitted them in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. ii. §. 4. where the rest of this Sentence is found Word for Word.

⁴ All the Power of obliging an intelligent Creature, as Man, is founded upon the Ability and Will which he hath to make himself happy, or less miserable, than he would be, if he disobeyed. If Man were such a Creature, that he must necessarily be unhappy, or that it were impossible that his Misery could be increased or diminished, GOD might force him indeed to act after such or such a Manner, but he could not properly oblige him to it (Gastrell in his Extract of the New Rep. of Letters.) It were also in vain for an intelligent Being to pretend to subject another's Actions to a certain Rule, if it be not in his Power to reward his Obedience, and punish his Disobedience, and that by some Good or Evil, which is not the natural Effect or Produce of the Action itself, for that which is naturally profitable, or unprofitable, works of itself without the Help of any Law. Mr. Lock's Philos. Essay, p. 428.

of them to reign over all the rest. But because this Right could not be obtain'd by Force, it concern'd the Safety of every one, laying aside that Right, to set up Men with sovereign Authority, by common Consent to rule and defend them: Whereas if there had been any Man of Power irresistible, there had been no Reason why he should not by that Power have rul'd and defended both himself and them, according to his own Discretion. To those therefore, whose Power is irresistible, the Dominion of all Men adhereth naturally by their Excellence of Power; and consequently it is from that Power, that the Kingdom over Men, and the Right of afflicting them at his Pleasure, belongs naturally to Almighty GOD, not as Creator and Gracious, but as Omnipotent. Now in this Discourse there are several Things that deserve to be censur'd. For, in the first Place, it may be question'd, whether or no those two Expressions, A Right of Sovereignty (upon account of Strength) is granted by Nature, and, A Right of, &c. is not taken by Nature, hang very well together. Because in most Cases, my not taking away a thing is by no means an Argument, that I therefore grant it. And since, not to be taken away, and to be granted, are different Things; such a Right may seem to be granted by some other Principle than Nature, tho' Nature doth not take it away. Besides, that Maxim, All Men by Nature had a Right to all Things, ought to be interpreted with great Caution. By *Right*², he means the Liberty which every Man hath of using his natural Faculties according to Reason. Therefore his Principle, in a sound Sense, will amount to no more than this; By Nature, that is, upon the Removal of all Law, every Man may fairly use his natural Strength against those whom his Reason instructs him thus to deal with, for the sake of his own Preservation. But it doth not hence follow, that barely by natural Strength an Obligation, properly so call'd, may be laid on another: For to compel and to oblige, are very different Matters; and tho' natural Strength be sufficient for the former, yet the latter cannot be perform'd by that Superiority alone. For, even according to Mr. Hobbes's own Notion, as one Man hath a Right of compelling others, so those others have a Right of resisting him. But now Obligation cannot stand with a Right of resisting; because it presupposeth such Reasons as inwardly affecting Mens Consciences, make them conclude, by the Judgment of their own Mind, that they cannot honestly, and therefore rightly resist. And though it be irrational, to contend violently against a superior Strength, and by that means to draw upon ourselves³ greater Mischiefs; yet there remains in us a Right of trying all Ways, either to drive off the Force, by the dexterous Application of other Force, or to elude it by Subterfuge and Escape: But neither can this Right consist with that Obligation which is precisely so term'd, and which Grotius commonly op-poseth to *Extrinsical*³. So that, on the whole Matter, by bare Force, not the Right of Resistance, but only the Exercise of it, is extinguish'd. We may explain the Point by the Case of Brutes, with which we Men live in a lawless State: Now those of them which we can master by our Strength, we lay hold on, and employ in our Service; but if any of them escape our Power, we are not apt to complain of any Injury receiv'd from them. Nor can it be here replied, that Brutes are not capable of Obligation; and that therefore they cannot be ried and engag'd any other Way, than by Strength: For Mr. Hobbes himself acknowledgeth, That a Captive in War, although capable of Obligation, yet is under none, whilst he is restrain'd only by natural Bonds, and before the Interposition of any Faith, or Compact; and that therefore, such an one may give his Conqueror the slip, or may assault him violently; so soon as he finds Opportunity. Seneca de Ira. Lib. ii. Ch. xi. Nature hath so order'd Things, that he whose Greatness depends on the Fear of others, is not without Fear himself. Were we dispos'd to be tedious, we might farther shew, that this Maxim of Mr. Hobbes is meer Absurdity and Nonsense, if applied to GOD Almighty. For how can Nature be said to have granted any thing to GOD: Since Nature is either GOD himself, or, at least, the Work of GOD? For these Reasons therefore, and because it seems unworthy of the Divine Goodness, we conclude, that the Right of Commanding, or the Sovereignty of GOD, as it denotes the Virtue of imprinting Obligations on Mens Minds, is not to be deriv'd from the bare Consideration of his Omnipotence.

Neither do those Arguments, brought by Mr. Hobbes from Scripture, prove the Truth of his Position. When GOD seems to have Recourse to his Absolute Power, about the Calamities sent on Job, we cannot hence infer, that he hath no Right over his Creatures, but what ariseth from that Power only. Job himself, at the beginning of his Sufferings, made a true Declaration, by what Right GOD had deprived him of his Goods, and of his Children: The Lord gave (says he) and the Lord hath taken away: That is, why may not he recall at his Pleasure, those Things which he gave upon the same free Account? But when his Grief had so far prevail'd on his Reason, as to make him enter into Expostulation with Heaven, then GOD, to repress the Insolence of the Complaint, alledg'd his Power, since the Sufferer had now neglected to consider the other Reasons of the Divine Sovereignty and Command. And thus we commonly deal with obstinate and refractory Subjects; when they refuse to hear our Reasons, we shew them our Strength, to make them understand not only their Sin, but their Folly too in opposing our Dominion. In the same Manner, if a Person complains of the Misfortunes of good Men, and the Prosperity of the ³ But this external Obligation imposeth also, according to Grotius, a Necessity of not resisting. All the Difference is this, That the internal Obligation has respect to Right, properly so call'd, by Virtue of which we act according to Reason, and agreeable to the Light of Conscience, whereas an external Right, which produces an external Obligation, imports no more than Impunity to him that uses this Right, and hinders not but that he may do Evil in the Use of it, altho' in this last Case he can't resist lawfully. Grotius, among other Instances, gives an Example of the ill Treatment which a Prisoner of War receives from a Conqueror, and a Subject from his Prince. See De Jur. Bell. & Pacis Prolegom. §. 41. and Lib. i. Ch. iv. §. 3. and Lib. iii. Ch. vii. §. 6. 7.

Wicked, when he persists deaf to the genuine Causes of that Proceeding, in the last Place, we confound him with Divine Omnipotence: As if we should say, You that fancy your self injur'd, go and try your Strength against GOD for Satisfaction.

Nor is it a better Inference of Mr. Hobbes, when he says, that the Obligation of paying Obedience to GOD is incumbent on Men, upon Account of their Weakness. For this only could make it a piece of Folly in us, not to redeem our selves by obeying, from some greater Evil: But it doth not at all take away our Right of desiring, and of endeavouring, by all Means, to escape the superior Strength which thus oppresseth us. But such a Right is utterly excluded by every true Obligation. Nor is this Consequence good, Of two Omnipotents, neither can oblige the other, therefore Men are oblig'd to GOD, only because they are not Omnipotent; were the Antecedent never so unquestion'd. Not to say, that the Fancy of two Omnipotent Beings is ⁴ an impossible Supposition. Neither did our Saviour intend to assert his Right against Saul by that Argument, It is hard for thee to kick against the Pricks; but rather to reprove the Boldness and Vanity of Saul's Design. Nor was that mighty Convert afterwards invited by Ananias into the Christian Faith, barely by being inform'd how much above his Strength it was, to destroy that Profession. We have applied so much the more Diligence to the confuting of this Opinion, the more Danger we apprehend of its being abus'd by violent and headstrong Men. In Thucydides ⁵ the Athenian Ambassador speaks to this purpose, We follow the common Nature and Genius of Mankind, which appoints those to be Masters who are superior in Strength. This Law is not of our making, nor are we the first who have used it; but we receiv'd it as it came down to us, and we shall leave it to guide the Practice of all Posterity. Dionys. Halicarn. Lib. i. It is a Law of Nature common to all Men, and which no Time shall disannul or destroy, that those who have more Strength and Excellence shall bear Rule over those that have less. ⁶ Brennus (in Plutarch's Camillus) calls it a most ancient Law, that which gives to the Valiant the Possessions of Cowards; derived from GOD himself, and reaching even to brute Creatures; for even amongst these, Nature gives larger Privileges and Portions to the Strong than to the Weak. Livy hath express'd the Notion more concisely, Omnia fortium esse, that the World was made for the Bold and the Strong. Callicles (in Plato's Gorgias) pursues the same Argument: In the first place, he lays down this Supposition, That Nature and Law are many times contrary to each other: He instanceth in the Case of Injury; to receive which is by Nature the most base and vile, ⁷ as the Treatment of a Slave, not of a free Subject; yet to do an Injury is much worse in the Construction of the Law. He observes it to have been the Policy of Law-givers to encourage this latter Notion; so to order the useful Engines of Praise and Dispraise, as to hinder others from growing too powerful for them; well knowing, that they were otherwise ⁸ an unequal Match for the Multitude. ⁹ Now Nature herself (says he) as I imagine, shows it to be just and right, that the Good and the Strong should have, in every thing, a larger Share than the Bad and the Weak. And therefore, whereas Xerxes and Darius had both made use of this Pretence, the former against the Grecians, the latter against the Scythians; he says they did all this according to the Law of Nature. He complains that the rigid Doctrine of Justice damps and oppresseth the generous Spirits of young Men; or that, on the contrary, when any one breaks thro' those formal Restraints, he seems to shake off his Rust, and to shine in all the Splendor of natural Right. On this Principle, he says, Hercules drove off Geryon's Oxen, who neither sold nor gave them him; the Hero having a natural Right to the Oxen, and all the other Goods and Possessions of inferior puny Mortals. And this is indeed the Maxim which the great Bullies of Mankind would have prevail in the World: Hoc Ithacus velit, & magno mercetur Atride. Plutarch's Opinion is much more moderate, and might be admitted with less Exception, ¹⁰ It is the first and principal Law of Nature (says he) that he whose Circumstances require Protection and Deliverance, should admit him for his Ruler who is able to rescue and defend him.

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

⁴ See how Mr. Locke proves this, in one of his Letters written in French, because it was to be shewed to a Person of Quality, who did not understand Latin. Two Omnipotent Beings are altogether inconsistent, because we must necessarily suppose, that the one must always will what the other does; and in this Case, he, whose Will is necessarily determined by the other, consequently has not that Perfection; for 'tis better to be free, than to be subject to the Determination of another's Will. But if they are not both reduced to the Necessity of willing the same Thing always, then the one may desire to have that done which the other would not; in which Case the Will of the one must prevail over the Will of the other, and so he, of the Two, whose Power can't bring about what he would, can't be Omnipotent, because he can't do so much as the other. So that there can't be two Omnipotent Beings, and consequently not two Gods, p. 413. See also Mr. Clerc's Ontology, Sect. iii. Ch. x. §. 3.

⁸ It appears plainly by this Place, as it is printed in all the Editions of the Original, that this Writer did not consult the Greek Authors, which he quotes, nor, thro' Inadvertence, did he sometimes thoroughly understand the Latin Translation. Callicles in Plato says, οἱ τίμεινοι τῶ νόμου, οἱ ἀδυνεῖς ἀνθρώποι εἰσι καὶ οἱ πολλοί. Words both very clear and coherent with the former Discourse; but Marsilius Ficinus having translated them in an ambiguous Manner, unless one considers them thoroughly, thus, Qui leges condunt, imbecilliores sunt ac multitudo ipsa est; Mr. Pufendorf thought that he had said, Law-givers are weaker than the People, as if the Latin had been, Imbecilliores multitudine ipsa, or in the Greek, ἀδυνεστεροι ἢ πολλῶν, whereas the Sense of Callicles is, That the Laws were first established by the People, who thought themselves not strong enough to defend themselves against the Insults of others, and chiefly by those People, which supposed the Great ones to oppress them, and so I have render'd it, tho' the English Translator did not mind it.

XI. Others there are who derive the Origin of Sovereignty, or of the Power of imposing Obligations on another, from Eminency or superior Excellency of Nature, which they pretend is of itself sufficient for that great Purpose. They draw a main Argument from the Nature of Man, in whose Mind, as in the most excellent Part, is seated the $\tau\omicron\ \eta\gamma\epsilon\mu\omicron\nu\eta\theta\epsilon\nu$, the Directive Power. To illustrate which, they alledge the Authority of Cicero¹, when he commends the Latin Phrase exire de potestate, as applied to those, who are carried away from rational Acting, by the Fury of their Passions and Lusts; such Men being truly gone out of the Power or Command of their Minds. ² Aristotle likewise is brought in to strengthen their Party, because he hath somewhere declared, that if a Man can be found excelling in all Virtues, such an one hath a fair Title to be King. Thus the most superlative Pre-eminence of GOD, would, they say, deserve Veneration, though he had never created the World. Farther, to this Pre-eminence of Nature they add Non-accountableness; and affirm, That for this Reason only, if a Man useth brute Creatures (whom he so far excels) any otherwise than with Decency and Moderation, he may do it fairly and securely, and they have no Right to complain of their hard Treatments: Because when one contends with another about Matters of Right, he doth, as it were, compare himself with him, and is willing that both should be judg'd by the same Law; but this cannot be admitted in two Natures so vastly different, that one may be said to have been made for the sake of the other. And therefore they pretend, that GOD declar'd Mens Right over Brutes, purely on Account of their superior Nature. Whence, they tell us, if a Man, for abusing his Cattle happen to be punish'd by the Magistrate, this is not done in Favour of the Beasts, but for the sake of the other Subjects, whose Interest it frequently is, that every one should use well what he possesseth. On the same Score, they say, the Body ought not to complain, though it should, by the Command of the Soul, be watted and worn out in Labours; since it is in so high a Degree surpass'd by that Nobler Part.

But, to deliver our own Judgment, we cannot yet be persuaded, that from a bare Transcendency of Nature, can spring a Right of imposing Obligation on others, who have in themselves a Power of being their own Governors and Directors. For neither doth a superior Nature always imply a Fitness to Rule an Inferior; nor do the different Degrees of Perfection, in natural Substances, immediately denote a Subordination, and a Dependence of one upon the other. But rather, since the Person who is to receive the Obligation, hath in himself a Principle of guiding his own Actions, which he may judge sufficient for his turn; there appears no Reason why he should stand presently convicted in his own Conscience, if he acts rather by his own Pleasure, than at the Will of another, who in Nature excels him. And therefore tho' that Notion of the Epicureans was most senseless and impious, in which they describ'd the Gods, as enjoying their own Happiness with the highest Peace and Tranquillity, far remov'd from the troublesome Care of human Business; and neither smiling at the good, nor frowning at the wicked Deeds of Men; yet they rightly enough inferr'd, that upon this Supposition, all Religion, and all Fear of Divine Powers, was vain and useless. For who will worship another, that is neither willing to assist, nor able to injure him? ³ The Contemplation of so noble a Being as this, may indeed excite Wonder in us, but it can never produce Obligation. Besides, we Christians confess, that there are created Spirits endued with a Nature far surpassing our own; and yet we acknowledge no Sovereignty that they bear over us, immediately on their own Account. *Apocalyps. xxii. 9. Mar. Antonin. Lib. vi. Ch. xlv. If the Gods do not at all regard or order human Affairs (which yet it is the highest Impiety to imagine) to what Purpose are our Sacrifices, our Supplications, and our Oaths, and our other Acts of Worship, by which we suppose the Divine Powers to be ever present and conversant amongst us? Cicero de Natur. Deor. Lib. i. Ch. ii. There have been Men in the World, who thought the Gods not in the least concern'd about human Affairs. Were this Opinion admitted for true, there could be no such Thing as Piety, Holiness, or Religion amongst Men: For to pay these Regards to the Divine Nature, is most agreeable to Goodness, and to Purity, provided they take Notice of our Actions, and are the Authors of any Benefits and Advantages in our Lives. But if the Gods are neither able nor willing to help us, nor at all bestow their Care and Observation on our Proceedings, and so derive no Blessings, no Favours upon Mankind, to what End is our Worship, our Honours, and our Prayers, the Tribute which we now pay to the Immortal Beings? As no Virtue can subsist in Hypocrisy and Shew, so especially Piety would be soon lost in that Disguise; and then farewell to all Holiness, and all Religion; which being once banish'd the World, what could follow but the Misery of utter Disorder, of universal Confusion? And again, What Piety can you owe to him from whom you have receiv'd no Benefit? Or how can he claim any Thing as his Due, who hath no Merit to plead in his Behalf? Idem de Nat. Deor. Lib. ii. The common Title which our Ancestors gave Jupiter was, Optimus Maximus, most eminent in Goodness and in Greatness. In which we find Goodness or Beneficence prefer'd to Greatness; it being a more noble, and more excellent, as well as the most acceptable*

¹ Tully's Words are, Itaque nihil melius, quam quod est in consuetudine sermonis Latini, cum exisse ex potestate dicimus eos, qui effrenati feruntur, aut libidine, aut iracundia, Tusc. quaest. Lib. iii. Ch. v. To which Words it may be convenient to add another Passage of Cicero's, which will shew that the former is very well apply'd, Qui igitur exisse ex potestate dicuntur, ideo dicuntur, quia non sunt in potestate mentis, cui regnum totius animi a natura tributum est. They therefore who are said to go beyond their Power, are so term'd, because they are not under the Command of the Understanding, to which Nature has given the supreme Government of the Soul.

What Vows would to regardless Powers be paid?
They lose their Altars, if we lose their Aid.

The Instance about Brutes is nothing to the purpose; for they are not held by Obligation, but only by Force, or by the Enticement of Food: Neither would they act contrary to their Natures, should they endeavour to throw off the Yoke and the Authority of Men. As to the Argument about the Soul, when that is said to bear a Sovereignty over the Body, the Speech is figurative: For Sovereignty, or Command, is not properly understood but between two Persons, or two compleat Natures; and the Body is subject to the Soul, by Virtue of the physical Combination, not of any moral Tie. Lastly, the Citation from Aristotle, if a King were to be constituted by free Election, the Crown ought to be given to the most deserving Person⁴; yet would he bear the Sovereignty by a Right deriv'd purely from his superior Gifts and Excellencies, but by Virtue of the Donation made him by the Consent of the Electors.

XII. It must be acknowledg'd therefore as a certain Truth, That neither Strength, nor any other natural Pre-eminence, is alone sufficient to derive an Obligation on me from another's Will; but that it is farther requisite, I should either have receiv'd some extraordinary Good from him, or should voluntarily have agreed to submit myself to his Direction. Plin. Paneg. Chap. xxxviii. Nature doth not ordain amongst Men as she doth amongst Beasts, that the Power and the Sovereignty shall pass to the strongest. For, as we naturally yield and give up ourselves to some singular Benefactor,² so if it appears that this Benefactor both intends my Good, and can consult it better than I myself am able, and, farther, doth actually claim the Guidance of me, I have no Reason in the World to decline his Government and Sway. Especially if it so happen, that I am beholden to him for my very Being, Acts xvii. 24, &c. For he who first conferr'd on Man the Benefit of free acting, why may not he, by his own Right, retrench that Freedom in some Particulars? And then, as for the other Case, he that consents to admit another for his Sovereign, declares, by this his own proper Act, that he will conform to his Sovereign's Pleasure. Though indeed to make a lawful Sovereignty arise from Consent, it is farther necessary, that by this new Subjection no Prejudice be offer'd to the well-grounded Right of a third Person, and that the one Party may justly have such Subjects, and the other Party as justly such a Governor. From these two Springs we conceive all those Obligations to flow, which do, as it were, cast an inward Tie and Restraint upon the Liberty of our Wills. But because 'tis beyond the Power of any moral Bonds, utterly to suppress our natural Freedom of acting; and because such is either the Lightness, or the Wickedness of most Mens Minds, that they despise these Grounds of Dominion, as feeble Reasons for Obedience; hence there ariseth a Necessity of adding some further Motive, which may work on our disorderly Lusts with a stronger Effect than the bare Sense of Decency and Honour. And this Addition is the more requisite, in as much as, generally speaking, the Wickedness of one Man tends to the Damage of another: Whereas we should be more willing to leave a Man to his own Guidance, provided his Sins would incommode no Body but himself. Now there is nothing which could have such an Effect as this, but the Fear of some Evil to be inflicted upon our violating an Obligation, by some stronger Power, whose Interest it was, that we should not have thus offended. So that Obligations receive their final Strength and Authority from Force, and from a Supposition that he, whose Business it is to see them observ'd, is furnish'd with so much Power, either originally inherent in himself, or conferr'd upon him by others, as to be able to bring some considerable Evil on the Disobedient. For amongst wicked Subjects, he must needs be a very precarious Ruler, whom they can despise without Danger. On the contrary, his Dominion is settled on a firm Bottom, who, in the first Place, bears a just Title to it, and, besides this, hath so much Force always at his Command, as is sufficient to reduce the Seditious, and to restrain the Transgressors.³ Sophocl. Ajac. Flagellif. ver. 1092.

³ This and the following Reasons serve rather to make an Obligation stronger and more reasonable, than to establish it upon a sure and proper Foundation; for, in my Judgment, there is properly but one general Foundation of an Obligation, to which all others may be reduced, and that is, our natural Dependence upon the supream Authority of GOD, who has given us a Being, and being Almighty, can punish those that disobey him; and, on the contrary, reward those that obey him. From hence ariseth all lawful Authority, upon the Account of which one Man commandeth another; for that is lawful only, when it is conformable to the Will of GOD, known to us, either by Revelation, or the mere Light of Nature. But if amongst Men, the immediate Reason why they ought to be subject to the Command of another is ordinarily this, That they have voluntarily consented to it, that Consent, and all other Engagements whatsoever, which they enter into, being obligatory upon the Account only of that Maxim of natural Right, which tells us, That every one ought to observe what he has engaged himself to. MR. BARB. NOTES.

⁵ Plutarch's Words are, Ἀλλὰ πάλιν ἂν μοι δοκῆι μᾶλλον ἐδάφους χάρις, ἢ πολιτεία, τὸ πᾶσι θεῶν δόξης ἀνεπιθέσις παντάπασι, σὺστασιν λαδῶν, ἢ λαδῶσα τῶν σῶσι. But our Author treats more largely elsewhere, of the Use of Religion in the Life of Man, and shews us, how it is the principal and most strong Bond of Society. In the independent State of Nature, if there were no Fear of a Deity, so far as every one found himself able to oppress another with Impunity, they would attempt any Thing as they pleas'd: Honesty, Modesty, and Fidelity would be esteem'd meer Chimera's and empty Names; no Man would take himself oblig'd to do any Good but upon the Account of his own Impotency. Further, without Religion no civil Society can be maintained; the Fears of temporal Punishments, the most solemn Oaths and Engagements to be faithful Subjects, the Reputation of keeping our Engagements inviolably, and the Knowledge of the Cares of our Kings and Governors, to secure us from the Inconveniencies of our natural State, are not of themselves sufficient to keep Subjects to their Duty: for Death being the only Thing in the World which is most feared by them who believe no GOD, we can't but acknowledge the Truth of that Maxim, He that knows to die, knows not to be forced. He that has Resolution enough to die bravely, is capable of attempting any Thing against his Sovereign, and he can't want some specious Motives or Pretences to entertain such a Design: as for Example, The Desire he hath to avoid the Evils which he apprehends from the present Government, an Endeavour to procure himself the Supream Power, but above all, the Justice, which he may fancy himself to do by such an Attempt, either because his King may seem to him not to discharge his Duty, or because he flatters himself, that if he were in his Place he could do much better. Such Pretences as these readily present themselves, when Men have a Mind to put such Projects in Execution, and they may effect their Designs, if the Prince neglects in the least to secure himself against the Attempts of Assassins (in such Cases, who can answer for his Guards themselves?) or several Persons conspire together against him, or in a foreign War, his Subjects revolt to the Enemy. Besides, Subjects themselves would do many Injuries one to another; for as in Civil Judicatures Sentence must be given according to the Acts and Proofs that are evident, all the Crimes, from which some Profit may be acquir'd, may pass for good Management, which every Man applauds himself for, as often as he is so lucky as to commit them without Witnesses. No Man would exercise any Acts of Charity, or do any friendly Offices, were it not for the certain Hope of some Glory or Advantage, which would redound to him by it. If the Sense of all Chastisement from Heaven were banished, no Man could depend upon another's Fidelity, every one would live in perpetual Disquiet, thro' Fear and Suspicion of some Deceit, or base Usage from their Equals. Nor would Sovereigns themselves be better dispos'd than their Subjects to good Actions. For having no Principle of Conscience to keep them in, they'd sell all Offices, yea, Justice itself; they'd aim at nothing but their own Interest, to which they'd sacrifice the Happiness of their Subjects. And if they apprehended their Subjects to revolt, they'd endeavour to weaken them as much as possible, as the only Way to maintain their Authority against Attempts of the Oppressors. The Subjects, on the other Side, for Fear of Oppression, would seek all Occasions to shake off the Yoke, and in the mean Time live in Distrust one of another. The Husband and Wife, at the Disagreement that happens between them, would lay hold on the Sword or Poison to destroy each other, and live in Fear of their Children, Servants, and the rest of their Family. For since without Religion there is no Conscience, it will be hard to discover these sort of Crimes, which are usually committed in secret, and are seldom discovered, but by such Means as arise from a guilty Conscience. The Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. iv. §. 9. Thus our Author explains this Point, and Experience verifies his Assertion. We may add to this, two Examples, which the excellent Author of Parrhasiana makes use of to prove the same Thing. The History of China (says he) tells us, that the great Men among the Chinese believe neither the Being of a GOD, who governs all Things, nor the Immortality of the Soul, and so we say that the Virtue of the Chinese consists in nothing but a profound Disimulation of their Vices. Mem. de La Chine Tom. i. Lib. v. and Tom. ii. Lib. i. Among the Jews, the Sadducees who denied the Immortality of the Soul, tho' they believed a GOD, and tho' they rejected a Providence, made it appear by their Conversation, that they could not be of that Opinion, but they must be Enemies to Society. For Josephus says of them, De Bel.

They, therefore, who would prescribe Laws to others with any Effect and Validity, must build their Power on the Foundations which we have here established.

XIII. But that a Law may be able to exercise its directive Force, there is required in the Person for whom 'tis made, a Knowledge both of the Law-giver and of the Law. For how can any Man pay Obedience, who neither apprehends to whom it should be paid, nor to what Duties his Obligation binds him? And here it will be sufficient, that a Man hath once been Master of such a Knowledge: For he that forgets what he once knew, is not at all loos'd from his Obligation, since he might well have secur'd his Remembrance, had he taken up, as he ought to have done, a real Desire and Resolution of obeying. Now to the Knowledge of the Legislator, 'tis hardly possible any Man should be a Stranger. For, as to natural Laws, that they have the same Author with the Universal Frame of Things, none can be ignorant, that will but make Use of their ordinary Reason. Much less can the Author of civil Laws be hid from the Apprehension and Notice of his Subjects: Since he is constituted, either ¹ by the express and open Consent of those Subjects, or else ² by their tacit Agreement, whilst they any way submit to his Command. How we arrive at a Sense of natural Laws by the Contemplation of human Condition, we shall hereafter have occasion to explain. Civil Laws are convey'd to the Subjects Knowledge by a Promulgation, publicly and ³ perspicuously made. In which there are two Conditions which ought to be clear and certain; first, That the Laws proceed from him who hath the chief Command in the State; and, secondly, That the Meaning of the Laws is such, and no other. The former Condition is then known, when the Sovereign promulgates a Law, either by his own Voice, or by Persons of his Deputation. That these Persons publish Laws by the Command and Authority of the Sovereign, there is no Question to be made, if it appear that they have been ⁴ employ'd usually by the Sovereign, in declaring his Will; if the Laws are brought into Use at judicial Proceedings, and if they contain in them nothing derogatory to the Sovereign's Power. For it is not to be suppos'd that a Minister should vent that for a durable Decree of his Prince, which is not so, or that he should impudently usurp so extravagant a Power; since in an Enterprize of this Nature, there could be no hopes of Concealment, or of escaping due Punishment for so insolent an Offence. As to the other necessary Point, that the Sense of a Law may be clearly apprehended, it is incumbent on the Promulgators, to use the greatest Plainness that the Thing is capable of: Contrary to that Management of Caligula, who wrote his Laws in small Letters, and fix'd them in a high Place, in this Manner only shewing them to the People ^a.

If any thing in the Laws seems obscure, the Explication of it is to be sought, either from the Legislator, or from those Persons who are by him appointed to judge according to the Laws. For it is their Business, observing a right Interpretation, to apply the Laws to particular Cases, or upon the Proposal of such or such a Fact, to declare the Sovereign's Pleasure concerning it ^b.

We cannot here but observe, that the Notion maintain'd by some Authors, That the Consent of the People is requisite to make Laws oblige the Subject in Conscience, is neither true in the Laws of Nature, nor in the Civil Laws of monarchical or aristocratical Rulers; nor indeed at all, unless it be understood of implicit Consent; as a Man by agreeing to the Sovereignty of another, is at the same time suppos'd to have agreed to all the future Acts of that Sovereignty. Though it would really be very useful, and contribute much to engaging the Subjects in a voluntary Obedience, if the Laws could be made with their Consent and Approbation; especially such as are to pass into their Lives and Manners. Agreeable to this is Pericles's saying in Xenophon. Apom. Lib. i. P. 418. Ed. Steph. I/bo-cver, either by written or unwritten Commands, enjoins another to do a Thing, without persuading him that he ought to do it, seems to me, not to use Law, but Violence. Comp. *Sanderfon de Oblig. Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XII, XIII.

Jud. Lib. ii. Ch. xii. The Sadducees are rude and inhuman to one another, and as cruel to their own Countrymen the Jews, as to Strangers. In fine, that Religion may produce all the good Effects to Society which naturally result from it, it is necessary that we have right Apprehensions of the Deity; otherwise, if we term to ourselves a Deity too merciful, or such an one as favours our Sins, either by his Example, or any other Way, Religion will be so far from firmly upholding Society, that it will utterly destroy it. So that according to the Principles of the Heathens, every one may reason as he in the Poet does, As miserable a Mortal as I am, shall not I be wiser than the greatest of the gods? Terent. Eunuch. Act. iii. Scen. v. Wherefore we must think that the virtuous Heathens either did not believe what was commonly reported among them, about the Vices of their gods, or were not aware of the Consequences that naturally followed from the Principles of a Religion so monstrous. See what shall be spoken, Ch. iii. Lib. ii. §. 19. Note 2. and Ch. iv. §. 3. Note 4.

¹ This is done either when a Multitude of Men joins together to make up a Civil Society, or when a Society already formed takes an Oath of Fidelity to their Sovereign. We shall treat more at large of this Subject, Lib. vii.

² This hath place always when we enjoy the Protection of a State, and of the Laws established; for we must be suppos'd to consent tacitly to submit ourselves to the Laws, tho' we have not formally engaged to do it, as Plato observes in the Case of the Citizens of Athens, who had Liberty to go whither they would, unless they submitted to the Government of that famous wealth, ὅς δ' ἐν ἡμῶν παραμύνη, ὅρῳ ὃν τρέπον ἡμεῖς [οἱ Νομοὶ] τὰς τε δικὰς διαζόμεν, καὶ τ' ἄλλα τὴν πόλιν διοικέμεν, ἡδὲ φάρμ' ἔστιν ὧ ΜΟΛΟΓΗΚΕΝ Αἱ ἘΡΓΩ ἡμῶν, ἃ ἂν ἡμεῖς κελύμεν ποιῆσθαι ταῦτα. In Criton, and in the next Page, the Greek is, ἐργῶν, ἀλλ' ἔ λόγῳ.

³ In the antient Times, before the Invention of Writing, Laws were compos'd in Verse, which were frequently sung in publick, that Men might remember them, Aristot. Problem. §. 19. Problem. xxviii. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 399.

⁴ This Author, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. ii. §. 6. says, That it is the Business of their Employ; a Circumstance worth our Observation. For we may doubt of the Validity of the Action of any Minister, or Magistrate, which belongs not to his Office, unless it plainly appears that the supream Governor hath given him a Commission extraordinary.

that he understand what is fit to be prescrib'd, and that he have sufficient Strength to denounce and to execute some Evil on those who shall not conform to his Rules (for we suppose the Persons for whom the Laws were made, to have both Power and Inclination to disobey them) So every Law consists of two Parts; in one is defin'd and declar'd what is to be perform'd, or omitted; in the other is signify'd, what Evil shall be incurr'd by those who transgress in either respect; and this latter part is usually term'd the Sanction of a Law; about which Bishop Cumberland ^a hath open'd a wide Field of Enquiry, whilst contrary to the general Opinion of the Lawyers, "He maintains that the Sanction of Laws is made, not only by Punishments, but by Rewards too, and more principally by the latter than by the former. That as to the Sanctions of the Laws of Nature, it is impossible by any natural Signs, more openly and more forcibly to persuade Men to do a Thing ^c, or to judge with good Authority, that such a Duty is commanded by the Governor of the World, than if such Acts are grac'd by him with natural Rewards. That, altho' in the Sanction of Laws by Men, use is made of negative Conceptions, and of Words properly expressing them, yet in the Nature of Things, that which drives us on to Action, is some positive Good, which we hope to preserve, or to acquire upon keeping off those things that would have a contrary Effect. That Privations and Negations do not move the Will of Man, and that the avoiding of Evil is by no means its Object, any farther than as it denotes the Preservation of some Good. That, whatever Strength is usually ascribed to natural Punishments and Evils, in engaging Men to shun and decline them, is all to be resolv'd into the attractive and impulsive Force of those Goods which the Punishments or Evils would deprive them of. That, thus all those Things which are commonly said to be done for the sake of escaping Death or Want, might be more properly affirm'd to proceed from the Love of Life, or of Riches. That, unless Life went before it, Death would signify nothing, and that the former would never be fear'd, if the latter were not first desir'd. That, the Nature of Things moves our Affections more strongly with the Love of a present Good, or the Hope of a future, than with the Hatred of a present, or the Fear of a future Evil; and that good things are desir'd upon account, not of the opposite Privation, but of their inward Agreeableness to our Natures. That, civil Laws receive a

" firmer Establishment from their End ^d, the publick Good, a part of which is communicated to every honest Subject, than from the Penalties they threaten, the Fear of which can prevail only on a few Men, and those the most wicked in the Commonwealth." To this purpose Bishop Cumberland discourseth. On whose Opinion we may first observe, That if we would comprehend under the Term of Sanction, even the good Things and the Rewards following the Observation of Laws; it is requisite, that those good Things should really proceed from our Obedience, and be, as it were, bought and purchas'd by it. But now 'tis apparent, that all the good Things we possess, we do not obtain by conforming to Laws; and therefore those which we any other way acquire, do not come under the Notion of Rewards. Thus, our Selves, our Lives, and all the natural Benefits we enjoy, are not paid to us as the Rewards of fulfilling any Law, but the Divine Goodness freely confer'd them on us, before we could so much as think of any Law to be fulfill'd. Neither is the Continuance of these good Things (since it proceeds from the inward Force of natural Substance) deriv'd from any Performances of ours, but is the Gift of our Great Creator, who ^b makes his Sun to shine on the Evil and on the Good, and sendeth Rain on the Just and on the Unjust. Thus likewise, what a Man gets by his proper Labour and Industry, he doth not directly and principally ascribe to his own Obedience, but to his Creator, who gave him the Strength, and to himself, who rightly employ'd it. Yet this Effect indeed, we may obtain by Laws, both the Preservation of those good Things which either the free Bounty of Heaven, or our own Diligence hath procur'd us, from the Incurfions and Assaults of other Creatures, that might otherwise hurt or destroy them; and likewise the Increase of the same Enjoyments by various Methods and Means: And therefore these Advantages only, in as much as 'tis in the Power of the Legislator to make them good, are properly to be esteem'd Rewards. And that these may have a perfect Force, in disposing Men to Obedience, the Legislator is to signify, that such Effects will most certainly follow such a Cause.

We may observe farther, That altho' the Will may be incited to an Action, by the Proposal of some Good likely to proceed from that Action, yet this Consideration doth not impose any Necessity ^e of Performance, unless it be strengthened with the Commination of some Punishment, to be incurr'd upon Non-compliance. And therefore, that any good Effect proceeds by natural Conse-

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XIV.

¹ These Words, ut quicquam agant, i. e. that they may do any thing, which are omitted in all the Editions of this Work, either by the Neglect of the Author, or carelessness of the Printers, quite spoil the Sense. The English Translator has not taken the Pains to consult the Original, where these Words are expressed distinctly, Ch. v. §. 42. He hath also carelessly copied out a Fault in the Impression, in these Words, aut cum Authoritate judicare, for indicare, i. e. to judge, for to shew his Authority, which makes the Sense disagreeable.

² These Words, Which wise Legislators and good Citizens have propounded with a Desire of, ought to be added to render the Sense of Bishop Cumberland more clear, tho' they be not in the Original.

³ Mr. Locke proves in a most solid Manner, "That it is not the most positive Good, but Uneasiness (as he calls it) that usually determines the Will. That is to say, that Good, nay the greatest Good, tho' we judge it such, does not determine the Will, at least, to desire it with an Earnestness proportionable to its Excellence; yet this Desire makes us uneasy, because we are deprived of it. As for Example, persuade a Man, as long as you please, That Wealth is more advantageous than Poverty; make him to see and confess, that suitable Conveniencies of Life are to be preferred before a fordid Indigency, if yet he be contented with this latter Estate, and finds no Inconveniency in it, he'll persist in it contrary to your Advice, his Will is not inclined to any Action whereby he will renounce it. Essay of hum. Understand. Lib. ii. Ch. xxi. §. 35. See the following Part of the Chapter.

quence from any Action, is indeed a Token of the superlative Bounty of our Creator, who is so willing to confer that Good on us, and so kindly invites and persuades us to embrace it. Yet this must not presently be thought a necessary Argument, that he at the same time commands us, by performing the Action, to acquire such a Good. He might perhaps judge it sufficient to have offer'd us so fair an Occasion of receiving his Munificence. But if some Evil be farther pronounc'd against us upon Omission, then there can remain no doubt, but that the Action is really and directly enjoin'd. To which we may add, that the Minds of Men * are mov'd more forcibly by the Infliction of Evil, than by the Possession of Good. It must be confess'd, that the Acquisition of Good hath very powerful Charms; especially when it is fresh, and join'd with the Deliverance from some present Evil. But the Sense of this Pleasantry wears off in a long course of Possession; and when once that Motion of Mind ceaseth, which either the Absence of the Good, or the fresh En-

* The famous Mr. Bayle maintains the contrary Opinion in his Treatise upon a Comet, saying, That a Man has more Love for Joy, than Hatred to Sorrow; which Paradox he pretends to prove thus; No Man (says he) scruples to put himself into an uneasy and sorrowful Condition, provided it carries a Shew of Mirth and Pleasure--- This appears from the Examples of so many young Maids, who being transported with the Expectations of some present Pleasure, suffer themselves to be led into such Actions, as they are sensible will produce a long Train of Miseries: As also by the Example of great Numbers of Men, who have found a thousand times, that the eating of certain Meats, and their drinking too much, has caused terrible Pains in them, who will not yet refrain their Appetites from them, when they have occasion. But 'tis my Opinion, that these young Maids and Drunkards do not usually think of the bad Tendency of their Actions, so far are they from determining, after they have exactly compar'd the present Pleasure with the Misery that will follow. 'Tis not then a Time of Reflection; we might do it when we are serious, and the Object and Occasion being at a Distance, our favourite Passion is silent; but when the Heart is briskly attacked in a sensible place, all these good Reflections vanish, we dream of nothing but the greatest Satisfaction, and never trouble ourselves with what may happen. The present Pleasure, unless it be very small, and next to nothing, fills the narrow Capacity of our Soul, and so engrosses the whole Mind, that it troubles not itself to think at all of Things absent (as Mr. Locke speaks, Essay of Hum. Underst. p. 326.) The Orator Eschines speaking of those who engage themselves in some great Wickedness, says, That they neither consider of the Disgrace or Punishment, which they bring on themselves, but are wholly employed with the Thoughts of that Pleasure they shall obtain, if they compass their Design; Οὐ γὰρ τὴν ἀρχὴν, ἐδ' ἂν πείσοιται κηφέσις λογίζονται ἀλλ' ἐφ' οἷς καθορθόσασιν; ἐνφρανεύονται, τῆτοις κερήλωται. Orat. in Timarch. p. 197. Ed. Gen. But if, notwithstanding the Earnestness of the Desire which the Presence of the Object excites, there are some Intervals which invite them to consider the Consequence of the Action, they always have a great Inclination to flatter themselves. They think, that tho' the Consequence is important, nevertheless 'tis not so certain, but that it may happen otherwise, or at least that it may be avoided by some means or other; as by Industry, Courtship, change of Behaviour, &c. (Mr. Locke of Hum. Underst. p. 328.) Furthermore, the prevailing Power of present Pleasure, by which they are hurried, is, properly speaking, a real Sorrow, for in the Fit of a violent Passion, the earnest Desire, which is inflamed by the Nearness and Allurements of the Object, causes such an Uneasiness, as affects us in the same Manner, as what we ordinarily call Grief, and the Uneasiness present being greater, determines the Will, as Mr. Locke has very well prov'd, altho' the future Sorrows, to which Men expose themselves by suffering themselves to be carried away by the prevailing Power of present Pleasure, may be seen at a Distance, and as a greater Evil in its own Nature than what they feel themselves actually press'd with, the Delusion caused by a small Difference of Time, inclines the Mind to choose the worst part. Most of our Pleasures (says Montaigne, according to the Opinion of the Heathen Wisdom, viz. Seneca, Ep. li. &c.) tickle and embrace us, to strangle us, as the Thieves which the Egyptians call Philetas, did; and if the Head-ach seize us before Drunkenness, we abstain from overmuch drinking, but the Pleasure going before deceives us, and so conceals the Consequence from us. See the same Thought in two Comic Poets quoted by Athenæus in his Deipnosophists, Lib. i. & xv. whose Words Gataker recites in his Preface to Marcus Antoninus. If at the same Moment (says Mr. Locke) that a Man takes the Glass into his Hand, the Pleasure that he finds in drinking were accompanied with that Pain in the head, and Qualms of Stomach which never fail to seize some Men some few Hours after they have drunk to Excess, I do not believe that any Man would, upon these Conditions, put the Cup to his Lips, whatever Pleasure he might have by drinking. So that in the Examples alledged by Mr. Bayle, and in other like Cases, none can propound to himself to undergo any Uneasiness or Sorrow, provided it passes with us for Pleasure, but he aims to free himself from some Uneasiness, or Grief that lies upon him, which his Passion, or erroneous Judgment, hinders him from comparing fully with the Decree or Certainty of Sorrow at a Distance. The other Reason of Mr. Bayle is, That Men stick not to pass thro' many Sorrows and Uneasinesses, provided at length they can arrive at Pleasure. The Corsairs (says he) having received an Affront, will hide themselves five Days together in the Bushes to wait for their Enemy, being well contented to feed on the Roots of Grass all that while, on Condition, that they may have the Satisfaction of seeing their Ambush successful. But we may rather say, that the Uneasiness or Grief which these Men have conceived at the Affront given them by their Enemy, who has provoked, and the eager Desire of Revenge with which they are possessed, renders them insensible of those lesser Disturbances which are caused by the Coldness of the Weather, or an hungry Appetite. We can observe very few Men, who will willingly undergo any great Pain or Trouble, to arrive at the Enjoyment of those Pleasures of which they are most sensible, but when indeed only some small Inconvenience, or little Uneasiness, which they think can hardly be born, attends, there needs no great Resolution to open a way to the Possession of that Object which has made so great Impressions upon our Heart. But the Prospect of some great Evil abates the Eagerness of the strongest Passions, and fills pliable Minds with such a Fear, as keeps them from swallowing the Baits of Pleasure: But if sometimes to satisfy these Desires, Men run themselves carelessly into great Troubles and sharp Sorrow, we must think, that as soon as they are sensible of what they have done, they'll immediately repent of their Rashness and Imprudence; the Pleasures, whose sweet Morfels have drawn us away, will then appear to have been bought too dear, and we shall renounce, with all our Hearts, the Hopes of all we once accounted Delightful, to be delivered from the Evil we endure; a Proof sufficient that we have not well consulted our own Good, or that the Violence of our Passions so blinded us, that we did not perceive all the Bitterness of the Sorrow, into which we have so blindly thrown our selves. To come then to the Subject our Author is on, Suppose that two Law-givers, willing to settle the same Law, shall propound, the one great Rewards to such as observe it, and the other severe Punishments to such as break it: Do we think that the first would more effectually engage Men to Obedience, than the other? No Body, I believe, will venture upon the affirmative; for there may be many Men who will not much regard the greatest Rewards that can be given, and being contented with their present Condition, aspire not to any higher Degree of Happiness: But how few are there who will not be affrighted at the Prospect of a great Punishment, tho' they do not attentively consider it? For one Man who will yield to a Temptation in spite of such Threatenings, we shall find a thousand who will not in the least be affected with the Hopes of the greatest Rewards; especially, if to deserve them, they must offer Force to any strong Inclination, I shall add one more Remark, which is this, If a Man were more sensible of Good than Evil, those Sins into which Men fall for fear of Trouble, ought to be punish'd with greater Severity, than those which are drawn into the Love of Pleasure. Now this Consequence which naturally flows from the Principle of Mr. Bayle, is contrary to the Judgment of all the wisest Legislators and most able Philosophers, as well as the constant Practice of all the Judicatures of the most civiliz'd Nations; and I am apt to think, that Mr. Bayle himself would not approve of a more gentle Treatment towards that young Maid who (as he instances) suffered herself to be carried away with the Prevalency of a present Pleasure, than of her who yields to the Threatenings of a furious Spark. See Chap. iv. §. 7. Notes there, and what the Author farther says, Lib. viii. Chap. iii. §. 19. as also Grotius, Lib. ii. Ch. xx. §. 29. N. ii. with the Notes. I am aware also that in the same Book in which this Maxim, which has occasion'd this large Note, is contained, these Words, which will confirm my last Reflection, are found, I much doubt (says Mr. Bayle) whether the Prevalency of that Pleasure which hurrieth us, will be able to diminish the Crime, p. 341.

joyment of it rais'd, there remains scarce any thing but a dull Acquiescence and Contentment. Whence it comes to pass that many Persons, then only begin to value their good Things, when they either have lost, or are in danger of losing them. But Grief, into which all Evils and all Privations of Good are at last resolv'd, is not itself a bare Privation, but a Thing of a most positive Nature, and of such prodigious Strength, as to be able so far to extinguish all Sense and Value of Happiness, as sometimes to make us desire so severe a Remedy as Death, for its Cure.

Hence, we think, civil Legislators have sufficient Grounds and Reasons for choosing to make the Sanction of their Laws consist rather in Punishments than in Rewards. The Observance of human Laws is indeed advantageous enough in general, as it secures the Possession and Enjoyment of those Blessings which attend a civil Life: But were the Exercise of common Virtues enforc'd by the Proposal of particular Rewards, 'twere impossible to furnish Stock enough for so profuse a Bounty. On the other hand, the denouncing of Punishments was the surest way to make Men shake off that heavy Drowsiness, with which most of them are befotted and benumm'd: And because generally the Transgression of the Laws is join'd with the Hurt of others, and with some imaginary Good of the Offender, therefore it seem'd most expedient to repress the enticing Allurements of Sin, by representing the frightful Image of that Pain and Grief which was unavoidable to follow it. Thus we find that civil Laws do always come enforc'd with a Penalty denounc'd against Transgressors, either expressly defining the kind of Muilt or Punishment; or else intimating, that it is left undetermin'd to be settled by the Discretion of the Judges, and of those who are to take care of putting the Laws in Execution. Indeed the Roman Lawyers tell us of some Laws, which were imperfect, viz. such as have no Punishment enacted for Offenders, as Macrobius speaks⁷, or which wanted this penal Sanction. Such a one they reckon the *Lex Cincia*⁸, which had no other Clause added at the End to enforce it,⁹ but this, He that doth otherwise, shall be accounted to have done wickedly. But I should conjecture, that in that Law either the Infamy alone was thought a sufficient Punishment, or it was left to the Power of the Censors to fix some further Mark of Disgrace on the Delinquents in this Point. That such Persons were not altogether unpunish'd, we may fairly conclude from *Tacitus*¹⁰. Cicero de Legibus, Lib. ii. Ch. ix. ¹¹ The Punishment of Perjury is from Men Disgrace, and from Heaven Destruction. Livy, Lib. x. Ch. ix. gives us an Instance of another Law seemingly imperfect. ¹² The Valerian Law, says he, when it had forbidden the scourging, or the beheading of a Man, who should make an Appeal, only added, that whoever acted thus, acted wickedly. This I suppose (so great was the Modesty of Men in those Days) might be thought a sufficient Tie for a Law: But in our Times such a Simplicity of Expression would be us'd in no Threats, but those which were design'd for Jest. In the same Rank we may place the Law of ¹³ Zalenchus mention'd by Diodorus Siculus, Lib. xii. Ch. xx. Let no Citizen prosecute his Enemy with implacable Hatred, but let him so maintain Enmity with him, as if he were shortly to return into Favour and Friendship. He that doth otherwise, let him be reputed a Man of a fierce and barbarous Disposition. Unless you'll say, that in this Case, as well as the former, the Infamy may well be interpreted as a Punishment. And so likewise in those other Laws recited immediately after by the same Author, Lib. xii. Ch. xxi. Let not a free Woman, unless she be drunk, go attended with above one Maid. Let her not stir out of the City in the Night-time, unless when she goes to prostitute herself to her Gallant. Let her not wear golden Ornaments, nor Garments interwoven with Gold, unless she designs to act the Courtesan.

⁹ The Latin is this: Qui secus fecerit, improbe scisse videbitur. It is not known whence our Author took these Words; But these sort of Laws do not make void what was done against their Prohibition. Imperfecta Lex est, veluti Cincia, que supra certum modum donari prohibet, exceptis quibusdam cognatis, & si plus donatum sit, non rescindit, i. e. Cincius's Law is an imperfect one; because, tho' it forbids all immoderate Fees and Gifts, unless to some Kindred, yet if more be given, it makes them not void. *Ulp. ¹² The Latin is, Valeria Lex, quum cum qui provocasset, virgis cedi, securique necari vetuisset, si quis adversus ea fecisset, nihil ultra, quam improbe factum, adjicit. Id (qui tum pudor hominum erat) visum, credo, vinculum satis validum Legis. Nunc vix serio ita minetur quisquam. But here, by the Bye, we may observe, that the last Words of this Passage are much varied in the Manuscripts, where they are greatly corrupted. Gronovius the Father faintly conjectures, that they should be read thus, Nunc vix si summas penas minetur quisquam; and he builds it upon two of the best Manuscripts, which read thus, Nunc vix si summo serio minetur, &c. Others add, Ita, ad servata, which being joined with the former Readings, and keeping to the Sense, we may gather the true Reading to be, Nunc vix si summos cruciatus minetur quisquam, i. e. Men at this Day can hardly be kept to their Duty by the plainest Denunciation of the most severe Punishments.

¹³ Diodorus Siculus's Greek, is, Προσάτιον μηδένα τῶν πολλῶν ἐχθρῶν ἀκατάμακτον ἔχειν, ἀλλ' ἔστω τὴν ἐχθρῶν ἀναλαμβάνων, ὡς ἦεντο πάλιν εἰς συζυγίαν ἢ φιλίαν τὸν δὲ παρ' αὐτὰ πάντα, διαλαμβάνων παρα τοῖς πολιταῖς ἀμύεσσι ἢ ἀγροῖσι τῆν ψυχῶν— Γυναικὶ ἐλευθέρᾳ μὴ πλείον ἀκολοθεῖν μῆος τετραπέμω, ἢ μὴ μισθῶ, μηδὲ ἐξέναι νεκτὸς ἐν τῷ πόλει, εἰ μὴ μοιχορρομῶν. μηδὲ περιτίθεσθαι χρυσία, μηδὲ ἐδωῆτα περιφασμένω, ἢ μὴ ἑταίρειον μηδὲ τὸν ἀνδρα φορεῖν δακτυλίον ὑπόχρησον, μηδὲ ἡματιον ἰσομιλησιον, ἢ μὴ ἑταιρευαται, ἢ μοιχευῆται διδ ἢ βελδῶς ταῖς τῶν προσήμων ἀρχαῖς ὑπεχαιρέσειον ἀπέσθῆψε τῶν θελοῦσῶν τρυφῆς ἢ ἀκολοσῶς τῶν ἐπιτηδουμάτων, ἐδῶς ἢ ἐδωλετο τὴν ἀρχαῖον κέλευσιν ὁμολογῶσῶς, καταγέλασθῶ ἐν τοῖς πολιταῖς εἶναι. See Montagne's Essays, Lib. i. Chap. lxiii. Digest. Lib. xl. Tit. 7. De Religiosis, & Sumptib. Funer. C. C. Leg. xiv. §. 14. & Lib. xlvii. Tit. 12. De Sepulchr. viol. Leg. iii. §. 4.

Let not a Man wear a Ring allied to Gold, or a Garment approaching near to Milesian Richness, unless he be guilty of Fornication, or of Adultery. Thus (as the Historian proceeds to observe) by such scandalous Exceptions and Conditions, he easily diverted his Subjects from the Pursuit of Luxury and of Intemperance. For no one could bear the exposing himself to his Fellows by so foul a Disgrace ^a.

Thus then, there are two Parts of a Law, one Definitive, and the other Vindicative, which is the penal Sanction. These, we say, are two Parts of the same Law, and not two Species of Laws. For as it is lost Labour to say, Do this, if nothing follow besides; so it is absurd to say, You shall undergo a Penalty, unless it have been before signified by what Means we shall render ourselves obnoxious to this Suffering. We must therefore take Notice, that the whole Strength and Force of a Law properly consists in declaring what our Superior is pleas'd we should perform or omit, and what Penalty we shall incur upon Default. Whence also it may be understood in what Sense the Power of obliging is attributed to the Law. For, properly speaking, the Power of obliging, or laying an inward Necessity on Persons to act in such a Manner, is in him who bears the sovereign Command. But the Law is only the Instrument of Sovereignty, by which the Ruler makes his Pleasure known to his Subject, which being once discover'd, an Obligation to Obedience is produc'd in them by Virtue of his supreme Authority. Hence too it appears, that the vulgar Distinction of the Power of a Law, into directive and compulsive, was ill made; unless by the compulsive Power we understand the penal Clause. For the proper Efficacy of a Law consists in directing, as it declares the Will of the Sovereign, and denounceth Threats against the Subject, if he prove disobedient. But the compulsive Power, or the Power of exacting from the Subject a Conformity to the Rule ¹⁴ prescribed them by decreeing and actually inflicting Penalties, is properly in the Person of him who made the Laws, or of him who hath the Care of their Execution. Liban. Orat. V. Laws were of no Force without Judges to put them in Execution. Bare Statutes have neither Ears to hear our Cause, nor Feet, nor Hands, to hasten to us and defend us: But all the Assistance which Justice gives us, is convey'd by its Ministers. Tho' 'tis a common Thing with Writers to attribute to the Laws themselves such Effects, as in a strict Sense belong to the supreme Power. Of which kind of Speech, that one Passage of Apuleius ^b may be a sufficient Instance, Quod est lex in urbe, dux in exercitu, hoc est in mundo Deus. What the Law is in a City, what the General is in the Army ¹⁵, such is GOD in the World. When Livy says ¹⁷, The Commands of the Laws are more powerful than those of Men; this is so far true in Democracies only, that the Magistrates cannot recede from the Laws, nor over-rule their Force.

Legislators, as such, are said to compel, only morally; not that by any natural Violence they so constrain a Man, as to render it impossible for him to act otherwise than as they direct; but because, by declaring and exhibiting a Penalty against Offenders, they bring it to pass that no Man can easily choose to transgress the Law; since, by reason of the impending Penalty, Compliance is in a high Degree preferable to Disobedience.

XV. Now by attributing thus to Laws the Power of obliging, we immediately exclude Permissions from the Number of true and proper Laws: Tho' Modestinus ^c tells us, the ¹ Virtues of Law are to command, to forbid, to permit, to punish. For ² Permission is not properly an Action of the Law,

² This is not always true, for every one knows, that Laws sometimes positively grant certain particular Privileges and Rights: If we carefully reflect upon the Nature of moral Things, we shall find that the general Notion of a Law, as it implies a Constitution by which a Superior orders the Actions of such as are subject to him, includes not only an Obligation to do or not do certain Things, but also a Liberty to do or not do others. So that Liberty imports always a Concession, either express or tacit, which is a positive Thing. And indeed on what are all the Rights we have founded, but upon the positive Will of our Superior, by Virtue of which we may defend ourselves, or require the Protection of the Law against all them who endeavour to molest us in the Enjoyment of some lawful Right? Farther, Right and Obligation are two relative Notions, which always go Hand in Hand. And why may we not allow a Law of meer Permission, as well as a Law obligatory? Certainly, if this Law be necessary to impose upon us a Necessity of acting, or not acting, the other is no less necessary to put us in a State of acting or not acting with Security and Impunity, as we think fit. Grotius, who, like this Author, affirms, that Obligation is the Essence of all Law, seems tacitly to acknowledge in the same Chapter (Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 17.) that Permission is comprehended in the Notion of a Law. We must therefore allow, That the Law of meer Permission is an Ordinance or Constitution by which a Superior gives to those that are subject to him, a Right, or moral Power to have Things safely and lawfully, or to do and require of another certain Actions, if he judges convenient. See what Mr. Titius speaks much to the same Purpose in his Observ. on Pufendorf, l. li. Mr. Selden has already maintained the same Opinion, and uses a Comparison very proper to make it understood, viz. All the Boundaries which divide my Field from my Neighbour's, set out the Extent of his Field as well as mine; so the obligatory Right, which determines what Actions are commanded and what forbidden, being once settled, there necessarily follows a Right of meer Permission, which has for its Object all other Actions, about which the Lawgiver has determined nothing authoritatively, and consequently permits every Man to do, or not to do, as he pleases. De Jure Nat. & Gent. Lib. i. Chap. iv. Again, We must remember, that there is a great Difference between the Permission of human Laws and divine; for the Permission of divine Laws is always absolute, so that every one has a full Right to do all that they permit, provided the Things permitted are not forbidden by any human Law, to which he ought to submit, in Obedience to some other divine Law; but as to human Laws, the Permission which they give is for the most part imperfect, which implies only Impunity in human Judicatures, as our Author explains himself a little lower. Nevertheless I am aware, that this Author forgetting his Principles, seems to allow, besides a Law of meer Permission; for speaking of the Goodness or Evil of Actions in the following Chapter, §. 3. he says expressly, By a Law I mean always here a Law which indispensably obliges to some Thing, and not a Law that only permits. Legem necessitantem, non permittentem. Grotius also speaking of the first Right of the Occupant says, It is founded upon the natural Right of bare Permission. Est hoc jus ex jure naturæ permittente. Lib. ii. Ch. iii. §. 5.

but the Negation of an Action. Whatsoever Things the Law permits, those it neither commands nor forbids, and therefore it really doth nothing at all concerning them. Some maintain, that there is nevertheless a kind of Obligation in Permissions; not indeed affecting him to whom we say a Thing is permitted, but binding up a third Person from giving him any Hindrance, in case he undertake what the Law thus permits. Tho' this is by many restrain'd to such Things as are fully and perfectly permitted, so as not to take in those lesser and imperfect Permissions, which may be more properly stil'd Indulgences or Connivances. Thus, for Example, the Laws of some Countries permit the killing of a Wife taken in Adultery; yet they do not forbid others from using their utmost to hinder her Death. But if we would be accurate and exact in our Way of talking, even this Effect doth not properly result from the Permission of the Law, but from every Man's just Liberty³. For about those Things in which the Law gives me no Stop or Hindrance, I have a perfect Freedom of acting, the chief Effect of which is, that no Man ought to disturb me in the harmless Exercise of it. So that for a Law expressly to permit those Things to which we claim a sufficient Licence by their not being prohibited, which cannot well fall under Doubt or Dispute, seems little better than useless and superfluous. As likewise, it is not always necessary, that when any prohibiting Law is repeal'd, an Act hitherto forbidden, should by an express Ordinance be declar'd permitted: Since upon Removal of the former Impediment, our natural Liberty doth, as it were, revive and recover itself. There are indeed two special Cases, in which civil Lawgivers are wont to use express Permission: First, when Licence and Impunity is indulg'd to such an Act, within such a Measure; and, secondly, when the Licence or Impunity is to be purchas'd by some Fine or Burthen. Of the former Case, some give an Instance in the Laws of most Countries permitting Usury, within such a fix'd Degree: Of the latter, in the Constitutions of some Places, where Women are allow'd to prostitute themselves, upon Condition of paying a certain Tax⁴: which whether it be well or ill done we are not now to dispute⁵.

Legal Permission is divided into Plenary, which gives a Right of acting, and makes the Deed altogether lawful; and less Plenary, which either affords Impunity, or Freedom from Impediment, or both. Now that several Things find an Impunity amongst Men, is occasion'd by some of these Reasons: Either, that the Matters exceed the Reach of human Courts and Cognizance, as do the Faults of Kings; or, that human Law hath either determin'd nothing plainly about such an Action, or hath declar'd it shall be lawful; or, lastly, because civil Ordinances frequently leave many Things to the Modesty and common Honesty of every particular Man⁶.

Some have more accurately observ'd concerning these Permissions of Civil Laws and Civil Courts, that they are made either by the Action of the Law, or only tacitly. To the former they refer the Omission, or passing by of a Matter, not simply, and, as it were, by Accident, but when the Design and the Form of the Law run in such a Manner, that the Legislator shews his Intent of making a full Enumeration of Particulars: For, in such a Case he is suppos'd to have permitted whatever he hath not expressly reckon'd up amongst Things prohibited; provided the Matter be not repugnant to natural Honesty. Those Things are understood to be tacitly forbidden, which the civil Power lets pass by conniving at, tolerating, or dissembling; either for the present only, or for a longer Time, so as to let them obtain the Force of Customs. Yet a Permission granted by a civil Law, cannot cause that an Action shall not be contrary to the divine Law, or set it beyond the Fear of the divine Punishment.

We may farther remark, that when a Thing is said to be permitted, which is not determin'd by the⁶ express Command or Prohibition of any Civil Law, we are not to cavil at the Words of the Law, but to consider the Scope and Intention of it. For many Things are contain'd in the Sense of the Laws, and are suppos'd to be really implied by them, either as they are necessary Consequences, or upon account of their near Affinity and Resemblance to the determin'd Cases. Regard is likewise always to be had to natural Law, or to common Honesty, which is the perpetual Supplement of civil Decrees. Lastly, Those Things which are tolerated only for a Time, or upon the Score of Necessity, cannot fall under the proper Notion of Rights. All⁷ which Observations are chiefly to be understood of the most perfect or *plenary Permission*⁶.

XVI. The Matter of Laws in general, is whatever can be done by those Persons for whom the Laws are made, at least at the Time of their Promulgation. For if any Man afterwards, by his own Fault, loseth his Ability to fulfil the Law, the Force of the Law doth not thereupon cease and expire; but the Legislator hath Power to punish him, for rendering himself thus incapable of conforming to the Rule prescrib'd him. But, otherwise, to make such a Law as the Subject cannot fulfil, and yet hath not lost his Power of fulfilling by his own Fault, is not only a most vain, but a most unjust Design^x. As to the subject Matters which employ the particular Species of Laws, we shall more conveniently consider them in their proper Place.

XVII. To know who is capable of being oblig'd by a Law, we need seek no further than to the Right of the Legislator; which certainly takes in all those who are subject to his Command. What Persons the Legislator intended to oblige, is plain enough from the Law itself. For in all Laws it is signified whom they concern; either by express Determination, made sometimes by a general Sign, sometimes by a Restriction to certain Individuals; or else by some Condition or Reason, which a Subject finding in himself, at the same time apprehends that he therefore stands oblig'd by such a Law. Regularly then, a Law obligeth all Persons subject to the Legislator, whom the Reason of the Law reacheth, and to whom the Matter of it may be applied. For otherwise, Tumults and Confusions would continually arise amongst Subjects, the Prevention of which Disorders was a principal Reason why Laws were first introduc'd. And therefore no body shall be esteem'd exempted from a Law, unless he can shew his peculiar Privilege. Yet this indeed frequently happens, that a Man may be exempted from the Obligation of a Law, after the Time of its being enacted, and this we call being dispens'd with. For if the Legislator may rightly abrogate or repeal a Law, he may as fairly suspend the Effect of it in some certain Person. Dispensation differs from *Equity*², with which it is generally confounded, in this Respect, that the former cannot be granted, but by one endued with Legislative Power; whereas an inferior Minister of Justice, not only may, but ought to apply the latter; so that if he follow the strict Letter of the Law, in a Case where there is room for an Equitable Construction, he shall be judg'd to act contrary to the Mind and Intention of the Legislator. Dispensations therefore depend on the free Grace of the Lawgiver, but Equity on the Office and Duty of the Judge. In granting *Dispensations*³, great Prudence is to be us'd, lest by a promiscuous Indulgence, the Force and Authority of Law be enfeebled: or lest, if the same happen to be denied to Persons of the like Condition, Occasion should be given to Anger and Repentment, whilst Men of equal Circumstances are not admitted to equal Favours. Plutarch hath recorded several Instances of very nice and subtil Dispensations. As when Agefilaus suspended the Laws for one Day, with this Form, Let the Laws sleep to Day^a; to hinder those Persons who had fled in an Engagement, from suffering the usual Disgrace. So when Demetrius desir'd to be admitted at once into all the Athenian Mysteries, whereas it had ever been a Custom to celebrate the greater Mysteries in November, and the lesser in August, Stratocles publish'd a Decree, that the Month March, in which Demetrius visited Athens, should be call'd, first November, and then August^b. What the same Author reports of Demosthenes is more plausible: Demosthenes, upon his being recall'd from Banishment, lay under a Pecuniary Mulct, and the Law forbidding that he should be entirely discharg'd from it without Payment, they invented this Way of eluding the Law; they had a Custom of giving Money to the Man who prepar'd and adorn'd the Altar, at the Time of Sacrificing to Jupiter the Deliverer: This Office, and this Money, they decreed Demosthenes; and under that Pretence allotted him fifty Talents, the Sum in which he had been amerced. The Lacedemonians made use of much such another Evasion in Reference to Lysander. It was a Law amongst them, that no Man should bear the same Office above once^c; but now resolving to let Lysander have again the chief Power in a Naval Expedition, they gave Aracus the Formal Command of the Fleet, but join'd Lysander with him^d in a private Station, with express Orders, That the General should never act contrary to his Advice^e. I know not whether the Spanish Custom mention'd by Naudeus^f, may not be reckon'd likewise amongst these nice Permissions: "In Spain, he says, "when they deem a Man to be guilty of Treason, they appoint Judges to sit on him in secret; "who form a Process, and condemn him to suffer "Death; after which they seek by any means to "put the Sentence in Execution. And this they "practise as a Salvo to their Consciences; that

¹ It is necessary that what is forbidden should produce some Advantage, either to those for whom the Law is made, or to others; for 'tis not reasonable that the natural Liberty of Subjects should be restrain'd, and no Profit thereby redound to any body, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. Lib. i. Ch. ii. §. 8. See what is said, Lib. vii. Ch. ix. §. 5. Laws are made only about such Things as commonly happen, as is observed above, Ch. xi. §. 5. Again, as to what concerns our natural Right in particular, we ought to take Notice, with Mr. Titius (Observ. 59.) That natural Right, which is obligatory, has for its Object such Actions as carry with them some Convenience, or Inconvenience, necessary for the human Nature, as hath been proved, Lib. ii. Ch. iii. As for all other Actions, which we may call indifferent, the natural Right of simple Permission leaves every one at Liberty to dispose of them as he pleases. But most of these last are for the most Part regulated in different Manners, by the positive Laws of GOD and Man, as the legislative Power sees convenient.

² See Lib. v. Ch. xii. §. 10. following.

⁵ The Greek of Plutarch is, Καὶ φησας, ὅτι τὰς νόμους θεῶν σημερον ἐξῆν καθύποδον, καὶ δὲ τὸ σημερον ἡμῶν κερὶς ἵνα πρὸς τὸ λατρεῖν.

⁶ The Word bis, being omitted in all the Editions of this Author, spoils the Sense quite; and therefore as the French Translator adds, deux fois, so the English puts in, above once.

⁷ Here's a great Mistake in all the Editions of the Original, putting Aratus, the Name of a General of the Achians, a very different Person from this Admiral, for Aracus.

⁸ The Latin says, Privatus, as the English Translator renders it, but surely our Author meant Legatus, a Deputy; but however that be, 'tis safest to follow Plutarch, who calls him, Επιτολόμενος, i. e. Præfectus Classis, a Counter-Admiral, at least. See further about these sorts of intricate Dispensations, in Montagne's Essays, Lib. i. Ch. xxii.

“ they may not be accus'd of Injustice in punish“ ing Men capitally, without a legal Knowledge

XVIII. Law may be best divided, with reference to its Original, into divine and human; the former having God, and the latter Man for its Author. But if we consider Law as it bears a necessary Agreeableness to the subject Matter, in this Respect we divide it into natural and positive. The former is that which is so exactly fitted to suit with the rational and social Nature of Man, that human Kind cannot maintain an honest and a peaceful Fellowship without it: or, in other Words, that which carries in it a natural Goodness, or a Usefulness arising from its internal Efficacy, towards Men in general. Though there be also a farther Reason of this Denomination; in as much as this Law may be found out and known by the ordinary Sagacity of Men, and from the Consideration of human Nature in Common.

Positive Law is that which doth not by any means flow from the general Condition of human Nature, but from the sole Pleasure of the Law-giver; tho' these Laws ought likewise to have their Reason and their Uses; in reference to that particular Society for which they are enacted.

^a Vide, Ethic. ad Nicom. Lib. v. Ch. x. Et Vid. Lib. xv. D. de condit. Instit. ^b Divine natural Law is distinguish'd from positive, because this is alterable by the Authority that made it; that is not, but is Eternal and Immutable. See what our Author says in Book ii. Ch. iii. §. 4.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XVIII.

¹ The Text here is either corrupted, or not clear. It may be rectified partly from his Elements of universal civil Law, where our Author thus expresses himself; Quantum autem ad materiam, quasdam cum ipsa humane nature, quæ talis, conditione manifeste congruunt, & ex eâ fluunt, i. e. As to the Matter (of Laws) some plainly agree with the human Nature, as such, and others flow from it. And partly from his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Ch. ii. §. 16. where he says, Sed si lex consideretur prout necessarium, & universalem Congruentiam cum hominibus, vel minus, habet, &c. i. e. If the Law be considered, as it has a necessary and universal Agreement with Men, though in the lowest Degree, &c. The English Translator is so far from clearing this Passage, that he has made it more obscure, by taking it in a wrong Sense; for he understands by the Word Subje-tis, in the Original, the Subject, or Matter of the Law; whereas the Author plainly treats of the Persons upon whom a Law is imposed.

See what we have said, Ch. i. §. 4. and Ch. ii. §. 6. with the Notes.

² The Author here cites Vitellius's Reflection, Movem accommodare, prout conducatur, i. e. To accommodate the Custom to the Interest of State. Tacit. Annal. Lib. xii. Ch. vi.

⁴ This is an essential and distinguished Character between Laws natural and positive, the first are immutable, so just every Way, that no Authority can change or abrogate them lawfully; whereas positive Laws are so arbitrary, that as a lawful Authority may establish them, so he may change and abolish them as he sees Occasion.

⁵ Grotius (Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 15.) affirms, That there is a Divine voluntary Right, that obliges all Men, as soon as they come sufficiently to their Knowledge; and adds, That this Right hath been published upon three Occasions, viz. 1. At the Creation of our first Parents. 2. After the general Deluge. 3. By the Gospel. This great Man did not proceed to Particulars; but, some Years since, Mr. Thomasius, Professor at Hall in Saxony, composed a System of the Divine positive universal Laws, in his Institutions of Divine Civil Law, printed in 1702. But this able Lawyer being none of those who count it an Honour to defend what they have once asserted, right or wrong, did, at length, own himself mistaken, and pulled down his own Building, when he found the Foundation to be weak. See his Select Observations, made at Hall, Tom. 6. Observat. xxvii. and his Principles of the Law of Nature and Nations, drawn from common Sense, printed in 1705, and again in 1708. Others affirm, That all the Laws which relate to a Divine positive Right, either oblige all Men in all Ages, Places, and Nations, or may be deduced from Principles of natural Right, which we shall prove true as to some, in Lib. vi. Ch. i. §. 35. Note 2.

OUR next Business is to consider the Qualities of moral Actions: Now according to these Actions are said to be necessary, or not necessary, lawful or allow'd, and unlawful or disallow'd, good or evil, just or unjust. So that the Qualities of moral Action must be Necessity, Licencie, or Allowance, and the Opposites of these, which want proper Names; together with Goodness and Illness, Justice and Injustice.

II. A necessary Action is that which by Virtue of the Law, or the Command of a Superior, the Person to whom the Law or the Command is given, is bound absolutely to perform. For in this consists the Necessity of moral Actions, that they ought not to be omitted, nor yet to be done in another Manner than what was enjoin'd; though by our natural Power and Strength we are able either to omit them, or to do them in another Manner. Yet it is usual for the Lawyers to say absolutely, that a Thing which wants only this moral Necessity, cannot be done. To a necessary Action is oppos'd not only a forbidden Action, expressly prohibited by the Laws, or other Orders of the Superior, but likewise a lawful or an allow'd Action, which the Laws neither command nor forbid, but leave it to every Man's Pleasure, whether he will undertake or decline it. Cicero pro Balb. Ch. iii. There are some Things which we ought not to do, tho' we might lawfully do them: But on the other Hand, whatever we cannot lawfully do, it's very certain we ought not to do. Now by the common Usage of Speech, not only those Things are said to be lawful, which neither divine nor human Law forbids, and which therefore may be undertaken without Sin or Blame, but likewise those Things which altho' prohibited by the Laws of Nature, yet the Laws of particular States so far permit, as not to impose a Penalty on them in human Cognifance; leaving them to every Man's private Confidence and Honour. Tully's Observation is admirable to this Purpose, It is not lawful (says he) for any Man to sin; but we commit an Error in Speech, whilst we say that such a Thing is lawful, which is indeed tolerated or allow'd. The former kind of Actions we may call perfectly lawful, the latter imperfectly. So Lampridius reports of the Emperor Severus, that he had some Thoughts of prohibiting the publick Professors of Lewdness: But he feared this might rather increase Debauchery in private; Men naturally affecting what is unlawful, and pursuing with Eagerness and Fury any Practice which hath been forbidden them.

But farther than this, we sometimes in a very loose Sense, term even those Things lawful, which all Men agree and confess to be the most base and vile; whensoever the Person who performs them is Master of so much Strength, as to be too big for human Punishment or Reprehension. Senec. de Clement. Lib. i. Ch. xviii. Tho' we commonly say, All Things are lawful towards a Slave, yet there are indeed some Things which common Nature for-

Mr. BARB. NOTES.

² The Morality of human Actions may be consider'd two ways, 1. In the Manner the Law disposes them, in which Respect they are either permissive or necessary. The first are such as the Law gives Right positively to do, if we will, and not, as our Author affirms, upon the Account of which the Law orders a Thing to be done in such a Manner; for this Definition agrees to such Actions only, as are allow'd by an imperfect Permission, of which he speaks a little lower. 2. As they agree, or disagree with the Law, and so Actions are either good, or bad, or indifferent. This Division seems more exact than our Author's. Tinius Observ. lxiy, lxy. See our Notes on Chap. vi. §. 2. and our Notes on this Chap. §. 5. Note 5.

⁴ Ἄ ᾧ ἢ κελεύεται τις ποιῆναι, ταῦτα ἔδει μὴ ποιεῖν, κεκώλυται. i. e. What a Man is not ordered to do, that he is not hindered from doing. Liban. Declam. xvi. The Author himself cites this Passage in his later Editions.

⁵ There are some Things not to be done, tho' lawful; but whatever is not lawful, that ought not to be done. Tully's Words are, Esti peccare nemini licet, sed sermonis errore labimur; id enim licere dicimus, quod cuique conceditur. Tusc. Quæst. Lib. v. Ch. xix.

⁶ This Quotation making little to our Author's Purpose, and containing something obscene in it, 'tis no Damage to omit it, and instead of it put some of the Sayings of the Roman Lawyers, viz. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 17. De divers. Res. Juris, Leg. cxliv. Every Thing is not honest that is lawful. And Leg. cxviii. We ought to consider, not only what is lawful, but what is also honest. Mr Stryck, Professor at Hall in Saxony, has publish'd a Discourse of the Law of what's lawful, but not honest, reprinted in 1704 in 4to, where we may find a particular Account of Things permitted and authorized by Custom, which in themselves are contrary to natural Honesty, and much more to Christianity, altho' the Author had but little of his Matter from any certain Places.

bids us to act towards a Man, one of our own Species and Condition ⁵.

III. We call that Action good morally (for the other kind of Goodness, term'd Natural or Material, by which a Thing or an Action tends to the Benefit or Perfection of any one ¹, is explain'd in another Place. Tho' we must observe, that in the Precepts of natural Law, and in most civil Constitutions, it goes along with this moral Goodness, and amongst rational Creatures ², seems to give the first Spring or Occasion to it) or in moral Estimation, which is agreeable to the Law, and that Action evil, which is disagreeable. Inasmuch as the ratio formalis, the proper and distinguishing Nature of the Goodness or Illness of Actions, consists in a Relation determining them towards a directive Rule; and this Rule is what we term a Law (under which Name we here mean a necessitating, and not a permitting Law, and if it be human we suppose it not contrary to those which are Divine) ³ for when a design'd Action is form'd according to the Rule prescrib'd, and exactly agrees with it, it is said to be good: Whereas, if it is undertaken against the prescrib'd Rule, or varies from it, it is call'd Evil, and, in one Word, Sin. Now it is plain, that any directing Rule; for instance, the Mariner's Compass is said to be the Cause of his right Sailing, and of his coming to the Port, not so much in regard that the Ship takes a Course falling in with its Direction, as because the Pilot guides himself by it in managing the Steerage: In like Manner, a Law is said to be the Cause of Rectitude in an Action, not when the Action, however intended, is agreeable to it; but when the Action proceeds from the Dictate of the Law, and from some Dependence on it; that is, from an Intention of paying Obedience to its Injunctions. Whence, if a Man by Chance, or without thinking of any Obedience to a Law, performs a Thing prescrib'd by that Law, he may indeed be said to have done rightly, or not ill, in a negative, rather than in a positive Sense; but he cannot be said to have done morally well, no more than one that by discharging a Gun at venture and random, hath brought down a Bird, can be said to have shot skilfully, and like a Marksman.

IV. Farther, since the Law determines either the Disposition of the Agent, or else the Object, or the End or the Circumstances of the Action; an Action is morally Good or Evil for one of these Reasons, either because the Agent is so dispos'd as the Law requires him to be, or otherwise; or, because the Action is directed towards the proper Object, with that End, and those Circumstances which the Law prescribes, or with the contrary. But here it must be observed, that to make an Action good, 'tis necessary, that it not only conform to the Law in all its material Requisites and Conditions; but likewise, that in respect of its Formality, it be exercis'd, not out of Ignorance, or any other Cause, besides the Intention of paying Obedience to the Law. And therefore an Action, tho' otherwise on the Account of the Matter of it Good, may, by Reason of the bad Intention of the Agent, be imputed to him as Evil. For a Man who designing an ill Thing doth a good one, hath by no means a Title to any Reward for his Service: As he in Valerius Maximus ² who intending to kill Jason, luckily broke his Imposthume. Upon the same Account, he who mispends his lawful Power in ill Service, is guilty of Sin: As a Judge, suppose, who abuseth his Authority of punishing Offenders, to the satisfying his own private Resentments. For which Reason the Carthaginians sentenc'd their Generals to Death, if they had undertaken an Enterprize, tho' with good Success, yet with ill Counsel and Design ³. Liv. xxxviii. Ch. xlviii. Val. Max. Lib. ii. Ch. vii. §. 1. Extern. But, on the other Side, an Action as to the Matter of it Evil, cannot ² by virtue of the honest Intention of the Agent, be turn'd into Good. Whence the Reason is clear, why a Man cannot use his own Sins as Means for the Attainment of any virtuous End, or why we must not do Evil that Good may come of it, Rom. iii. 8. For to render an Action Evil, it's sufficient that it be incongruous to the Law, in any one Point or Condition, whether Material or Formal: That is, If either the Disposition of the Agent, or the Object, or the End, or any one of the Circumstances contradict what the Law directs. 'Tis a most vain Distinction of some Men, when they affirm, that an Action, as to the Substance of the Work, may be good, altho' the End required by the Law be not intended by the Agent. For the End makes a main Part of the very Essence of a moral Action, inasmuch as it enters into the

² Seneca's Words, Ep. cxx. may serve as an excellent Comment upon our Author's Notion, Nobis videtur observatio collegisse, & rerum sape factarum inter se collatio, per analogiam nostro intellectu & honestum & bonum judicante ----- Noveramus corporis sanitatem, ex hac cogitavimus esse aliquam & animi. Noveramus corporis vires, ex his collegimus esse & animi robur. Aliqua benigna facta, aliqua humana, aliqua fortia, nos obstupescerant, hanc cupimus tanquam perfecta mirari, i. e. "Our Notions of Goodness and Honesty are the Result of the Reflections and Comparisons, which the Mind makes by Analogy, upon such Things as it often sees and observes. We know that there is such a Thing as Health of the Body, and from thence we conclude, that there must be also an Health of the Soul. We know that the Body hath Force and Strength, and from thence we infer, that the Soul also hath its Force. We are wrapp'd with Admiration at the View of some eminent Acts of Goodness, Humanity, and Courage, and we begin to look upon them as Patterns of Perfection."

³ The two following Periods not being well placed in the Original, must be a little varied to make the Discourse coherent.

² These two Passages cited by our Author are nothing to the Purpose; and, tho' clear in themselves, are mistaken by him in this whole Discourse. The first is that of Livy, where Cn. Manlius, answering those that contested with him about the Honour of the Triumph, under a Pretence that he had managed the War against the Gallogræci, or Galatians, with sufficient Conduct, says, That he was sure to carry his Cause, tho' it were not before a Roman, but Carthaginian Senate, who are said to crucify their Generals, if they acted by bad Advice, tho' they were successful; for so are his Words, In quo considerem equidem causa mes, etiamsi non apud Romanum, sed Carthaginiensem senatum agerem, ubi in cruce tolli imperatores dicuntur, si prospero eventu pravo consilio gesserunt. The other Passage is out of Val. Maximus, whose Words are much the same about this Custom at Carthage. Mr. Pufendorf believes that these Words, pravo consilio, signify with a bad Intention, whereas they plainly signify, without taking good Measures; as Montagne rightly takes them, when he says, The Carthaginians punish'd the ill Conduct of their Captains, although they made Amends for it by their good Success. Essays, Lib. iii. Ch. viii. p. 693. Fol.

² What is Faulty, 'tis no Matter with what Intention it is done. Publ. Syr. see the next Chap. §. 2, 3.

Intention, which is a Principle of the greatest Force in determining the Action's Quality. Hence it is sinful to direct an Action, not only to an ill End, but likewise to any other End, than what is prescrib'd by the Law, Matth. vi. 5. Juo. Sat. 8. v. 215. Causa facit rem dissimilem. Nor is an accomplish'd Fact only, or such as hath obtain'd its End, accounted Wickedness, but even a commenc'd Enormity: And this latter is by Civil Laws sometimes punish'd with equal, or however with little less Severity than the former; according as they find it necessary to repress a Villany in its first Rise and Appearance Senec. de Constant. Sapient. c. 7. All Villanies before the Accomplishment of the Work are complet in respect of the Guilt.

V. This Goodness, and this Evil of Actions, as they consist formally in such an Agreeableness or Disagreeableness to the Law, as we have been speaking of, so they depend entirely on him as their efficient Cause, who performs an Action which the Law either commands or forbids. For his Determination so constitutes the Action in the Rank of Moral Beings, that it must be imputed to him, and to him only¹. And therefore those Men have tormented themselves with a needless Fear, who, lest they should seem to make GOD Almighty the Author of Sin, have plac'd the ratio formalis of an evil Action, in the *Privation of Conformity to the Law*². For tho' the Position of any Form necessarily infers the Privation or Absence of the contrary Form; yet how mistaken must he be in his Opinion, who would seek for the Essence of a Thing in this Privation? Nor will he find himself any great Proficient in Wisdom, who hath arriv'd to know that Straightness is the Privation of Crookedness, and Crookedness the Privation of Straightness. But these Inventions and these Fears of Men, both proceeded from their Ignorance of moral Things. GOD, the Author of all natural Beings, need not, and ought not to be esteem'd the Author and Cause of all moral³, all notional, and all artificial Beings. Some loose Thinkers must needs be touch'd with a strange Itch of Wit, when they imagine they have given us an extraordinary Specimen of their Philosophical Subtility, in numbering GOD among the Causes of our sinning. For a Man, who hath the least Insight into the Constitution of Morality, will judge nothing more absurd, than to enquire whether or no He be the Cause of an Action, who forbids it by a Law, and punisheth it for being done after his Prohibition. As for GOD's concurring to the Physical Part of an Action, he can with no more Reason be on this Account stil'd the Author of Sin, than one who hath furnish'd an Artificer with Materials to work upon, can be reckon'd the Cause of a Deformity in his unskilful Work. Wherefore, to use the Term or Name of Cause in a Signification so very improper, and so remote from common Sense, is to join our Pride and Ambition in offering an Irreverence to the Divine Nature. Philo Judaeus de profug. 4. What greater Instance of Blasphemy can there be, than to make GOD, and not our selves, the Author of Evil? Maxim. Tyr. Dissertat. iii. 5. These dreadful Names of Furies, Fates, and Destinies, what are they but the specious Pleas and Excuses of human Wickedness, by the Means of which we are wont to charge our own Faults upon the Providence of Heaven? When, alas! these, and all the other Ministers of Terror, and over-ruling Necessity, which we so often complain of, are Monsters of our own making, and such as we carry about us in our Breast. Idem. Dissert. xxv. Let the Wretch who sins upon Choice, take all the Guilt upon himself, and let GOD be clearly justified⁴.

VI. We are, in the next Place, to discourse of Justice,

¹ Seneca's Words, Omnia scelera, etiam ante effectum operis, quantum culpe satis est, perfecta sunt. The Scholars of Zoroastres say, We must banish every sin from our Hands, Tongue, and Thought. In Sadler, Porta lxxi. They add elsewhere (Porta xxv.) as also from our Eyes. See what this Author says afterwards, Lib. viii. Ch. iii. § 14.

² § v. That is, as the immediate Author of the Action; for, as our Author himself shews at large, Ch. v. § 14. the Actions of another may also sometimes be imputed to a Person.

³ This Notion much resembles Aristotle's Opinion of the Principles of natural Bodies, among which he ranks Privation. See the Art of Thinking, Part iii. Ch. xviii. § 1. where the Author seems to have taken the Expression from Montaigne's Essays, Liv. ii. Ch. xii. p. 293. Fol. Ed. Par.

⁴ The Author understands by this, the Operations of our Understanding.

⁵ Quæ potest esse Blasphemia gravior, quam contendere, non ex nobis mala provenire, sed ex Deo?

⁶ The Greek is, Ἐὰν δὲ ταῦτα τὰ νόματα ἴσως προέβησαν ἀφ' ἑωυτοῦ ἀποφασίζουσι, ἀνέλκτου αὐτῶν τῶν αἰτίων τῶν ἀναγκαίων, ἢ τῶν Νομῶν, ἢ Ἐπινοῶν. — Ἡ δὲ Ἐπινοῶν, ἢ ἡ Αἴτια, ἢ οἱ Δαίμονες, ἢ ἡ οὐκ ἄλλα ἐπινοῶν, κτιστικῆς (for so it must be read with Heinsius instead of ἐπινοῶν) ἀπόστα, ἕδω ἐν τῷ ἑωυτοῦ κατ' ἑωυτοῦ.

⁷ Our Author treats here only of Actions morally good or bad, i. e. fully agreeable, or plainly contrary to some Law in Force. But he ought also to have spoke something of Actions morally indifferent, i. e. which every one may lawfully do or not do, according as he pleases, by virtue of a Law of simple Permission. See §. 1. Note 1. That then we may have a true Notion of this last sort of Actions, we must observe, that the Term Indifferent may have three Significations, which ought to be carefully distinguish'd; for, 1. If we say, that an Action may be indifferently either commanded, or forbidden, or permitted by the Law, even in this Sense we must acknowledge all human Actions are not indifferent; as for Example, Man-slaughter can't be commanded nor permitted, because it is so great a Prejudice to the human Nature. 2. But if we consider our Actions, as Motions purely physical, and with a Relation to any Rule, in one Word, without a Regard to any Law, 'tis certain that in this Respect all Actions are indifferent. See Ch. ii. §. 6. foregoing. Lastly (and 'tis in this Sense that our Author treats of it here) if we consider an Action as freely permitted by the Law. This is an Action morally indifferent, which we may in a negative Sense call good, because it is not evil. Now there can be no Difficulty in judging of these sort of Actions; for what else can those things be, which are neither commanded nor forbidden, by any Law, Divine or Human, and which we have Power to do, or not do, as we see fit? The Schoolmen foolishly affirm, That Dancing (for Example) consider'd abstractly in it self, is morally indifferent; but it ceases to be so in the very Moment when we look upon it as a particular Action, done by such, or such a Person, at such, or such a Time, in such, or such a Place, with such, or such an Intention; for an Action thus stripped of all its Circumstances is a meer Chimera and Nothing. So that if Dancing be morally indifferent, it must be so with relation to certain Circumstances, of Persons, Times, and Places. It signifies nothing to say that every particular Action that is done with a good or bad Intention, ought to be good or bad, for this Conclusion is not absolutely true. An Action done with a good Intention is good only in a negative Sense, that is to say, either not evil, or indifferent, so far as some Law has formally prescribed it, for there are a great Number of Actions done for a lawful End, which are not commanded by any Law, and consequently can't pass for such as are good positively. This is almost all taken out of Mr. Tinius's Observ. lxxv. 'Tis long ago since that learned Englishman Thomas Gataker spake something like this against the vain Subtilties of the Schoolmen, about Actions indifferent. See his Treatise of the Use and Nature of Lots, printed at London, 1619. Chap. v. §. 4. where he mentions the famous Distinction of the Stoicks, and cites, among others, a Passage of Aulus Gellius, who has the same Notions, which I shall set down here, because he expresses the same thing well in it. Omnia, quæ

Justice, concerning which, it ought to be our first Observation, that the Signification of this Term as applied ^a to Persons, is very different from that, by which it denotes an Attribute of Actions. For when we use ^a it with regard to Persons, to be just, imports as much as to delight in acting justly, to study after Justice, or to endeavour in every thing to do what is just: And to be unjust, is to neglect Justice, or to think it should be measur'd, not according as it is really due, but as it suits with present Advantage. So that a just Man may perform several unjust Actions ^b, and an unjust Man several just Actions. For he is to be esteem'd a just Person, who doth just Things in Obedience to the Law ^c, and unjust Things only thro' Infirmity; and he an unjust Person, who doth just Things in Fear of the Punishment annex'd to the Law, and unjust Things either out of Perverseness and Pravity of Mind, or for the procuring of Glory, or any other seeming Benefit. Hobbes de Cive, Ch. iii. §. 5. And to the same Purpose Pliny, in his Panegy. Ch. lvi. A wicked Man may do many Things, in themselves commendable: But to deserve Commendation in his own Person, is the Prerogative of a Man truly good and virtuous. ^d Philemon in Strabo. Serm. ix.

or Timorousness, is not to be reckon'd in the Number of bad Men, so neither is he who hath perform'd some Acts of the opposite Virtues, immediately to be rank'd amongst the good. But the true Judgment of Persons is to be made, not from any short Period of acting, but from the whole Course and Tenor of Life. Agathias, Lib. v. hath left a very judicious Censure of those People in Constantinople, who upon a terrible Earthquake in the City, had contended with each other in the Performance of good and pious Works. All this they did (says he) for a certain Time; so long as the Impression of the Fright was fresh and strong upon their Apprehension. But when the Calamity began to abate, most of them return'd to their former Looseness of Practise. Now such a sudden Motion of the Mind, such a Fit, as it were, of Goodness, cannot be call'd true Justice, or solid and fruitful Piety, such as is wont to be form'd in Men by right Opinions and constant Application; but an unnatural Disguise, an ill-contriv'd Stratagem, a meer huckstering in Holiness, taken up as a Preservative against the common Evil. Virtue upon Necessity is just as long liv'd as the Fear that occasions it. Hence it appears, that the Definition of ^a Justice so much in vogue with the Roman Lawyers, in which they call it, A constant and perpetual Inclination to give every ^e one their Due, belongs to the Justice of Persons, not to that of Actions. And this we take to be very inconvenient: Inasmuch as the Science of Law is chiefly employ'd about the Justice of Actions, and toucheth on the Justice of Persons only by the bye, and in some few Particulars.

VII. The Justice of Persons differs from their Goodness chiefly in this, that Goodness barely denotes a Conformity to the Law, but Justice farther includes a Respect to those Persons towards whom the ^f Action is perform'd. So that we apprehend that Action to be just, which with full Design and Intention is applied to the Person to whom it was due. And therefore Justice, in this Sense, will be nothing else, but the right Application of

He is not Just who barely acts no Wrong,
 But he who spares, when fraught with Power to Nor will the Conquest of a puny Lust (harm:
 Ensure his Triumph; but a Strength of Soul,
 Fit to sustain the united Force of Sin,
 And foil Temptation in its last Attack.
 Solid in Worth, and generous Honesty.

in rebus humanis fiunt, sicut docti censuerunt, aut honesta sunt, aut turpia; wherein he omits the third Member of the Division, as other good Authors do, for the Reason which Mr. Noodt gives us, in his Book entitled Probabilia Juris, i. e. The Probabilities of the Law, Lib. i. Ch. xii. Quæ sua vi recta aut honesta sunt, ut fidem colere, patriam defendere, amicos diligere, ea fieri oportet, si ve imperet Pater, si ve non imperet. Sed quæ his contraria, quasque turpia & omnino iniqua sunt, ea ne si imperet quidem. Quæ vero in medio sunt, & à Grecis tum ἀδιάφορα, tum μισα appellantur, ut in militiam ire, rus colere, honores capessere, causas defendere, uxorem ducere, uti jussum proficisci, accersitum venire, quoniam & hæc & his similia per se ipsa neque honesta sunt, neque turpia, sed proinde ut à nobis aguntur, ita ipsis actionibus aut probanda sunt, aut reprehendenda; propterea in ejusmodi omnium rerum generibus patri parendum esse censent, &c. Lib. ii. Chap. vii. See also Velthuyzen of the Principles of Justice and Decency, p. 19, &c.

^b §. vi. ² This is not only true concerning Justice, but also concerning all Morality in general, i. e. concerning ever Virtue and Vice.

^c We must indisputably treat of the Justice of Actions, before that of Persons, because this last supposes the first, as appears by the Definition which our Author gives of it. The Way to understand these Expressions, to do justly, to delight in Justice, is not to be ignorant what Justice is.

^d Laudabilia multa etiam mali faciunt, ipse laudari, nisi optimus, non potest, Plin. Panegy. Chap. lvi. Sinners themselves do many Things commendable, but only the best Men deserve Commendation.

^e There is also a Case when we may do justly in a negative Sense, i. e. not unjustly, altho' the Thing in itself be not just. This happens when a Man is really in an Error, or ignorant, as it often comes to pass, both in respect to Right and Fact. On this Ground Grotius maintains, and that with good Reason, That War may sometimes be just on both Sides. See his Book De Jure belli & Pacis, Lib. ii. Ch. xxiii. §. 13. and what shall be said, Lib. viii. Ch. vi. §. 4. Note 2.

^h §. vii. ² There is not properly any Difference between Goodness and Justice; for, as our Author himself shews us above, the Idea of a good Action contains in it the Notion of an Object agreeable. We may better distinguish good Actions according to the threefold Object which they may have, viz. GOD, other Men, and ourselves. Those that have GOD for their Object, are comprized under the general Name of Piety: Those that have other Men for their Object, are contained in the Term of Justice; and those that directly regard ourselves may be reduced to Temperance or Moderation. This Division, which is the most common, seems to be the plainest and most natural.

the Action to the Person. We shall choose to divide Justice chiefly with Regard to the Matter which is owing, or which bears a Relation to another by way of Debt or Due.

But we must observe beforehand, that some Actions may be call'd pure, and others mixt. The former are perform'd and finish'd by the Motion of some of our Powers applied in such a certain Manner to the Object; of this Kind are honouring, paying Duty and Respect, loving, hating, comforting, praising, dispraising, &c. the Product of all which is nothing else but the causing the Object to be really affected, or to be thought affected by the Action in a certain Way, either with Complacency or Dissatisfaction. But the latter, or the mixt Actions, are join'd with the transferring of some Advantage or Disadvantage on the Person towards whom they are exercis'd; and therefore their Effect consists principally in some Operation, either profiting or hurting another Man in his Person or in his Goods². Again, there are some Actions which make a great Part of Commerce amongst Men, and are valu'd at a certain Rate; others have no Price or Rate impos'd upon them: Concerning which Difference we shall enquire farther hereafter³. Lastly, we must take Notice that some Things are due to us perfectly, others imperfectly. Those Things which are due to us in the former Manner, if voluntary Payment be not made, we may constrain the Debtor to discharge, if we live in a natural State, by Arms and main Strength; if we are Members of the same civil Society, by preferring an Action against him in Courts of Justice. But what is due to us in the latter Way, we ought neither to claim by Methods of Hostility, nor to extort by legal Process. It is usual⁴ with Latin Authors, to express perfect Right by the help of the Word Suus, as when they say a Man claims such a Thing, suo jure, by his own Right. Now that some Things should be thus due to us perfectly, and others imperfectly, the Reason amongst those who live in a State of natural Liberty is, the great Diversity of Precepts in Nature's Laws, of which some conduce to the very Being, others only to the well-being of Society: And therefore, since there's less Necessity of performing these latter than the former, Reason shews that the former may be requir'd and executed by more severe Courses and Means; whereas in regard to the latter, it is meer Folly to apply a Remedy more grievous than the Disease. Besides, there usually passeth between Men some Covenant about the former, but not about the latter; and consequently, since they are left to every Man's Conscience and Modesty, it would be very improper to extort them violently from another⁵, unless in Cases of extraordinary Necessity. In civil Communities this Difference ariseth from the particular Laws and Constitutions allowing or disallowing an Action in such or such Cases. Tho' most Commonwealths do in these Points follow the Tract of the Law of Nature; except where they have some particular Reasons advising the contrary.

VIII. When, then, we exhibit to another either Actions or Things due to him only by imperfect Right, or when we exercise towards another, Actions not coming under the Head of strict Commerce, we are said to have observ'd general, or universal Justice. As when a Man supplies another with his Counsel, Goods, or Help, as he hath Need; or when he performs the Offices of Piety, Reverence, Gratitude, Humanity or Beneficence towards those to whom he is in Duty bound to pay them. This Kind of Justice only enjoins that the Debt be paid, not considering whether the Thing given in Payment be equal to the Reason why it is due, or not. Thus a Man sufficiently dischargeth the Duty of Gratitude, if he make all the Return that his Abilities will allow; tho' perhaps the Kindness he hath receiv'd were in Value much greater⁶.

But when we perform towards another Actions falling under Commerce, or such as transfer any Thing on another, to which he had a perfect Right, this is call'd particular Justice.

IX. Now this perfect Right accrues either to single Persons by a Covenant (tacit or express) made with some Society, in order to their being admitted Members of it; or to a Society by a Covenant made with single Persons, in order to the receiving them into the same Community: Or, lastly, from⁷ Pacts made between any Parties concerning Things or Actions falling under Commerce. When we pay those Things which are due upon the Pact of a Society with a Mem-

² For Example, a Gift, a Loan, a Theft, Murder, &c.

³ See Book v. Ch. i. §. 5.

⁴ As for Example, When we say, Ille suo jure hoc postulat. See Grotius, Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 5. with Gronovius's first Note. And we also say ourselves, We must render to every one their own; we wrong no Man, when we require our own.

⁶ §. viii. It is nevertheless no great Virtue to own an Obligation to such as have done us Good, provided that the Acknowledgment does not much surpass, in its Effects, the Obligation we have to our Benefactors; for, according to the Maxim of JESUS CHRIST, If you love those only, that love you, what Thanks have you? Matth. vi. 46.

⁷ §. ix. This Division is not compleat, because it contains in it the Obligation we are in to another, by Virtue of some Engagement that we are entred into, or of a Society to which we are joined. Now there are Things which our Neighbour may require of us in Strictness, without any Relation to a particular Society, Promise, or Convention; as not to do them any Injury, to make good a Damage done them, and to look upon them as Beings equal with ourselves. It would please me better, with Mr. Buddens (Elem. Phil. pract. Part. II. Ch. ii. §. 46.) to divide particular Justice, which we may more strictly call rigorous Justice, into that which Equals Use one towards another, and that which Superiors exercise towards their Inferiors. The first may be subdivided into several Sorts, viz. The Duties which a Man may in Strictness exact of all other Men, and a Citizen of every Person subject to the same Government. The other contains divers Kinds, as there are divers Kinds of Societies, where some command and others obey, which is much the same as Grotius's Jus Rectorum & Aequatorum, Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 3. The Epithet of Universal, given to the other general sort of Justice, is also very improper. We had better call it imperfect Justice.

ber, or of a Member with a Society ³, upon the Accounts just now specified, we are said to exercise distributive Justice. For whenever a Man is receiv'd into a Society, a Pact is either expressly, or, at least, tacitly made between the Society and the Member now to be introduc'd, by which the Society engageth to give him a just Share and Proportion of the Goods which it enjoys as a common Body: and the Member promiseth, that he will bear his proper and equal Part of those Burdens which conduce to the Preservation of the Society, consider'd as such. The exact Determination of the proper Share of Goods to be assign'd to the Member, is made according to the Rule and Value of the Pains or Charges employ'd by him, towards preserving the common Society, in Proportion to the Pains or Charges contributed by the other Members. On the other Hand, the Determination of the proper Share of Burthens to be laid on the Member, is made according to the Value of the Benefits receiv'd by him from the Society, consider'd in proportion to the Advantages which the rest of the Members enjoy. Hence, since it generally happens, that one Member contributes more towards the Preservation of the Society than another, and that one likewise exceeds another in deriving Advantage from it, the Reason is very apparent, why, upon the Supposal of many Persons, and of this Inequality amongst them, we ought, in the Exercise of distributive Justice, to observe a comparative Equality: Which consists in this, that what Proportion the Merits of one Person bear to the Merits of another, such Proportion shall his Reward bear to the other's Reward.

⁴ For, as Philo Judæus de Monarchia. Lib. ii. p. 640. Ed. Genev. observes, 'tis high Inequality to give equal Honours to those who are not equal in Merit. Arrian. Epictet. Lib. iii. Ch. xvii. This is a settled Law of Nature, that he who is more excellent, should on that very Account have a larger Share of good Things, than he who is less. Thus, for Instance, if six Things of the same Value are to be distributed amongst Caius, Seius, and Titius, upon Supposition, that Titius exceeds Caius in a triple Proportion, and Seius in a double, Titius shall have three, Seius two, and Caius one. Nor is it requisite to this Equality, that the Reward fully answer and come up to the Merits of the Person; but 'tis sufficient, that what Proportion the Service of the one bears to the Service of the other, the same Proportion there should be between their Shares of the common Benefits. And the same Rule must be follow'd in distributing Burthens.

As for what Mr. Hobbes ⁵ alledgeth, to overthrow this respective Equality, that I may of my own

Goods distribute least to him that deserves most, and most to him that deserves least, provided I pay but for what I bargain'd for; and use the Authority of our Saviour, in the xxth of St. Matth. ver. 13, &c. to confirm his Opinion: All this, if rightly consider'd, makes nothing to the Purpose. For in the Place of Scripture above-cited, it is shewn indeed that he doth not offend against Commutative Justice (which governs the Contracts about Hire, &c.) who out of his Liberality gives to some a larger Reward than their Service deserves; or who, to the Wages due upon this commutative Justice, adds something out of free Bounty, which is comprehended under universal Justice. But how doth this affect our distributive Justice, the Business of which is nothing else, but to assign to many Persons their proper Shares of a Thing, to which all of them have a perfect, though (in regard to the Quantity) an unequal Right? And then as for the word Distributing, which occurs in the Instance alledg'd from Scripture, this doth not in the least make the Act fall under Justice, strictly call'd Distributive; but only hints that the Labourers were many, to every one of whom their Wages were to be paid according to commutative Justice ⁶.

To clear the Doubts rais'd on this Head by Grotius, in his first Book and first Chapter, we need only observe, that his ⁶ expletive Justice doth not exactly come up to commutative, nor his attributive to distributive; and that his Division is not founded on the same Bottom as ours. For ours is chiefly taken from the Matter which is owing, and from the Cause of owing it; but his from the Manner and the Degree in which a Thing is ow'd. Whence the Reason is evident why the parting of Gain in Contracts of Societies, is by him referr'd to expletive, and by us to distributive Justice. The observing of ⁷ Geometrical Proportion in these Cases, is indeed only accidental; since 'tis not necessary, that the Members should have contributed unequal Shares, but they might as well have contributed equally, and then in parting the Gains a simple or strict Equality must have been follow'd. As for that Case stated by Grotius, If ⁸ one Man only be found fit for a publick Office, his Reward shall be assign'd him according to simple, or Arithmetical Proportion; it must be farther enquir'd, whether the Man had a perfect, or ⁹ imperfect Right to this Office. If the latter, the Case will then belong to universal Justice: If the former, we agree to Grotius's Remark, that the Species of Proportion call'd Geometrical, is, tho' generally, yet not always follow'd in distributive Justice. Nor have we taken the Difference of our two Kinds of Justice from their making use of a different Proportion. And

⁴ We must remember this Restriction, for otherwise a Society may treat with any one of its Members, as it would treat with another Society, or as particular Persons treat one with another.

⁵ Philo's Words are, Το ἴσον τοῖς τοῖς ἀξίως ἀνεμοῖς οὐνοῦ ἀποδόντων, ἄριστον. Arrian's, Νόμος ἔστος φυσικός, ἢ κρείττονα τῶν χειρόνων, πλείον ἔχειν, ἐν ᾧ κρείττονα ἔστω. The true Meaning of which Word is, That 'tis a Law of Nature, that good Men, as such, should have the Advantage of Sinners; and if so, they are nothing to our Author's Purpose.

⁶ Hobbes gives another Example, see the next Section.

⁷ Our Author will explain and examine more largely this Definition of Grotius, in §. 11. of this Chapter.

⁸ To understand what Geometrical Proportion is, the best way is to give an Example of it: When I say then, Six is to Two, as Twelve is to Four, there is a Geometrical Proportion; because Two is as often found in the Number Six, as Four is found in the number Twelve.

⁹ This is to suppose a Thing impossible (says Gronovius the Elder, in his Notes) viz. That all Citizens, one only excepted, should be equal, which can only happen when they can have but one Nose, Mouth, Eyes, and, in a Word, a Face exactly alike. See Mr. Vander Meulen in his Comment on Grotius, Tom. i. Page 31.

⁹ See Lib. iii. Ch. i. §. 3. following.

fo, for the other Instances of Grotius, the assigning of Legacies belongs not to distributive Justice, but to universal: And when a City or State repays out of the common Stock, what some particular Members have expended on the publick Account, commutative Justice is exercis'd, and not distributive. Because the Reason of the Debt ariseth, not from that Pact by which the Society first admitted the said Members, but from a particular, and a very different Contract.

X. When we exhibit to another Things or Actions due ¹ upon reciprocal Pact, and coming into Commerce, this is call'd commutative Justice. And since Pacts of that Kind tend to this Issue, that for a Thing or Action of my own, falling under Commerce, I receive from another an equivalent Thing or Action, at least such as I esteem equivalent; the Reason is hence obvious, why in this Species of Justice a simple Equality is requir'd, which we commonly call ² Arithmetical Proportion, but that the strict Mathematicians will allow it that Title, we dare not engage. The Thing or Action then, coming in Commerce to another, ought to be answer'd by somewhat exactly of the same Value in moral Estimation. For, the Objection of Mr. Hobbes ³ that if we sell our own Goods at the highest Price that can be, we do no Injury to the Buyer, who inclin'd and consented to the Bargain, shall be examin'd at large hereafter ³. As for vindicative Justice, which, according to our Notion, constitutes a particular Species, it will be consider'd in a more convenient Place ⁴.

XI. It may be worth our while to take farther Notice of ^b Grotius's Opinion concerning Justice, which he, neglecting the usual Distinction of general and particular, divides into expletive and attributive. This Difference is founded on the Diversity of that Right which one Man hath to receive any thing from another, which, as we have already observ'd, is either perfect or imperfect; the latter being also term'd Amplitude, in Opposition to strict Right. Therefore an Act belongs to expletive Justice, when we render that to another which is due to him by a perfect Right; but to attributive Justice, when we render that which is due to him only by an imperfect Right. Now the Reason of these two Appellations of Justice seems to be this; whatsoever is due to me by perfect Right, is conceiv'd to be already in some Measure my own ¹, and consequently so long as it is withheld, somewhat of my own is suppos'd to be wanting. (Thus even Names and Titles are reckon'd Part of our Patrimony, and may pass in Payment to others.) So that if a Man pays me what is my Due by a perfect Right, he gives me no new Thing, but only fills up the Place of a Thing which before was absent, and which in the mean Time ² was suppli'd by an Action. For Example, a Man who hath borrowed a Book out of my Study, when he restores it, doth not properly increase my Study, but only ³ fills up a Place made empty on his Account. But such Things as I have only an imperfect Right to receive, I cannot reckon my own, nor put them into my Patrimony; since they depend entirely on the Modesty and common Honesty of another Man, who may not, by any violent Means, be compell'd to pay them. And therefore 'twould be ridiculous, if a Beggar, for Instance, should make over to a Shoe-maker, for the Price of a Pair of Shoes, an Alms which he expects to receive from some rich Person. Thus then, he who renders to another any thing due by imperfect Right, doth properly attribute, give or add to him somewhat which he could not before call his own. For this Reason Grotius calls attributive Justice the Companion of those Virtues which tend to the Benefit and Advantage of others, as Liberality, Mercy, Humanity, and the like. For these Dues Men receive only by imperfect Right. When he adds to these, Providentia reatrix, or State-providence, he is, in our Judgment, chiefly to be understood of the Distribution of those Rewards, to which the Subjects have only an imperfect Right; in which, tho' a greater Liberty may be taken than in giving those which are due upon Contract, yet it would be, perhaps, most adviseable to proportion every Man's Share to his Merits, as the surest Way to prevent Strifes and Complaints⁴. Thus Isocrates (Areopagit. p. 247, 248. Ed. Paris.) observes of the old Athenian Ministers: One Thing which prov'd of great Advantage to them in the Management of the Commonwealth was this; that whereas there are two sorts of Equality, one which gives exactly the same Portion to each Man, and another which proportions Mens Shares to their particular Merits, they were not ignorant which of these two was most beneficial to a State: But rejecting that as unjust, which dealt out the same Allotment to good and bad Men without Distinction, they chose the other which assigns Honours and Punishments according as every Man deserves, for the surest Guide of their Proceedings.

² This Author observes here with Reason, that he uses not the Words Arithmetical Proportion in the Sense of the Mathematicians, tho' we find that Plutarch, De amore fraterno, uses it for an exact Equality; but he speaks of it a little lower, §. 12. properly, when he relates the Opinion of Aristotle.

§. XI. ^a Id apud se quisque habere videtur, de quo habet actionem; habetur enim quod peti potest, i. e. Every one seems to be in Possession of that for which he may have a just Action; for that is possess'd that may be required, Digest. Lib. 1. Tit. 16. De verborum significatione, Leg. cxliii.

² The Author understands by this, either the Act of Engagement into which a Man is entered, or the Right a Man hath to require his Due, which Right he expresses by the Phrase, To have an Action against another.

Aristotelian Terms, he himself gives this Reason, because the Word Συναλλακτικὴ doth not come up to the full Import of Expletive; for, that he who is possess'd of my Goods should restore them again, doth not proceed from any συνάλλαγμα or Commutative Contract, and yet it belongs to Expletive Justice: That is, tho' I have a perfect Right of retrieving what is my own, from any Possessor, yet my Action is not founded upon any Contract made between us about the Restitution; but 'tis sufficient to my Purpose, if I can prove my self to be the true Master and Proprietor of the Thing thus withheld. It is clear then, that there may be an Act of expletive Justice without any συνάλλαγμα or Contract. Neither doth the other Term διανεμητικὴ fully answer that of attributive; because it supposeth a Necessity of many Persons, amongst whom the Distribution is to be made. But now attributive Justice may be exercis'd towards a single Person, when he alone is fit to receive such an Honour, or such a Reward.

XII. Aristotle's Opinion concerning the Species of Justice, as far as we can apprehend, seems to be this: General Justice, which he calls the Universal Exercise of Virtue towards others, is a Duty which belongs to all Men. Particular Justice he divides into three Kinds. First Distributive, which takes in the Partition of Honours or Money, or other Things capable of being divided amongst the Members of the same State. Secondly, Corrective, which consists in rectifying Commutations: And of these some are Voluntary, others Involuntary. The former are made without Constraint, as Buying and Selling, Hiring and Letting to Hire, in Loans, Usury, and Suretiship. The latter consists in Crimes, when Men are forc'd to a Commutation against their Wills: For Instance, when my Goods pass to a Thief; for then there ariseth an Inequality, he having more, and I less than we ought. The Correction then of this Inequality is made by taking from him what he had above his Due, and restoring it to me. Thus, suppose a Man, by the Fraud of the Seller, gives nine Shillings for a thing that is worth but six; three Shillings are to be taken from the Seller and given to the Buyer, to make an Equality. Now between these three Numbers, 3, 6, 9, there is properly an Arithmetical Proportion, the third Number exceeding the second just as much as the second exceeds the first^a. These two Kinds of Justice belong properly and principally to those who bear some high Command in a State. For 'tis the Duty and Office of such, and not of private Persons, to distribute the publick Goods amongst the particular Members; and to correct the Inequalities which arise either in Contracts or Crimes, by reducing them to a Parity. It is the Business of the Judge to reduce those things to an Equality, which upon account of an Inequality are unjust^b.

The third Species of Justice assign'd by Aristotle, is Retaliation, which serves to regulate the Commutations made between Man and Man, by comparing Things that are different and unequal, and reducing them to a Geometrical Proportion. To give an Instance, Were a pair of Shoes to be exchange'd for a Horse, the Question would be, how many times the Price of the Horse contains the Price of the Shoes, which supposing to be twelve times, the Rule of retaliating or compensating is, that twelve Pair of Shoes be given for one Horse^c. And this Species of Justice belongs as well to Men of private, as of publick Capacities. As for our former Remark, that the other Species assign'd by Aristotle, concern'd principally the Magistrates and Judges; this will be easily granted by any who take a closer View of his moral Works: For they will find, that in ranging and marshalling the Virtues, he had always in his Head the Idea of some Grecian State; in which time all the Subjects had not the same Duties to perform, 'tis no Wonder that he hath given us some Virtues applicable only to Men of particular Quality and Degree.

XIII. Mr. Hobbes^d hath advanc'd one single Notion of Justice to comprehend every Kind; making it nothing else but a keeping of Faith, and fulfilling of Covenants; which Opinion he borrow'd from Epicurus^e. Commutative Justice, he says, takes place in Contracts, as in Buying and Selling, Hiring and letting to Hire, Lending and Borrowing, Exchanging, Bartering, and the like. Distributive Justice (tho' improperly so call'd) is, he says, the Justice of an Arbitrator, when being trusted by them who make him Arbitrator, if he perform his Trust, he is said to distribute to every Man his own. Nor will ^e We must not take the Term συνάλλαγμα, Exchange, or Contract, in the natural and ordinary Signification, but in the Sense that Aristotle uses the Word. See the next Paragraph, and Gronovius's Notes upon Grotius.

² Aristotle further goes on and says, Τῆς δὲ κατὰ μέρος δικαιοσύνης — ἐν μὲν ἐστὶν ἴσος, τὸ ἐν ταῖς διανομαῖς ἢ τιμῆς, ἢ χρημάτων, ἢ τῶν ἄλλων, ὅσα μείζω ταῖς κοινανδοῖσι τῶν πολιτῶν — ἐν δὲ, το ἐν ταῖς συναλλαγμασὶ διορθωτικῶν, τὰς δὲ μέρη δὴ, τῶν συναλλαγματῶν τὰ μὲν ἕκαστα ἐστὶν, τὰ δὲ ἄκρῃσι. ἕκαστα τὰ τοιαῦτα, αἷον πρῶσις, ἀλή, δανισμὸς, ἔγγυη, χρῆσις, παρακαταθήκη, μίσθωσις — τῶν δὲ ἀκρῶν, &c. Ibid.

³ By the Word συνάλλαγμα, which signifies a Contract, Exchange, or Commutation, Aristotle means every Action by Virtue of which we are obliged to do any thing to another, whether at present, or for the future: In a word, every Affair in which we may have Commerce one with another. So that we must take this Term in the Sense that it is commonly used in, for we shall afterwards see that it is to be taken in a more large Signification, which would extremely perplex us, if we should follow Aristotle's Notion without Examination, or it were necessary to know his Idea.

⁴ By Crimes, we understand all sorts of Injury done to another.

§. XIII. ^a We ought to observe, That Mr. Hobbes owns no Equality to be observ'd as to the Price of Things, which are the Matter of Contracts. See his Leviathan, Ch. xv.

he allow any other Equality to be observed but this, that since we are all equal by Nature, one Man ought not to arrogate to himself more Right than he allows another, unless he hath obtain'd a greater Right than ordinary, by the Intervention of Covenants. Farther, since, according to his Sentiments, an Injury, or an unjust Action, or Omission, is nothing else but the Violation of a Covenant; he hence infers, that we cannot offer an Injury to a Man, unless we have before covenanted with him. This Assertion is founded on his old Maxim, of the Right of every Man to all Things, which he hath stretch'd far beyond its just Limits; so that he imagines, before any Covenant is made, by which one Man might transfer his Right to another, every Man hath a Right of doing to others what he pleaseth; and thus, only using his Right, he cannot be said to commit an Injury^a. But we shall by and by² shew, that this Right of every Man to all Things can be extended to no farther Sense than this, That Nature allows a Man to use all such Means as Reason shall judge conducive to his firm and lasting Preservation: As indeed Mr. Hobbes himself in his Definition of Right^b, inserts the Use of Reason. But now found Reason will never advise us, out of our own Pleasure and Humour, to put such Affronts on another, as cannot but provoke him to War, or to a reciprocal Desire of hurting us. Besides it implies a manifest Contradiction to say, that upon the Supposal of many Men equal in Rights, each of them hath a Right to all Things; since the Right of one Man to all Things, if it hath any Effect, must extinguish the Rights of the rest; and if the Right hath no Effect upon the others, it is useless, absurd, and ridiculous: For, in moral Account, not to be, and not to be effectual, are much the same. And indeed, how can we call that a Right, which another may oppose with an equal Right? Who would say, I had the Right, of commanding a Man, if he, by the same Right might despise my Orders? Or, that I had a Right of beating another, when he too had a Right of returning my Blows, and, if he pleas'd, with Advantage and Increase? 'Tis certain therefore, that he that doth these Things to another, hath no Right of doing them, and consequently is injurious. On the contrary, the other Party hath a Right that such Things should not be put upon him, and is therefore injur'd. Thus we see, that such Right as being violated produceth an Injury, is not only acquir'd by Covenant, but was given at first by Nature, without the Intervention of any human Act: And so the Assertion, that an Injury can be done to no Man unless we have transfer'd³ something on him by Covenant or Gift, is false and unreasonable.

The other Position of Mr. Hobbes^c, that Justice as well as Property owes its Original to civil Constitutions, we shall hereafter consider and refute.

Indeed, so far is it from being rational to resolve all Justice into Performance of Covenants, that, on the contrary, before we can know whether any Covenant is to be perform'd, we ought to be certain that it was entred upon, either by the Command, or with the Permission of the Laws of Nature; that is, that it was justly made^d.

From what hath been here offer'd, it is farther evident, that altho' otherwise Damage and Injury are very different Things, and though it be possible that^e the Injury of an Action may redound to one Man, and the Damage to another; yet the Inference which Mr. Hobbes draws from this Consideration will not hold, that a bare Damage, and not an Injury is done to him, who is either hurt, or hath something taken from him, by a Man with whom he had pass'd no Covenant. Nor do the Instances which he brings to countenance this Conjecture, make very much to the Purpose^f. When the Master, says he, commands his Servant to give Money, or to do a Kindness to a third Person; if it be omitted, the Injury is done to the Master, but the Damage to the third Person. But indeed, if the Servant does not pay the Money which is due, as he is order'd, the Creditor shall suffer no³ Damage since his Action remains good against the Master. Nor, if a Servant, being commanded to do a Kindness to another Man, fails in performing it, shall the other Man incur any Damage: Tho' he is indeed guilty of Theft, or the like Crime, if he intercept and keep for his own Use, what he ought, on his Master's Account, to have deliver'd to others. For, besides that from the not receiving of a Kindness which is not strictly due, Damage properly so call'd cannot arise^f, the other Person may complain to the Master, who will be sure to compel the Servant to his Duty. And tho' we suppose the Servant to have been never so far from doing an Injury to the third Person, yet for all this, 'tis certain he did not what by Right he ought to have done; because he affords the other Man sufficient

⁴ This ought to be understood either of one and the same Action, in which several have concurred, but so as that some have acted without an evil Intention, and others with a Design to injure; or of an Action done by a single Person, but in such a Manner, as that the Effect redounds to several others, and in Respect to some it is an Injury, but in Respect to others it is a single Damage; as if a Man, designing to kill another, should slay or hurt a third Person, contrary to his Intention.

⁵ He may receive one at least for the present, if he had a necessary Occasion for it, and because he had it not in Hand, he sustained some Loss, or lost an Occasion of getting some Advantage. Further, it may happen, that his Master might become altogether insolvent, or not in a Capacity of paying for a long Time; when any of these Inconveniences happen from this, that a Master has given Money to his Servant to pay his Creditor, the Creditor has a full Right to require, that the Servant pay him that Sum, as a Thing belonging to him, tho' he knows nothing of his Commission; for the Servant, by keeping the Money, does what in him lies to cause the Creditor to lose his Debt. We may also add, the Deceit of the Servant has frustrated the Liberality of his Master; for tho' these Works of Charity are in their own Principle not rigorously due, yet from the Moment that a Master determines to do some Good to the Poor, and he is actually kept out of that Money, that should enable him to give, the Servant, by keeping it, robs the Poor of it, as much as if he had already received it; for Men have a true Right to that which is lawfully given, in respect of the Donor, in so much as that he can't demand it again, unless upon some extraordinary Reasons. See Book v. Chap. iv. §. 1. Note 1. following.

Grounds of a Complaint against him. His other Instance Mr. Hobbes thus propofeth in his Leviathan, Ch. xv. p. 75. Private Men may remit to one another their Debts, but not Robberies, or other Violences whereby they are endamag'd: Because the detaining of a Debt is an Injury only to themselves, but Robbery and Violence are Injuries to the Person of the Commonwealth. Which we are willing enough to admit, provided he will not hence infer, that in Crimes an Injury is not likewise done to the particular Person who is hurt. But as he propofeth the fame in his Book De Cive, Ch. iii. §. 4. it is by no Means to be endur'd. He fays, that in a State, if anyone hurts another, with whom he hath not covenanted, he damageth the Party on whom he brings the Evil, but he doth an Injury only to him who holds the fovereign Power in the State. For, if one of my Fellow-Subjects hurts me by Violence, doth he offer an Injury to the King only, and not to me? Or fuppofe we fhould grant, as Mr. Hobbes defires, that when Men live in a natural Liberty, each of them hath a Right to all Things, yet will this hold good amongst the Members of the fame Republick, who own one common Mafter? As to what he fubjoins, that if the Person who receiv'd the Damage, fhould accufe the other of injuring him, he would be answer'd in this Manner, What are you to me? Why fhould I act according to your Pleafure, rather than my own, fince I don't hinder you from acting by your own Will, rather than by mine? 'Tis fo far from being true, that if no particular Covenants have interven'd, this way of fpeaking will not be free from Reprehenfion, that we fhould rather imagine a Man to be out of his Senfes, who fhould hope by fuch a way of arguing to fatisfy the Complaints of one whom he had hurt. Yet one Thing Mr. Hobbes hath well remark'd, that the Term of Injuftice fignifies with Reference to the Law, but the Term of Injury with Reference both to the Law, and to the particular Person. For, when an unjuft Thing is done, all may call that unjuft, or it is unjuft to all. But an Injury may have been done, not to me, or to him, but to a third Person, and fometimes to no private Subject, but to the State only; as when a Man is kill'd in a Duel, for Instance, upon a fair Challenge. For in this Cafe, the Party who receiv'd the Hurt, cannot complain of having an Injury done him, fince he himfelf agreed to the Chance of the unlawful Combat: But the Legislator may, however, profecute the Survivor for tranfgreffing his Prohibition.

XIV. Having arriv'd to know what Justice is, we may eafily fettle our Notions of Injuftice, and of its feveral Species. An Action, then, is unjuft, either when we apply it defignedly, to a Person to whom we ow'd a different Action, or when we deny another fomewhat which was really his due. That is, We are equally guilty of a Breach of Justice, by doing any Evil to another which we had no Right to do, and by taking from another, or denying him any Good which he had a fair Title to require. ^a For good Things are of that Nature, that they may be given to any Man without a Reason, provided a third Person is not defrauded thereby: And the Evils likewise which a Man hath merited, we may without Injury withhold from him, if at the fame Time we do not endamage others by our Forbearance. An unjuft Action, therefore, either brings upon another Man what it ought not to bring upon him, or denies and withholds what it ought to give him. For the Denial or Omiffion of an Action, is, in moral Account, itfelf an Action.

XV. But an unjuft Action, proceeding from Intention, and trefpaffing on the perfect Right of another, is, in one Word, call'd Injury. Which if we would exactly ftate, we muft again obferve, that a Man may be hurt three ways; either, if he be denied what he ought to have ^a, or if that which he now hath for his own be taken from him, or if fome Evil be put on him by another, who had no juft Right of doing it. As to the firft of thefe Ways, Things may be faid to be due to a Man, either by the bare Law ^a of Nature, yet fo as that he hath no perfect Right to them; of which Kind, are the Offices of Humanity, Beneficence, and Gratitude: Or elfe by Covenant, and that either fuch as is exprefs and particular, or fuch as is contain'd under our Obligation to Civil Laws, by which we engage ourfelves to perform thofe Things towards others, which the Laws command us to exhibit. If Things of the latter Kind are denied a Man, an Injury is properly done; but there is no proper Injury in the Denial of Things which belong to the former Kind; tho' there be a Sin indeed committed againft the Law of Nature. Yet neither doth the Law of Nature itfelf allow of compelling another by Violence to pay thefe Duties (efpecially if the compelling Party have no Power and Authority over the other) unlefs upon urgent Necessity: Since the Nature and Property of thofe Offices requires that they be perform'd voluntarily, and without the Motive of Fear. Thus far therefore, and no farther, will the Maxim of Mr. Hobbes hold true, That an Injury cannot be done, but to a Man with whom a Covenant has been made. But when we ftudiously and induftrioufly bring an Evil on another Man, unconfenting and unprovoking, either by taking from him any Good which he poffeffeth, or by pofitively inflicting on him an Evil: In thefe Cafes an Injury is always done, whether a Covenant hath interven'd, or not. For Nature hath given this Right to every Man, that no Evil be offer'd him from another Man, without his own preceding Demerit: Nor is it allowable for any Person, unlefs when provok'd, to hurt another, any farther than the due Exercife of Government fhall require. We add, unlefs provok'd, becaufe to make an §. XIV. ^a The three following Sentences feem ill placed in the Original, and therefore ought to be altered; and another Expression fhortned, becaufe it contains a needlefs Repetition.

§. XV. ^a Ex mero Jure Naturæ, by which our Author underftands what he elfewhere calls absolute Duties; that is to fay, fuch as are grounded upon the original Conftitution of our Nature, and which every Man is obliged to perform to another Man, confidered precifely as fuch, in Oppofition to thofe who fuppofe fome other Eftablifhment, or other human Act, and which they call Duties conditional. See Lib. ii. Chap. iii. §. the laft, following.

on properly Injurious, there is requir'd the τὸ πρότερον, that it be done first: For Aristotle tells us ², that he who returns another what he first suffer'd from him, cannot be said to do an Injury.

XVI. In an Injury, properly so call'd, it is farther requir'd, that it proceed from Intention and deliberate Design of hurting or vexing another. And therefore the Harm which is done casually in Ignorance and unwillingly, is not us'd to come under the Name of Injury. As suppose a Soldier that is exercising himself, in the usual Place, at casting his Javelin, should strike it through a Man that pass'd by accidentally: Or, if a Lopper of Trees should let fall a Bough upon a Person who had no Right to be in that Place. So Antiphon, an antient Orator, defends a Young-man who had unfortunately kill'd a Child with a Cast of his Javelin: 'He was engag'd, says he, in no forbidden Exercise, but in his proper and necessary Business; nor by himself, but with his Companions in Arms: Nor did he strike the Youth by an unskilful Throw, at a Distance from the Mark: but he guided the Weapon with exact Art and Care, and was so far from doing any Thing amiss, that he rather suffer'd in having his Throw spoil'd, and in being hinder'd from hitting what he so well aim'd at.

Aristotle ² tells us, That the doing of a thing justly or unjustly, depends on its being done voluntarily or involuntarily. And again, That when we do a Hurt beside Reason, it is only a Misfortune; but when we do a Hurt which is not beside Reason, and yet not out of Malice, then we commit an Ἀμάρτημα, or Trespass. On which Place Michael of Ephesus thus comments: Of Hurts, some are done out of Ignorance and against our Wills, others with our Knowledge and Consent. Those which are done out of Ignorance, are again divided into such as are done without any Likelihood, and beside all Expectation; and such as are done, tho' involuntarily, yet not beside all Expectation and Probability. Therefore after the Philosopher hath said, that all Hurts proceeding from Ignorance fall under the general Names ³ of Errors or Trespass-

ses, he then makes a kind of Subdivision, and tells us, that those which are done beside Reason are Misfortunes, and those which are done not beside Reason are properly Trespasses. Now those Things are beside Reason which happen very rarely and unexpectedly; as if a Man by suddenly thrusting open a Door should strike his Father, who stood accidentally behind it; or if, whilst he is exercising himself at his Javelin, in a Place thro' which none are wont to pass, he wounds some body who happen'd to come by when the Weapon was flying. For these, and such like Accidents, fall out beyond all Thought and Expectation. But Actions done indeed ignorantly, but not beside Likelihood or Probability, are call'd Trespasses. For, a Man who exercising his Bow and Arrows in a Place commonly frequented, strikes any Person, doth properly trespass, as a Man is then always said to do, when he himself was the Principle and Cause of the Unluckiness of the Action: But now the Man whom we speak of, was no doubt the Principle and Cause of what he did, since he ⁴ voluntarily chose such a Place to shoot in, where it was probable some body or other would pass by.

An Ἀμάρτημα, or Trespass of this Nature, is what the Civilians properly term Culpa, or a Fault; which they say is committed through Negligence or Unskilfulness, when a Man is either careless or ignorant of such things as he ought, and was able to have known, and to have observ'd. Of Faults they make three Degrees, answerable to the Degrees of Diligence, by the Omision of which the Fault is contracted. First then, there is a ⁵ general Diligence of all Men, not work'd out by Labour and Wit, but deriv'd, as it were, from common Sense. Next to this, there is a Diligence more improv'd ⁶ proper to every Man in his own Affairs; and which is requir'd by Nature in the Management of human Life, according to each Person's Capacity and Parts. Lastly, there is a Diligence of the greatest Exactness and Accuracy, us'd only by the most knowing and experienc'd Men ⁷ in their own Business and

⁶ We may call it, An indirect Will, because he did not directly and formally intend to hurt any Man; but he did, or neglected to do a Thing, from whence a Damage did redound, which was occasioned (as may easily be presumed) by that Action or Omision.

⁸ Si cum distrabere deberet, non fecit, lata culpa, non levi, & rebus suis consueta negligentia; hujusmodi rei rationem reddet, Digest. Lib. xxxvi. Tit. 1. Ad Senatusconsultum Trebellian. Leg. xxii. §. 3. Si venditor eam diligentiam adhibuisset in insula custodienda, quam debent homines frugi & diligentes prestare, &c. Lib. xviii. Tit. vi. De periculo & commodo rei vendita, Leg. xi. Si nihil appareat convenisse, talis custodia desideranda est a venditore, qualem bonus paterfamilias suis rebus adhibet, Lib. xviii. Tit. i. De contrab. empt. Leg. xxxv. §. 4. Si quis non ad eum modum, quem hominum natura desiderat, diligens est, &c. Lib. xvi. Tit. iii. Depositi vel contra Leg. xxxii. It would (for Example) be a small Fault, if when a Man has received a Thing to keep, he leaves it in his Chamber, and puts it not in his Trunk, or forgets to take out the Key of the Trunk where it is. In fine, the Lawyers ordinarily call this sort of Negligence by the Name of Culpa, i. e. a Fault. See, for Example, Digest. Lib. ix. Tit. ii. Ad Leg. Aquilian, Leg. xxxi. but sometimes we mean by it one of the two other sorts, of which we may judge by the Sequel of the Discourse.

Concerns ¹. To this last kind of Diligence they oppose their Culpa levissima; to the second, their Culpa levis, and to the first, their Culpa lata. As to this Culpa lata, they observe, that it is equivalent to Malice and Deceit, in Contracts and other civil Business, and in Cases of Reparation for Damages ². But that ³ in criminal Matters it bears not so hard an Interpretation; where however it doth not take away, but only extenuate the Guilt. The Effects of the Culpa levis and Culpa levissima they shew at Large, when they treat about Performances of Contracts.

The Trespases we have hitherto spoken of, are suppos'd to be done without Intention. But now if a Man through the Violence of his Passions, and only with an imperfect and semiplenary Intention is driven to hurt another, this Hurt shall not be exempted from the Name of Injury, altho' the Man be not immediately, for such a Fact, branded with the Character and Stile, of Unjust ⁴. Aristotle's Distinction is excellent in this Case: An ill Thing, says he, done with Knowledge, but without Deliberation, is unjustly done; such are the Effects of Anger and of other natural and necessary Passions. For Persons who offend on such Accounts, commit Injustice indeed; yet they are not for this Reason accounted unjust and wicked Men, because the Hurt did not proceed from any meditated Malice. But when a Man hurts another out of Choice and Design, then only he incurs the Name of unjust and wicked. Hence Facts proceeding from Anger, are always interpreted as done advisedly; for the Principle and Cause of such Mischances, is not the angry Person, but he who provok'd him to Anger.

XVII. Lastly, It is requisite to the making an Action properly Injurious, that it be done to a Person against his Will. For 'tis a Maxim in every Man's Mouth, that volenti non fit injuria, Nothing can be an Injury when the Party is willing to receive it. Aristotle says, A Man with his own free Consent may be hurt, or may suffer things which are in themselves unjust; but he cannot properly be injur'd, except it be against his Will. See Dig. Lib. I. Tit. 17. De divers. reg. Juris. Nemo videtur fraudare eos, qui sciunt & consentiunt. The Reason of which is, that both the Good which I take from a Man, and the Debt which I withhold from him, with his Consent, are, as it were, Gifts from him to me: But now, who will say I do an Injury, by taking what is given me? Nor can that be esteem'd Evil which a Man desires to receive; since all Evil necessarily includes an Abhorrency of the Will from embracing it. But then it must be suppos'd, that the Man enjoys the full Use of his Reason, and is not transported with the Violence of any extravagant Affection ⁵. Hence Aristotle, Ethic. Lib. v. Ch. xv. gathers, that a Man who in a Passion lays violent Hands on himself, doth an Injury not to himself, but to the State, which he robs either of a General, ¹ Add. Ant. Matth. de Crimin. Proleg. Ch. iii. §. 2, 3. Mr. Hobbes's Definition which he gives in his Book De Cive, Ch. iii. §. 7. is founded upon a wrong Supposition, that Injury consists in nothing but the Violation of a Covenant.

² In all things which are not capable of an exact and mathematical Measure, we may always distinguish three Degrees at least, viz. two Extreams and a Mean, which sometimes comes nearest the First, and sometimes the Last. If we admit of a greater Number, we must determine just to a Point, where each Degree begins and ends, without which there will be no way to discern them: But 'tis not necessary when we confine ourselves to Three. It sufficeth then to consider here Watchfulness as well as Negligence, either as being raised to an higher Degree, or as sinking to the lower, between which is the Medium, which inclines sometimes to one Side, and sometimes to another. Now these middle Degrees (as we may say) must be measured according to the Nature of those things, which are the Objects of our Cares, as they are more or less considerable, and consequently require more or less Caution. This Comment is taken out of Mr. Titius's Observations Ratiocin. in Comp. Jur. Laut. Obs. 397. See also a curious Discourse of Mr. Thomafius, entitled, De usu Pract. Doctr. diffie. Jur. Rom. &c. printed at Hall in Saxony, 1705.

³ Magna negligentia culpa est, magna culpa dolus est. Digest. Lib. I. Tit. xvi. De verbor. signifi. Leg. ccxxvi. See also Lib. xvi. Tit. III. Depositi vel contra, Leg. xxxii. and Mr. Noodt's Probabilia Juris, Lib. i. Ch. xiii. §. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

⁴ In lege Cornelia dolus pro facto accipitur, nec in hac lege culpa lata pro dolo accipitur. Digest. Lib. xviii. Tit. viii. Ad Leg. Corn. de Sicariis & Veneficiis Leg. vii. There is a Case, or as Mr. Titius speaks, a gross Fault in unlawful Actions, which renders them culpable, as well as Deceit, or a bad Intention; as for Example, If a Man orders another to be stricken with a Sword, with a Design only to hurt him, expressly forbidding the Person commissioned to slay him, to whom he would have it done, he shall nevertheless be thought directly and maliciously to have murdered that Person, if he die of the Wound, which may and often does happen, and deserve to be treated as a Murderer. For he indirectly willed it; and being the Effect of a formal ill Design, it ought to be looked upon as a malicious Act, and not as a single Fault. See a like Case, Digest. xviii. Tit. xix. De Pœnis Leg. xxxviii. §. 5. So those that fight a Duel, have a Design often only to wound and hurt one another, yet this hinders not but if one of them be killed, the other shall be counted a Murderer.

² These Limitations are not sufficient to prove the Maxim he is speaking of true, and therefore the Philosopher Hermias with Reason maintains, That no Man must make use of the Ignorance of a Seller, to his own Advantage, unless he will incur the Guilt of doing a great Wrong. A good Maxim, which every one should practise (Phot. Biblioth. p. 1044.) as Mr. Bayle observes in his Historical and Critical Dictionary. To set this important Matter in a due Light, I shall borrow some judicious Restrictions made by Mr. Placet, upon this Maxim in his Treatise of Restitution, p. 74, &c. I. The Consent of the Sufferers ought to be counted for nothing, unless it be absolutely free and voluntary. Now there are three Orders of things which may hinder that Liberty, so that his Consent is not so full and entire, as to authorize what he suffers, viz. In the first Rank is every Thing that debars us of the Use of Reason, as Infancy, Folly, and Drunkenness; in the second, Fear and Force; and in the third, Ignorance, Heedlessness, and Error. As to the first, there is no Difficulty; as to the second, we will suppose that Fear or Force proceeds directly or indirectly from him who gives his Consent; lastly, as to the third, That Consent is of no Use, because he that gives it knows not what he consents to, nor sees the Prejudice which he does himself by it; for if he be ignorant in whole or in part, his Consent is not voluntary, and no Man can, without Injustice, make an Advantage of his Ignorance. Indeed Ignorance renders the Actions which it produces more involuntary, than Fear does, for this does not render an Action involuntary, but when it is caused by him that is to get by it; whereas Ignorance has always that Effect, whatever be the Cause of it. I own, that the Injustice is the more notorious, when he that gets by the Action designedly leads him that gives his Consent, into the Error; but this does not disannul the Contract, when the Gainer is not the Cause of that Ignorance: But he that buys precious Jewels at a low Price, of an ignorant Person that knows not the Value of them, does him an Injury, if knowing it himself he doth not advertise him of it. II. There are two sorts of Rights; the one when we are so much Masters of a Thing, that we can dispose of it as we please, such is that which every Man ral, or a Soldier, or an Artificer, or the like, according as his Station was. Upon which Account it hath been a Custom in most Commonwealths, to punish such Offenders even after their Death, by affixing some Mark of Disgrace on their Bodies, and on their Memory. Add. Mich. Epbes. ad loc.

dictum. Tho' Aristotle's Reasoning in that Place, (the Law commands not a Man to kill himself; but what it doth not command it forbids) is false and absurd; unless we say, that by κελεύει, commands, he rather means permits.

has of his own Goods. The other we can't renounce, because a superior Law forbids it; such is that, which every Man has over his own Life; for we may defend our selves against an unjust Aggressor, tho' we can't deprive our selves of it. The Maxim which imports, That we can't do an Injury to such as consent, has Place only in Respect to the first Sort; for, as to the last, which are in their Nature unmoveable and unalterable, a Consent given to the Violation of them is ever null and void. Thus when an Husband lecherously consents to the Debauching of his Wife, that does not hinder but that Crime is really Adultery. III. Altho' the Consent of him that is deprived of a thing, may be sufficient to acquit him that deprives him of the Injury, in Respect of the Person deprived; yet we ought to take Care, that a third Person, who has some Interest in the Thing, be not injur'd. As for Example, a Wife, Child, or Creditors. IV. Lastly, The Consent of him that is deprived of any Thing belonging to him, must be known to him that does it, if not by a full Assurance, yet by a probable Presumption, grounded upon good Reason; for if it afterwards appears, that the Person who was thought to consent, did not, tho' the Action might be innocent when it was done, yet he ought to make good the Injury done thereby, tho' he did not think he did any.

HAVING done with the Quality, it comes next in our way to say something of the Quantity of moral Actions; or to consider on what Account they fall under different Rates and Measures. Now we find the voluntary Deeds of Men to be capable of undergoing a double Measure or Valuation, either absolutely in themselves, or relatively towards one another. As to the absolute Estimate, the Case is very different in good and in evil Actions. For in a good Action, if we consider it formally and precisely, we discover nothing which bears an Analogy to Quantity: Since the Goodness of it consists only in an Agreeableness or Conformity to the Law, which doth not appear capable of Measure. Hence good Actions, consider'd, as we said, precisely as to their Form, are not better one than the other; tho' they surpass each other in Excellence as to their Matter, with Regard to the Condition of the Object, and to the Intensity or Strictness of the Obligation. But now, an evil Action, as declining from the legal Rule, is conceiv'd to bear a greater or a less Distance from it; and on that Account may, even consider'd formally and in itself, be esteem'd greater or less: In the same manner as one crooked Line may recede farther from a right Line than another doth. For Zeno's Argument in *Diogeus Laertius*³ is not worth confuting: All Sins, says he, are equal; for 'as nothing is truer than Truth, nor falser than Falsity, so neither can Deceit be greater than Deceit, nor Sin than Sin. As he that is an hundred Furlongs from CANOPUS, and he who is only one Furlong distant from the same City, may be said both alike not to be at CANOPUS; so he that sins less, and he that sins more, are both at an equal Distance from doing well. But because this Distance between evil Actions and the Law, if any one will exactly compare them with other Kinds of Quantity, may have some Likeness to a Right-lined Angle, whose Greatness is measured by the Arch of a Circle, having straight Lines drawn from the Circumference to the Center; therefore when I was young, and studied the Rudiments of the Law, I compar'd them to a Circle²; but in my riper Age I have thought it better to lay aside such Niceties, and explain them more plainly.

II. Farther, since to the Goodness of an Action it is requisite, not only that what the Law commands be fully done, but likewise, that it be done with such Intention as is agreeable to the said Law; it appears hence, that to make an Action be esteem'd perfectly Good, there is a Necessity, not only that the Prescription of the Law be answer'd in all its Parts; but besides, that the only thing which prevail'd on the Mind of the Agent, and put him on such a Proceeding, was a Desire of paying ready Obedience to the Legislator. And for this Reason, since we are, in the Divine Law, commanded to love GOD, with all our Hearts, and with all our Souls, and with all our Strength, and our Neighbour as our selves, Mark xii. 30, 31. 'tis manifest, that no Action can be approv'd by GOD Almighty

III. But in human Account so exact a Diligence is not requir'd. For, since our Earthly Lawgivers propose as the chief End of their Constitutions ² the Benefit of their Subjects, which commonly proceed from the outward Performance and Exercise of the Actions, whatever the Intention of the Actor may be; hence they are usually satisfied if the exterior Action be conformable to their Injunctions. And so much the rather, because they are unable to dive into the Recesses of Mens Minds, nor can at all understand the Intention of any Agent, but by Conjectures, and by Signs obvious to their Senes, which are by no means infallible Guides in discovering our inward Sentiments and Purposes. Therefore they value good Actions only as they appear to Sense, or so far as the Reach and Condition of human Sagacity, and the Use of civil Life do admit or require; and are not very solicitous how full or sincere the Intention of the Agent was, provided his exterior Work deserve their Approbation ³. Yet in evil Actions, even amongst human Judges, more Regard is had to the Intention. And where this shall appear to have been absolutely wanting, as happens in things done upon invincible Ignorance or Error, the Action shall be accounted involuntary: And such an Action, as it is not usually imputed to the Agent, so is it conceiv'd to be destitute of all Moral Quantity. But otherwise, an evil Action, undertaken upon Knowledge and Deliberation, as it proceeds from a former and fuller Design. And since an ill Intention is to mortal Judges scarce more evident than a good one, by reason of their Incapacity to search into the Heart; they are us'd to settle this Point by the Help of various Indications and Conjectures, which we shall elsewhere explain at large ³.

IV. With Regard to the Matter of moral Actions, that good Action is esteem'd Perfect in its Kind, which hath attain'd its utmost Complement, or to which no Part is wanting that it ought to have. Those which decline from this Perfection, are reckon'd inferior in a greater or less Degree, according to their Distance from it; whether the Cause of this Defect be, that the Action was destitute of some Part which should have made it compleat; or that it was ¹ only attempted, and not actually perform'd. On the other Hand, of evil Actions, that is reckon'd the worst in its Kind, which hath fully arrived at the End propos'd; and every one is less evil, according as it falls shorter of this final Completion.

And here we must observe a twofold Difference in ² the Objects of Actions, as set down in Laws. For some admit of a Division, others do not: or, to speak more plainly, some are so constituted, that when we exercise an Action about them, we must either entirely perform, or entirely omit them, or do what's directly contrary to them: But in others, it is possible to perform some one Part only, and to omit the rest; or something may be done which is opposite to them, not directly, but in an inferior Degree. We may likewise consider Objects under a second Distinction: For some of them contain things into which they may be divided, as into so many Species. Thus the Affirmative Law of the ³ sixth Commandment enjoining us to succour our Neighbour in

§. iii. ² See Mr. Noodt's Discourse about Liberty of Conscience, translated into French, and printed at Amsterdam in 1707, and what I have said in my Treatise of Sports, lib. iii. ch. vi. §. 19.

³ When the Intention is dubious or equivocal, we ought to incline to that Side which is most favourable to the Agent. There is a pretty Passage to this Purpose in Plutarch, which it may be pleasant to read here. Ἐν μὲν ὅ τοις εὐδοκίμοισιν ἔργοις, καὶ πράγμασι ἐπαινεθῆναι, αὐτὰν φωνῆν ἐπιπέσει. καὶ καταρεταὶ τοῖς διαβολαῖς εἰς ἐπιπέδιον ἀπόπαισι, ὡς ἂν ἐν ἀφανεί προαίρεσις, καὶ πράγματι αὐτῶν [which last Words should rather be read τὰ πράγματα αὐτῶν] τὸ περιγεμένον ἐμφανῆς καὶ διωρόμενος ἵσχυρῶς ἐνδύλον ὅτι φωνῆς καὶ κακοηθείας ἐπιπέδων ἐ λλοῖσι. De Herodoti malignitate. They, who like Herodotus can't deny that an Action is praise worthy in it self, and can find no plain Reason to blame it, will pry into the Secrets of the Heart, and supposing them to be evil, endeavour by their Calumnies to create Suspicions in other Mens Minds, manifestly arrive at the Height of Envy and ill Nature. I observe (says Mr. Montague very well) that the greatest Wits of our Time employ their Ingenuity to darken the Splendor of the brave and generous Actions of the Antients, by putting a bad Interpretation upon them, and devising some vain Causes and Occasions of them. A cunning Cheat! Left I should grant an Action to be very excellent and good, I will find out five hundred vicious Intentions, Lib. i. Chap. xxxvi. The famous Mr. Bayle, in his New Letters upon Mr. Maimbourg's Critical History of Calvinism, Let. xii. §. 12. affirms, That the Laws of Charity, which oblige us to put a favourable Construction upon the Actions of our Neighbour rather than a disadvantageous, are altogether contrary to Reason, but I have endeavour'd to invalidate his Proofs of that Position in my Treatise of Sports, Lib. i. Ch. iii.

§. iv. ¹ An Attempt is counted for an Action, when the Impediment of performing arises from an Impossibility coming on it by some unforeseen Accident, or invincible Hindrance, and not from any Refusal or Discouragement in the Person acting. Seneca has a fine Passage to this Purpose, of which Mr. Hertius cites a Part; 'tis thus, Quaedam ejus conditionis sunt, ut effectum prestare debeant, quibusdam pro effectu est, omnia tentasse, ut efficerent. Si omnia fecit ut sanaret, peregit Melicus partes suas. Etiam damnato reo, oratori constat eloquentis officium, si omni jure usus est. Laus imperatori etiam victo, et duci re dditur, si prudentia, et industria, et fortitudo muneribus suis sancta est. Omnia fecit, ut beneficium redderet, obtulit illi felicitas tua. Nihil incidit durius, quod veram amicitiam expernetur. Locupletari donare non potuit, sano adfudere, felicit succurrere. Gratiam retulit, etiamsi tu beneficium non recepisti. De Benef. lib. vii. Ch. xiii. "Some things are of that Nature, that they must produce an Effect; in other things 'tis the same with an Effect to have endeavour'd. The Physician has done his Office, if he has done all he can to cure. The Pleader, if he has urged the Law well; and a General, if he hath managed with Courage and Conduct, tho' a suitable Success do not follow. Thanks is sufficient, where no Requital can be made."

² The Original expresses itself thus, Objecta Actionum, i. e. The Objects of Actions, but the Object of Action can neither be commanded nor forbidden, but the Person who does, or not does a thing; and so our Author himself uses it in the next Paragraph. Doubtless he means, the Matter of Actions, and the Mistake arises from hence, that in his Elements of the Universal Civil Law, he had said (p. 317.) the Objects of Laws; for in changing the Expression, he was not aware, that Actions would not well fit the Place of Laws.

³ Our Author calls this the fifth, and the next Commandment the Sixth, according to the Lutheran Division of the Decalogue.

all Necessities and Distresses of his Body, contains under it in the Manner of different Species, the Preservation of his Life, of his Members, of his Health, the turning away of any Thing that doth, or may grieve, or molest him, the supplying him with Food in Time of Famine, &c. And the opposite or negative Law, in the same Commandment, forbidding us to hurt the Body of our Neighbour, comprehends, in like manner, Murder, Maiming, Wounds, Stripes, Threats^a, &c.

Thus too the affirmative Law, in the³ seventh Commandment, enjoining Chastity, contains under it, Purity of Thoughts, Modesty of Words and Gestures, Abstinence from unlawful Love, &c. And the opposite Law, forbidding Unchastity, comprehends Adultery, Fornication, obscene Speeches and Gestures, and impure Imaginations. For, to give an Instance in this Case, obscene Words do not respect Adultery in the Way of a Part or Degree: But because the divine Lawgiver was pleas'd, for Brevity sake, to comprehend many special Acts under one general Law, hence it comes to pass, that he who commits simple Fornication, doth as fully and entirely sin against the seventh Commandment, as he that is guilty of Adultery. Therefore, as to these Objects, when what the Law commands is not perform'd, we must of Necessity either quite omit, or do directly the contrary. But other Objects of Actions, as determin'd in Laws, are in such a Manner divisible, that they seem to consist of⁴ integral Parts. So that here it is not necessary we should do all, or omit all, or perform the contrary; but 'tis possible to perform one Part, and to let the rest alone. For Example, the Law commands me to pay the Labourer his full Hire; now I may perhaps pay him some Part of it, and keep back the rest. But when I not only deny a Man his Due, but farther take something from him, or bring any Evil upon him, this Act will be quite of another Species, and bear no Reference or Affinity to the former.

V. Besides all this, since one may be concern'd about a more noble, another about a more ignoble Object; and since one may produce more Good or Evil than another; it is plain, that upon this Account likewise, amongst good Actions some are far better than others, and amongst ill Actions, some far^a worse than others. Horace's^b Instance may serve to illustrate this Truth;

*Nec vincet ratio hoc, tantundem ut peccet, idemq;
Qui teneros caulos alieni fregerit horti,
Et qui nocturnus divum sacra legerit. —*

Reason will never call't an equal Sin,
To rob an Orchard and a sacred Shrine.

Add. Cicero pro Muræon: Where he smartly refutes the Stoicks Notion, that all Sins are equal. And his Paradoxes, Chap. iii. as also Montaigne's Essays, Lib. ii. Chap. ii. in the Beginning, and Gassendus Phil. Epic. Tome iii. Yet in many Cases Horace's Reasoning will hold good, Lib. i. Epist. xvi.

— De mille fabæ modiis quum surripis unum, Dammum est, non facinus pacto mihi lenius isto.

When from a thousand Pecks you steal but one,
Less Loss is felt, but no less Guilt is shown.

And this is the relative Estimation of Actions, which is treated of at large, Book viii. Chap. iii.

^a Vid. Lib. xvii. Tit. x. D. De Injuriis.

^b B. i. Sat. iii. v. 115, 116, 117.

⁴ We must understand them of Parts really distinct one from the other, and which consequently can exist separately.

§. v. ² Since this Author does not express himself either distinctly, or largely enough upon this important Subject here, and in the Place, Lib. viii. to which he refers us, treats of evil Actions only; I shall give you an Abridgment of what he says in his Elements of universal Civil Law. The relative Quantity of Actions may be consider'd, 1. In respect to the Object. For the more noble the Object is, the more is that good Action, done to that Object, better than another; and, on the contrary, an evil Action the more criminal. See Lib. viii. Chap. iii. §. 18. 2. In Respect to the State and Condition of the Agent. And so a Benefit conferr'd by an Enemy, is more considerable, than that which is received from a Friend. And, on the contrary, an Injury done by a Friend is more sharp, and affects more than that done by an Enemy. See the same Place, §. 20. 3. In Respect to the Actions themselves, according as we take more or less Pains to do them. A good Action, the more difficult it is, the more excellent and more commendable, otherwise all Things are equal. On the contrary, the more easily an evil Action may be avoided, the more enormous it is above others of the same Kind. 4. In Respect to the Effect and Consequences of an Action, on which account an Action is better or worse, accordingly as the good or bad Consequences are, or may be foreseen and prevented. 5. In Respect to the Circumstances of Time and Place. See the Place already quoted. In fine, 'Tis evident from this Comparison of good Actions one with another, that some are more excellent than others, according as the Practice of some ought to give Place to the Practice of others, since we can't discharge all at the same Time. See what is said about this, Lib. v. Chap. xii. §. 23.

WHAT Conditions are required to make an Action capable of being imputed, or of being consider'd as really belonging to a Person, we have formerly shewn at large: It remains, that we see how and by what Means it may be actually imputed, so as to produce some moral Effect, either in the Agent, or in some other Man. And here we must first of all distinguish between those Actions which are directed by Law, and those which are left to every Man's free Pleasure. Actions of the former Kind are then said to be imputed to the Agent, when the Legislator or Sovereign declares him to be the Author of them, and at the same Time decrees¹, that the ordinary Effects of such Actions shall redound on him, or shall be conceiv'd as inherent in him. But the latter Kind of Actions are then said to be imputed, when he, who without being bound by any Necessity, hath exercis'd them for the Use and Benefit of another Man, doth signify, that he undertook such an Action for the other Man's sake, and out of an Intention to oblige him. The latter Sense of the Word Imputatio is most frequent in Classick Authors, and the former more in Use with the Divines and Moralists. But there is between them this manifest Difference, the former tends from the Legislator or Sovereign toward the Agent, but the latter proceeds from the Agent, and rests in the Person, for whose Sake or Use the Action was perform'd.

II. The former Kind of Imputation is subdivided into Imputation of Favour, and Imputation of Debt. Imputation of Favour is when a Man, out of pure Benevolence, derives upon another the Effects of an Action perform'd by a third Person; which Effects the second Party had no Right to, without the Grant of the first. Or, when one, out of free Kindness makes a larger Effect redound to the Performer of a certain Action, than the Action would otherwise of itself have produc'd. But this last Instance will hold good in Matters of Reward only², not in Matters of Punishment. For, as such is the Nature of good Things, that they may be given to another gratis, without any Colour or Condition; so, if a Man is not willing to confer a good Thing on another, by the Name of a pure Gratuity, he may lawfully do it under the Notion of rewarding him for some imputed Action, which either did not otherwise belong to him, or could not have given him a Right of demanding such a Benefit. But, on the other hand, common Reason will not allow me, on the same Pretence, to derive on another the Effects of an evil Action, which he is not really guilty of, and without the Imputation of which, these Effects would not follow his natural State and Condition. And therefore 'tis very incongruous and absurd, that either for a Fault purely another's, I should have those Things taken from me, which Nature gives every Man, on the very Account of his being a Man; or that, under the same Colour, such Things should be impos'd on me, as Nature, by an Indulgence universal to all Mankind, hath forbidden us to suffer without Reason. A Prince, for Example, may impute the Father's Merits to a Son not illustrious by his own Achievements; and may, on the Account of those Merits, load him with Honours not otherwise his Due. But to punish the Innocent for the Father's Crime, is (strictly speaking) unreasonable³. This indeed may happen, that the Father's Fault shall be the Occasion of not conferring on the Son, or of taking from him, those Things which he was neither to receive nor to retain, but under certain Conditions. But a Person thus dealt with, cannot be said to suffer an Evil, which his natural State would otherwise have made him a Stranger to. For Nature, in this Case, gave no Security to the Children that they should certainly possess the Parents Goods, or that they should be admitted to the like Posts of Honour: But their Right to those Goods, or those Honours, proceeded on these Conditions and Proviso's, that the Parents should deliver them down safe and untainted, and should not fall under such and such Penalties by their Crimes. Nor can he, by any Means, be said to be in a worse Condition than human Nature admits or allows, who having no paternal Inheritance, is forced to work out his Fortunes by his own Industry.

It is just, likewise, so far to proceed against innocent Children upon Account of their Parents Demerits, as to oblige them to quit the Kingdom or State. For no Man hath a Right from Nature of living in this or that Territory; but³ every one attains to such a Right by some Act of his own, or of other Men: And it may be a Condition of keeping this Right, that he shall lose it in case his Parents are found guilty of some particular and high Offences. It is not repugnant to Reason, that the Possession of a Right should depend on contingent Terms. Though, that the Laws of some Countries are too rigorous and severe in this Point, no Man can pretend to deny.

III. Imputation of Debt consists in this, that those Persons, whose Interest it concerns that an Action be done or not done, do declare that the said Action belongs to the Agent, and that the Effect assign'd to that Action shall redound or fall upon him. Hence, if in any Law a certain Reward be decreed to such or such a good Action, so soon as the Sovereign, or the Guardian of the Laws shall understand that particular Action to have been perform'd by any Man, 'tis manifest, that the Man hath immediately a Right of demanding the promis'd Reward. But when a Man is enjoin'd to do a Thing, solely by the Authority of the Commander, and without any such Proposal of a Reward, he ought to rest satisfied with the bare Approbation of his Superior, and to esteem it a very sufficient Recompence, that he hath avoided his Displeasure, which would necessarily have follow'd upon Default. On the other Side, when an ill Action hath been committed, so soon as the Author of it is discover'd, he hath Reason to fear the Execution of the legal Penalty.

As to inferior Persons, to whom neither the §. 11. ¹The Author will explain, Lib. v. Ch. xii. §. 12. the Distinctions which the civil Lawyers make in treating upon Bargains and Laws, of Things, 1. Odious. 2. Favourable. and, 3. Mixt. But here he treats only of Things advantageous and disadvantageous.

Guardianship, nor the Execution of the Laws do belong, if they either approve a good Action, or reprehend a bad one, their Judgment can affect only the Credit and Character of the Agent. According to that elegant Saying of Diodorus Siculus; Praise is a kind of Reward of Virtue putting us to no Charges, and Dispraise is a Punishment of Vice inflicting no real Wound.

It is farther to be observ'd, that when the Interest of many Persons is concern'd in the doing or the not doing of an Action, if one of those Persons should forgive and not impute it to the Agent, he cannot by this Means abate any thing of the Right of the others, which he hath no Power to controul. Thus, if a Man hath done me an Injury by an illegal Fact, I may forgive him for my own Part and Concern, but at the same Time I do not in the least derogate from the just Pretensions of the Publick, and of the Sovereign Authority. And thus too the Pardon which GOD Almighty is pleas'd to vouchsafe to repenting Sinners, doth not at all impair or hinder the Proceedings of human Judicature. But when all the Persons whom the doing or the not doing of a thing concerns, agree that they will not impute it, in such a Case the Deed is conceiv'd to be Null and Void as to all moral Effects. Now the Persons concern'd in a Thing's being done or not done, are either the Objects or the Directors of the Action; that is, those towards whom the Action is perform'd, and to whom it brings either Good or Evil, and those who have a just Power of guiding and supervising such an Action. For which reason, if, in Case of an Injury, the Deed be forgiven by the Person to whom it was offer'd, by the civil Magistrate, and by GOD Almighty, in moral Estimation it shall be suppos'd undone, and consequently shall be attended with no ill Effect.

IV. Very different from the Imputation of which we have been speaking, is that by which the Agent is said to impute an Action, which he might have omitted, to the Party for whose Sake and Use he perform'd it. A Man who hath exactly fulfill'd the Command of his Superior, may indeed expect the Approbation of his Performance, as from all others, so especially from him who enjoin'd it. But he cannot lay claim to any farther Reward, unless such as is expressly promis'd in the Law. For the same Reason, no Man can demand that it should be imputed to him, in order to the giving him any Right, that he hath abstain'd from a bad Action, forbidden by the Laws, or by any Command of his Superior; but he must be satisfied that his Obedience hath pleas'd him who requir'd it. For since upon acting contrary to the Law, he would have justly incurr'd a considerable Evil, to escape such a Punishment must pass with him for a Reward. Hence in Seneca's Controversies, Lib. iv. Controv. vii. when a Man, who being taken in Adultery by a Tyrant, had forc'd the Sword out of his Hand and kill'd him, desir'd a Gratification from the State, he is put off with this Rebuke, imputat nobis quod deprehensus in adulterio mori noluit. He reckons we are indebted to him, because being taken in Adultery he had the Sense to save his own Life: And Tully, in his second Philippic, denies himself to have any Obligations to Antony upon account of his not being murder'd by him: Here lies the Kindness to me (says he) in your keeping your self from so horrid a Villany? Others maintain the Reasonableness of our present Assertion from this Topick, that the Omissions of ill Actions are purely non Entia, and consequently can have no positive Affections or Properties. Tho' to such an Argument it might perhaps be answer'd, That even these Omissions may, in moral Account, pass for Entities, as they are the real and actual Restrictions and Confinements of our natural Powers.

But now, if for the sake of another Man, I do what I might rightly and properly have omitted, or omit what I might fairly and conveniently have done, it is highly reasonable, that I should impute my Service to him; or, that I should, by virtue of my Right, demand of him to acknowledge my Kindness, and his own Obligation, according to the Quality and Condition of it. This Imputation cannot rightly be laid, unless there was in the Actor a real Intention of procuring some Good to the other Man; and in the Receiver an express, or, at least, a presumptive Consent to admit it. For no Man can impute or reckon to us a Service forc'd upon us against our Will: And it would be a much higher Degree of Impudence, to charge such a Fact to us for a Kindness, as was perform'd either without any Regard to our Benefit, or perhaps with a Design to hurt us. Thus he must be extremely foolish, who would desire a Reward from a Man whom he had restor'd to Health by breaking an Imposthume, otherwise incurable, whilst he intended to give him a mortal Stab. Yet Marius Celsus, in Tacitus^b, when he was brought before Otho as one of Galba's Servants and Confidants, immediately confessing his Loyalty to his old Master, propos'd it as an Example, how faithful he would be to the new Emperor; and thus reckon'd he had already oblig'd Otho by sticking resolutely to Galba. And thus Eudoxia, when she was married to the Emperor Theodosius, sent for her Brothers, by whom she had been formerly expell'd her Father's House; and was so far from resenting their Injury, that she rather paid them Thanks, as the Authors of her Promotion: Since unless she had been driven from Home, she had never seen Constantinople^c.

When the Parties concern'd and interest'd do agree in defining the Rate at which a Thing shall be reckon'd or imputed, in this Case a Covenant intervenes, expressing how far, or to what Value the Imputation shall extend, and beyond which it shall not reach in any Business or Transaction^a. For Merit (as Mr. Hobbes^b observes) presupposeth a Right, and implies, That the Thing deser'ed is due by Promise.

V. Hence 'tis easy to gather what is the Force of Merit, or what Actions are properly meritorious, which some Men would vainly set to the Account of GOD himself. Now the main Spring of all Merit is the Performance of a Work which we did not owe: or, which the Person towards whom it is exercis'd, had no Right of requiring from us. For he that performs a Thing which he lay under a full and perfect Obligation of doing, only dischargeth his necessary Duty, and lays no Foundation for any consequent Merit. M. Senec. Cont. Lib. i. Ch. viii. ¹ *Give me leave to perform some Service to my Country, which may properly be a Piece of Merit: What I have hitherto done in the common Course of Arms, is not owing to me, but to the Laws. Julius Capitolinus, in his Life of Antoninus Pius, reciting the Reason of the Emperor's obtaining that Title, from lending his Hand to support his antient Father-in-Law, in the Presence of the Senate adds, This Action was really no great Argument of Piety: Since the Debt we owe our Parents is such, as rather denominates a Man impious if he neglects, than pious if he pays². Neither is it fair to impute a Thing which we do not owe to a Person against his Consent; and much less, if our doing of such a Thing did not turn to his Benefit. Whence it is clearly apparent, that no Man can pretend to any Merit with Reference to Almighty GOD, ever tho' it were possible for him to pay a full Obedience to all the Divine Laws. And that, therefore, GOD cannot any other way become a Debtor to mortal Men, but upon account of his free Promise, the Breach of which would be repugnant to his³ Goodness; not that any Right, properly so call'd, is thence deriv'd to us. Indeed no Actions enjoin'd by Virtue of a supreme Authority, do produce Merit towards the Enjoiner. For tho' both the Sovereign of Heaven, and the inferior Rulers of the Earth, are wont frequently to confer certain good Things on those who comply with their Commands, in order to the encouraging and exciting their Obedience; yet to the Payment of these good Things they are not bound by the Merits of the Agent, or as in the manner of Covenants; but by their own free Offer and Promise: And therefore they cannot be so properly call'd Rewards as Gratuities in the strictest Sense of that Word^c.*

But notwithstanding all this, if the Legislator do expressly declare, that upon the Performance of such or such an Action, the Agent shall have a Right of demanding such a Reward; there's no doubt to be made, but he may fairly and justly require it. But the bare Omission of forbidden Actions is utterly unable to produce any Merit, or any Matter for Boasting or for Praise. Philosofrat. de Vit. Apollon. Tyan. Lib. vi. Ch. i. ⁴ It is not an Act of Justice to abstain from Injustice, nor an Act of Prudence to have declin'd a foolish Resolution; nor of Valour not to desert one's Colours, nor of Temperance not to fall into the base Effeminacy of the Medes; nor will a bare negative Goodness entitle you to any Commendation: When we escape Punishment, but yet do nothing worthy of Honour and Reward, such an Indifference cannot reasonably be call'd Virtue. Add Luke xviii. 11. Ammian. Marcell. Lib. xxx. Ch. xi. To forbear Plunder and Rapine, is a false Foundation for Praise.

It remains then, that the only Actions whereby we cannot obtain Merit towards other Men, are such as we do not owe them; at least, not by a full and perfect Obligation: Whether natural Reason either commands or adviseth them in general, leaving the Application of them to particular Persons in our Power; or whether they are only not enjoin'd by the civil Laws. For whatsoever I owe another as a full and proper Debt, to that he hath already a Right, and therefore when I pay such a Due, I do not, properly speaking, part with any thing which I have then a Right of retaining or of otherwise applying, because upon denying and keeping it back, I should bring a real Injury and Damage on the Person to whom I stand engag'd. And therefore since Things which I owe in this Manner, do already belong, in some respect, to another Person, and I have no longer a Power to dispose of them as I please, they cannot be proper Matter for the founding of Merit. But when I perform any thing towards another Man, which I was not bound to pay by any perfect Obligation, such a thing really passing from me, and accruing to him, leaveth in me either a perfect or an imperfect Right of receiving an equivalent Return. And this is properly Merit^d; the Retribution or Payment of which, when it is determin'd by express Covenant, we call Wages: But when as to the Manner, the Time, and the Quantity, it is left to the Equity of the other Party, it bears the Name of Reward. Now upon such Accounts and Considerations we may receive four Kinds of Things, ^e Corporeal, Incorpo-

§. v. ¹ The Latin of Seneca is this, Sine me aliquod meritum in patriam conferre, adhuc militia mea Legis munus est. And Julius Capitolinus's Words are, Quod quidem non satis magnæ pietatis est argumentum, quam impius sit magis, qui ista non faciat, quam pius, qui debitum reddat, Ch. ii.

² The Author might have added here, the Words which an antient Rhetorician makes his Son speak, when his Father would hinder him from going to War the fourth Time, to secure him from the Danger. Sine me aliquod meritum in patriam conferre, adhuc militia mea Legis munus est, Seneca Controv. Lib. i. Contr. 8. Suffer me to do a meritorious Service to my Country, for as yet I have done no more in War than I was obliged to do by the Law.

³ Or rather his Veracity; which this Author himself mentions in his Elements of Univers. Jurispr. and therefore unfitly omits it here. For it is properly out of his Goodness that GOD at first promises a Reward to our imperfect Performance; but his Veracity, that he performs such Promise. See Nehem. ix. 8. 33. 1 John i. 9. where he is called Just, who departs not from the Truth, neither in his Discourse nor Department.

⁴ The Greek, Μη ἢ εἶναι δικαιοσύνην, τὸ μὴ ἀδικεῖν ———— ἕτε ἢ φρόνησις, τὸ μὴ ἀνοήτως τι εὐθυμειῖσθαι ἕτε ἀνδρεία, τὸ μὴ λήπειν τὰ τῶν ἄλλων σωφροσύνη, τὸ μὴ εἰς τὰ ἴδιον μόνον ἐπιπέτεσθαι ἕτε ἀξιοεπαινετὴ, τὸ μὴ κακῶν φάσις. πᾶν γὰρ ὁ τιμῆς τε καὶ τιμωρίας ἰσὺν ἀξιοῦμαι, ἕτοι ἀρετῆ.

real, Moral, and ^o notional. Of the first Sort are, Money, Land, &c. Of the second, the Grant of Privileges and Immunities: Of the third, Honours and Dignities: Of the last, Statues, Inscriptions, Crowns, and the like Tokens and Testimonies of Worth. Add. Montaigne's Eff. Lib. ii. Ch. vii.

And thus, as hath been shewn, Merit ariseth from those Actions which we do not owe to others; and chiefly as they are useful and beneficial to them. On the contrary, from evil Actions, especially such as damage or injure others, ariseth Demerit; by Virtue of which a Man is oblig'd to make Satisfaction for the Harm he hath done: But in general, all evil Actions produce a Guilt, by which the Agent is suppos'd liable to undergo some Penalty: Which Point we shall hereafter find more Room to explain. See Lib. viii. Ch. iii.

VI. As the actual applying of Imputation causeth the Effects of moral Actions to exist; so the ceasing, and as it were the recalling of it, doth dissolve and extinguish those Effects. And as to this Matter, the Case is very near the same in good Actions and in evil. For both good and evil Actions, whilst they are such, or so long as they are enjoin'd or prohibited by the Laws, must necessarily be attended with Imputation; at least ^a in the first and plain Import of that Term. But when a Law is repeal'd, the Action about which it was concern'd can no longer be imputed. The Imputation of an Action not properly due, he alone can remit, whose Interest it is that the Effect or Consequence of the Action should be made good. Therefore if he who hath perform'd a Work remits the Imputation, the Wages otherwise due cannot on any account be demanded. But to make this Release or Remission, is not in the Power of the Person for whom the Work was done; it being the Creditor's Part to forgive, and not the Debtor's. So likewise to take off the Imputation of an ill Action, as to any Force and Efficacy, belongs to those whose Interest it is that such an Action be attended with its due Effects; that is, to the Party injur'd, and to the Maker and Guardian of the Law, not to the Author of the Fact.

The Civilians reduce the chief Ways by which Crimes are cancell'd or extinguish'd in Human Courts, to these Five. First, when the Punishment defin'd by the Law shall be compleatly undergone: For no Man is punish'd twice, and with equal Severity for the same individual Fault. Though many Punishments indeed leave a kind of lasting Stain behind them ^a, and frequently after the Completion of a corporal Punishment, moral Punishment or Infamy, with its scandalous Marks, continues. Secondly, he whom the Judges have acquitted, passeth in Human Esteem for an innocent Person. The third Way is, when the Delinquent dies. Tho' sometimes in extraordinary Crimes, for a Terror to others, Severities are shewn on the Body, the Goods, and the Memory of Wretches after they are dead. Fourthly, by Length of Time Crimes are so far taken away, as that the Author cannot be afterwards try'd on the same Account. Senec. Oedip'.

Latere semper patere, quod latuit dia. V. 826.
What long hath lain conceal'd should ever lie.

Tho' Lyfias (Orat. xii.) denies that a Crime can be blotted out by any Space of Years. The fifth and last Way is the procuring of Pardon for the Offence from the sovereign Power ^b.

As the Effects of an evil Action do so long lie dormant, as the Action is either conceal'd, or thoroughly dissimul'd or pardon'd (as it were) beforehand: So when once these Effects have broken out in Publick, their moral Part may indeed be effac'd, but not their physical. For what is once done, cannot in a physical or natural Sense be render'd undone; but it may be so order'd, as that it shall no longer have any moral Effect in civil Life. Thus a Man who hath been whipp'd for a Misdemeanor, must still keep the Scars and Signs in his Back, tho' all the Disgrace and Scandal of the Punishment may be remov'd by a Decree of the Government. And when the Imputation is taken off, the Action is to all Intents and Purposes, no more than if it had never been done ^c.

We need only add by way of Remark, that those Authors are strangely overseen, who in order to the taking away the Guilt of an evil Action, besides the Non-imputation, or the Forgiveness of it, require the Infusion of some contrary Quality, or of the Habit of Justice and Honesty: In the same manner, as by plaistering over a Wall we rid it of the Spots that were in it before; and as we drive away an ill Smell by burning Frankincense in a Room. Which Mistake was occasion'd by their Ignorance of moral Things, and because they imagin'd that moral Qualities were produc'd and destroy'd in the same way as physical: The Absurdity of which Notion is plain enough from what we have before deliver'd.

^c And thus we are to understand those Sentences of Ovid de Pont. Lib. i. El. i.

Estque pati poenam quam meruisse minus.

'Tis less to feel, than to deserve our Doom; [?]

Pœna potest demi, culpa perennis erit.

The Penalty may cease, but ne'er the Crime.

Mors faciet certè, ne sîm cum venerit exul,

Ne non peccarim mors quoque non faciet.

Death's kind Release may end my banish'd State.

My Sin will live, and mock the Power of Fate.

§. vi. ¹ To understand this, we are to know, that this Author (in his Elements of Univers. Jurispr. p. 357.) divides Imputation into Simple and Efficacious: Simple Imputation consists in simply approving or disapproving an Action, so far as there redounds no Effect from it to the Agent. And this Sort of Imputation may be made indifferently by any, whether he hath any Interest or no in the Action that is done, or not done. An Efficacious Imputation is that which produces some Effect, with Relation to the Agent; and this belongs to those, whose Interest it is, that the Action be done or not.

² Our Author here quotes the Words of Seneca's Oedipus, where an Old Man advises Oedipus to keep that always secret, which had long lain hid. This can hardly be thought to our Author's Purpose: For, it plainly appears by what follows, and is spoken by the same Old Man, that he intends nothing about the Imputation of Crimes, for (thus he says) Sepe eruentis veritas patuit malo. v. 827. they who make such Discoveries, often endamage themselves by laying open the Truth.

I. AVING in the preceding Book explain'd the Condition of moral Things in general, together with the most frequent Uses of the Common Terms (which Notices, if inserted otherwise, and only as Occasion serv'd, would have interrupted us in our Business, and broken the Series of our Undertaking) we come now to fall more directly on our main Design; and the first Enquiry we are here to make, is, whether it would be convenient or not for Men to pass their Lives without the Restraint of any Law. Whence it will evidently appear, why the All-wise Creator hath not invested them with such a wild Liberty, as should empower them to act merely as they list, and as their wandering Inclinations lead them; without being under the Restraint of any Rule, [†] Necessity, or Law. For since GOD Almighty has been pleas'd to endue Man with a Will (that is, with a Power working by a kind of internal Impulse, and enabling him to incline towards such things as appear agreeable to him, and to turn from such things as seem inconvenient or unpleasant) and with such a Will as cannot be compell'd; a Doubt may be rais'd, whether it did not become the Divine Goodness to allow him the full Range of this flexible Faculty, without any Limit or Impediment. For to what Purpose, some will say, did GOD first make us intirely free to all Things, and afterwards confine us to certain Bounds and Rules? And as the Motion of our Joints is render'd useles by the Restraint of Chains and Fetters; so may the Liberty of the Will seem vain and of no manner of use, if we can incline to many things which must of Necessity be forborn, and if we can be averse to many things, which we must as necessarily pursue and undertake.

II. In tracing this Point to its proper Spring, we think it convenient first of all to shew, that an absolute Liberty would be so far from being useful, that indeed it would be destructive to human Nature; and that therefore the binding and restraining it with Laws is highly conducive to the Good, and to the Safety of Mankind. And this Consideration rightly pursued, will at the same time discover what Scope may be fairly indulg'd, and how far the Reins may be given to our Freedom. Here then we must know, that Liberty in general implies, an internal Faculty of doing and of omitting, things according to the Direction of our Judgment. When we call it [†] a Faculty or Power, we intimate, that the Person to whom this Liberty is

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. I. § i.

§ i. [†] Our Author does not treat here of a physical, but moral Necessity, such as is explain'd, Lib. i. Chap. vi. § 4. ad fin. and Chap. vii. §. 2. Necessity is no more than an Obligation.

§ ii. [†] Our Author says only, A Faculty, which Term implies no more than a Power of Acting, or Moving, &c. for there are Faculties purely Passive, and therefore I have added this Definition of a Faculty to do, or not, that we are to understand by it, a Power of Acting or Moving, not only itself, but communicating a Motion to other Things, and modelling them after a certain Manner.

applied, is Master of sufficient Strength for many Performances, and has a Force and Ability not only to move himself, but to imprint Motion on other Things, and to affect them in a certain Manner. We term this Faculty internal, to signify that its Force and its Motion arise from an inward Principle, contrary to that outward and violent Impulse, which is the Cause of Movement, rather in a Log than in a Man. Lastly, we add according to the Direction of our Judgment, to hint that the Motion is not rais'd at a Venture, or by some blind kind of Force; but that the Agent is suppos'd, in some Degree at least, to have had a Knowledge of the Object, and to have determin'd himself to Action after some sort of Deliberation, so that the immediate Reason of his acting shall be, because he was pleas'd to act. At the same Time it will be understood, that all Rubs and Hinderances, which may either prevent the Motion, or turn it another Way, ought to be suppos'd absent, when we state the Notion of Liberty in Perfection and without Alloy.

III. Matters being thus settled, if we cast our Eyes over the universal Frame of Things, we shall find that many have no Liberty at all, such as are all inanimate and vegetative Creatures. Others enjoy several Kinds of Liberty, and in several Degrees. An universal Liberty, void of all Hinderance and of all Defect, is applicable only to GOD Almighty; this is conceiv'd as the most noble Attribute of his most perfect Essence, admitting no Bounds or Circumscription, and intimately join'd with Omnipotence. And therefore, the Reason why GOD doth not do some Things, or why he doth not always do all Things, is not to be fetch'd from the Deficiency of his Liberty, but from his own absolute Pleasure. So likewise when we say, he cannot do all Things, this does not proceed from any outward Impediment, whether natural, or moral; but from his own Intention and Design, which we Mortals endeavour to conceive in Proportion to his Greatness and his Excellency. In which Sense we are to interpret that common Saying, That GOD is a Law to himself. Thus too the Justice which we ascribe to GOD, is not to be suppos'd to bear a Regard to any Obligation, or to any Right in another Person, as the Nature of human Justice necessarily implies. But in as much as he has shewn, both by his Works and by his Revelations, that such a Manner of acting is suitable to his most compleat Nature, hence we come to express it by the same Term which denotes our own equitable Dealings towards other Men. Thus the Reason why GOD's Promises do not fail, is not because his Liberty is restrain'd by any Obligation arising from his Promise; but because it is agreeable to the divine Excellency to let us not expect in vain, what he commands us to expect; or because to violate a Promise, implies some kind of Imperfection, from which the supreme Nature is most immensely remov'd. Upon which account, we Men do not challenge the divine Promises as of Right belonging to us, but receive them with Humility and Reverence, as Gratuities proceeding from GOD's free Pleasure. For 'tis not here as in human Promises, where there lies an Obligation to Payment, where the Promise turns into a Debt, and what was before free, is brought under a Necessity: But those Things which GOD performs upon Promise, do as fully retain the Nature of Gifts and Benefits, as those Things which he dispenses without any such seeming Engagement. Thus may we weak Mortals faintly represent the divine Liberty; but that alone which we can determine with Certainty about it is, that it surpasses, in an infinite Manner, both our Notion and our Condition.

IV. Brute Creatures which are plac'd below our Degree of Being, do however enjoy a Liberty proper to their Nature and State. But this Liberty cannot be otherwise than very ignoble, since the Power of these Animals is confin'd to such narrow Bounds, and since such is the Dulness of their Senses, and such the Lowness of their Appetite, that they are concern'd about very few Objects, and regard even those but very negligently and superficially; nor are excited by any Thing but what is extremely gross and perpetually obvious, and tends to the Service of their Belly. As to other Matters, they have no Custom, no Law, no Right to bind them, in transacting either with one another, or with Mankind. Amongst a few of them there is some Semblance of Marriage, but of such as is observ'd in the bare Act of Conjunction, and in some Shew of Love or Liking, not in any Strictness of serious and constant Fidelity. Most of them, as soon as they have satisfied their lustful Desires, retain no farther Mark of Love, no Sense of Shame, no Regard of Offspring. Some indeed are most passionately fond of their Young, but then their Kindness continues no longer than till they are able to provide for themselves. After this Period, all Love is lost and forgot on both Sides; the Dams take no Care or Notice of their Progeny, and the Progeny do not shew any Gratitude, any Sense of Debt or Duty to their Dams. Those Beasts which feed on Flesh, tear and devour without Distinction, whatever is agreeable to their Palate; and many when they fall out, pull one another in Pieces without Regret. Being ignorant of the Laws of Propriety, whenever a sharper Hunger than ordinary pinches them, we may see them fighting furiously for the common Pasture or Prey; and what some have laid up or seiz'd for their private Use, the others make no Scruple to invade and to devour. Nor is there among them any such Thing as Esteem, as Honour, as Command, as Prerogative, unless such as is deriv'd purely from Superiority of Strength. It must be confess'd, that Likeness of Kind does produce in some Creatures a Shew of Friendship and of Society. Hence many delight to live in Herds, and those which are more fierce than others, have some Aversion to preying on their own Kind. Thus Juvenal observes, Sat. xv. ver. 159, &c.

^c There are, in general, two sorts of Obstacles or Impediments, which hinder us from acting according to our own Wills, the one physical, as Bonds, Fetters, Prisons, &c. The other Moral, as a Bond, Law, Government, Authority, &c. Elem. Jur. Univers. p. 20.

^f See Note 2. of §. foregoing. When we say that GOD can't do a Thing absolutely, as for Example, Lye, or be worse than his Word: for since there is no Being superior to GOD, to lay any Obligation upon him, nor more powerful than he, to hinder him from doing as he pleases, or to constrain him to abstain from certain Things, and do others, the Inability which we attribute to GOD can proceed from nothing but his own good Pleasure, and infinite Perfections, Ibid. See Chap. iii. §. 5, 6. following.

MR. T A T E.

But, not to say that there's something of a Poetical Figure in these Expressions, we may only take notice, that this seeming Relation is but a very weak Bond for a lasting Friendship: since 'tis immediately broken whenever the Concerns of the Belly intervene. Thus you shall see a Litter of Puppies play very lovingly together, but throw a Piece of Meat amongst them, and you breed a dangerous and a general Quarrel. The Reason why some Creatures exercise a little Shadow of Duty, Love, Faith, and Gratitude towards Men, is purely to be refer'd to Custom, and to their Desire of being supplied with Food. If these Obstacles are once remov'd, and if they find themselves of sufficient Strength, Man himself cannot escape their Violence, if he unhappily provokes them. The Liberty of Brutes then is not restrain'd by any intrinsic and moral Tie: Tho' their external Motions are often violently put under Confinement by Men. Now if any one is so curious as to enquire on what Account brute Creatures are allow'd so unbounded a Freedom, the plain Reason seems to be, because GOD Almighty has not given them a Mind capable of the Knowledge of Right and of Law. There was indeed no Occasion to be so very careful and exact in en-ring the Safety and Preservation of such Beings, as are not only produced by Nature with such vast Fertility and with so little Pains, but are likewise denied the Privilege of an immortal Soul; and whose Life consists in nothing else, but in the curious and accurate Disposition of the little Parts of Matter, with the additional Benefit of Motion. Hence GOD is pleas'd, in producing and in destroying these inferior Animals, to give us frequent Instances, and evident Tokens of his Power. Another Reason why Brutes had no need of the Restraint of Laws, is, because their Appetite is rais'd by nothing else but by Hunger, or Thirst, or by salacious Desire, for their Satisfaction in all which Enjoyments Nature has made such large Provision. Neither is it likely, that their unlimited Way of proceeding should render them very hurtful and destructive to Mankind, since we are enabled, by our superior Strength and Cunning, to prevent any such unhappy Effects^a.

V. Now why the great Creator should not indulge us Men in so lawless a Liberty, many Reasons may be given, arising both¹ from the primitive and from the accessory State and Condition of human Nature. The Dignity of Man, and his Excellency above all the other Parts of the animal World, made it requisite that his Actions should be squar'd by some Rule; without which no Order, no Decorum, no Beauty can be conceiv'd. Hence it is his greatest Honour that he has obtain'd an immortal Soul, endu'd with the Light of Understanding, with the Faculties of judging and of choosing Things, and with an admirable Capacity for Arts and Knowledge. On which account he is justly term'd,

Sanctius——animal, mentisq; capacius altæ
———Et quod dominari in cætera possit.

an Animal blest with Loftiness of Mind and with Sanctity of Reason, and fram'd for the Dominion and Sovereignty of all the rest^b.

Farther, That the Soul was design'd by the All-wise Creator for a much nobler End than to serve only as Salt to keep the Body fresh, may be gather'd from this Consideration, that the greatest and most shining Part of its Faculties are such as contribute either little or nothing to the Preservation of the Body, which² might be secur'd without any such mighty Parade, without so great and pompous a Provision. It's plain, that the Power and the Activity of the rational Soul³ is chiefly exercis'd about such Things as belong⁴ to the Worship of GOD, and to a Life⁵ of Society and of Civility. And 'tis principally for ^a Add Charron of Wisdom, B. i. Ch. xxxiv.

^b Solinus (cap. iii.) calls Man a Being whom Nature has preferr'd to all others in Excellency of Sense, and in Capacity of Reason.

§. v. ¹ We must understand by the Primitive State, that in which Man was when he came out of the Hands of his Creator, considered purely and barely as a Man, before he had any Use of his Faculties, where his accessory State (post superveniens) is that wherein he is left to himself, and consequently supposes the Use of his Faculties. The first is treated of in this Paragraph, and the other in the three following.

² This appears from the Example of some Beasts which live a long Time, as Stags; and of some Trees, as the Oak, which continue a long Time, tho' they have no Sense. Cumberland, Chap. ii. §. 4.

⁴ See Chap. iii. §. 20. following, Nota 2.

⁵ Cicero observed this, when he reckoned up the Advantages of Men above Beasts in these Matters, in these Words, Eademque natura, vi rationis, hominem conciliat homini ad Orationis & ad vitæ Societatem——Nec vero illa parva vis nature est, rationisque, quod unum hoc animal sentit, quid sit ordo, quid sit quod deceat, in factis, dictisque qui modus, i. e. "Nature by the Force of Reason renders Men fit for Conversation——Nor is this a small Force of Nature and Reason, that Man only is sensible what Order is, and how both Words and Actions are to be moderated." De Offic. Lib. i. Chap. iv. See also De Legibus, Lib. i. Chap. vii.

the Service and Furtherance of these Great Ends, that it can * from known Things infer and explain those which are less known, that it can discern and judge what is agreeable and what disagreeable to it; that it can form universal Notions by Abstraction from Singulars; that it can by proper Signs communicate its Notions to others, can form Inventions, can apprehend the Nature of Numbers, Weights, and Measures, and compare them with one another; that it can perceive the Beauty and the Force of Order and Method; that it can either raise, or repress, or moderate Affections; that it can hold in Memory an endless Compass of Things, and call out, as it were at its Beck, any Part of the Stock which it has Occasion to use; that it can turn its Sight inward upon itself, recollect its own Dictates, and by them judge of its Actions, whence arises the Force and the Authority of Conscience. Of all these Powers and Abilities there would be very little Use, or rather none at all, in a lawless, a brutal, and an unsociable Life †. Now the more Gifts GOD has bestow'd on Man, and the greater Inlargements he has granted to his Wit and Mind, the more base and unseemly would it be, that all these noble Endowments should rust for want of Culture and Regulation, should be vainly spent and squander'd away without Use, without Order, and without Grace. Nor was it altogether in vain, that GOD indued Man with a Mind apprehensive of Accuracy and of Decency; but it was without doubt intended, that he should so employ the Powers he had receiv'd, as to manifest the Glory of his Creator, and to promote his own true Interest and Happiness. The Heathen Poet was able to make such an Inference as this :

----- *Quis dubitet hominem conjungere caelo ?
 Eximia natura dedit linguamq; capaxq;
 Ingenium, volucremq; animum; quem deniq; in unum
 Descendit Deus atq; habitat, seq; ipse requirit.*

Then who can doubt that Man, the glorious Pride Of all, is nearer to the Skies allid ?
 Nature in Men capacious Souls has wrought,
 And given them Voice expressive of their Thought.

In Man the God descends, and joys to find
 The narrow Image of his greater Mind.

Mr. CREECH.

VI. Another Reason why it was inconvenient to allow Man the same extended Liberty as Brutes, † was his prodigious Corruption and Degeneracy so many Degrees beyond theirs. That we charge him thus, no one will wonder, who has had the Curiosity to reflect a little on the various Pursuits and Inclinations of Mankind. Beasts are solicited only by their Belly and by their Lust: And then their Lust has some Shew of Temperance, provoking them only at certain Times and Seasons, and being exercis'd not for empty and superfluous Pleasure, but for Increase and Propagation of their Kind. Oppian Cynege. Lib. iii. v. 151, 152.

Ὅου γάρ τοῖς θήρεσι νόμος· γαστήρ ὅτε πλήθει
 Ἔις λέχος ἐρχόμεοις τελέειν φιλοτήσιον ἔργον.

Beasts in their Joys a decent Temp'rance keep;
 Nor offer Love, when 'tis the Time for Sleep.

But the carnal Desires of Men do neither observe any set Times for their Eruption †, nor are by any Means so moderate in their Heat, as to make no further Efforts than are necessary for the Preservation of human Species. Again, the Hunger of Beasts is easily satisfied with such Food as Nature has spread in all Places for their Sustenance; nor do their Meals stand in need of the Formality of Furniture, or of the Incentives of Sauce. And when they find this Appetite reliev'd and quieted, they put an End to their Business and their Care. (Nor are they very forwardly dispos'd to Rage or Mischief †, provided they are unprovok'd, and that their two chief Desires are at rest.) But now the Food of Man must not only satisfy his Belly, but tickle his Palate †. Nature has taken care that Beasts should have no need of other Cloathing besides what she has given them. But Man turns the Infirmary of his Nakedness into an Occasion of Vanity and Pride. Besides, do not Men float in a whole Tide of Affections and Desires, utterly unknown to Beasts? §. VI. † Lycurgus, an antient Poet, quoted by J. Lipsius upon Seneca, Epist. ciii. says, That were it not for this, no Laws need be made for Man; and that Man is naturally a fierce Beast, who differs nothing from them we call so, but that he lifts up his Head towards the Heavens. His Words are these,

Φεῖ πῶς πόνηρον ἐστὶν ἀνθρώπων φύσις
 Τὸ σανάλα· Οὐ γὰρ ἂν πόλ' ἐδύθη νόμος
 Οἷς τι τ' ἄλλων διαφέρει θηρίων Ἄνθρωπον; Οὐδὲ μικρὸν, ἀλλὰ σθηματι.
 Πλαγὶ ἐστὶ τ' ἄλλα, τῶτο δ' ὄρθον θηρίων.

Mr. Hertius has collected together abundance of Authorities about this Matter, which we may find in his Flourish of Civil Prudence, Part I. Sect. i. §. 5. &c. I know they are not all to the Purpose, nor taken at the first hand; nor the first of them gives a just Suspicion to the contrary. Seneca says indeed, Exterum idem semper de nobis promittimus debemus, malos esse nos, malos fuisse, invitum adiciam, & futuros esse. De Benef. Lib. i. Ch. x. But there is not one Word of what Mr. Hertius adds, as if it were subjoined in the same Place, Vix amplius dicam? Homo est omnium animalium pessimum, ac deterrimum, quo nihil peius, ac atrocius. See Lib. vii. Ch. i. §. 4. Note 5. following.

Liban. Declam. 9. Is not a Man a mild and peaceable Animal, so far as Words go; but in Reality savage and ungovernable? For when do we hear of Lions undertaking an Expedition against Lions? When do wild Beasts war against their own Kind? What Perjury do we find amongst them? What Breach of Covenants? What Perfidiousness and Avarice, what insatiable Love of Riches? What Intemperance, what Adultery can we lay to their Charge? Whoever considers and examines the unhappy Variety of Contentions and Quarrels that continually arise amongst Men, will find that the greatest Part of them proceed from such Inclinations and Propensions, as never disturb the Peace of Brutes^a. Now in so violent a Fierceness, and in so wide a Diversity of Affections and of Desires, what a Life would Men lead, were they destitute of the Benefit of Law to unite and to compose them? We should see nothing but a furious Multitude of Wolves, of Lions, of Dogs tearing and devouring one another. Every Man would indeed be a Lion, a Wolf, a Dog, to his Neighbour, or rather a Monster, more pernicious and more spiteful than the fiercest of these Creatures; since Man, of all Living Things, is the most able to hurt Man, and, if left to his own furious Passions, the most willing. And since Men are continually bringing so many Evils and Mischiefs on one another, while they now live under the Force of Law, and under the Fear of Punishment, what would become of the World, if they were left to the wild Sway of their Corruptions, if they had no inward Bridle to curb their Inclinations and to check their Pursuits. Add. Aristotle's Problems, Sect. 29. Quest. 7. Plin. Nat. Hist. Lib. xviii. Proem. Jamblichus Protrept. Ch. xx. That Men should maintain a Familiarity with one another, and at the same time live contrary to the Laws, is an impossible Thing: For by this Means they would suffer more Injury and Damage, than if every Man led a separate Life by himself. On these Accounts, and for these Necessities, Law and Justice are to be admitted as it were for Sovereigns amongst Men, without the Government of which they could not continue or subsist.

VII. It is still farther observable to our Purpose, that a much greater Variety of Dispositions may be discover'd in Men, than in Beasts. All the several Kinds of irrational Creatures are for the most Part indu'd with the same Inclinations, and rais'd and incited by the same common Appetites and Affections. We may understand a whole Species by the Knowledge of one single Member of it. But amongst Men there are not more Heads than Wits; and every one is equally zealous in giving the Preference to his own Opinion, and to his own Possessions. So Horace, Sat. i. Lib. ii. speaks.

As many thousand Studies entertain.

Philemon in Stobæus, Speech 2. If a Man should get together thirty thousand Foxes, he'd find that they not only have all one Nature, but all one Method and Tenour of Life. But amongst US, as many Bodies as there are, so many ways of Living may we discover. Plin. Pan. There are no Things in the World more likely to displease all, than such as are done with an Aim of pleasing all. Nor are all mov'd with a simple and an uniform Desire, but with Propensions as vast in their Number, as they are various in their Mixture and Compositions. Nay, the same Man is very frequently unlike, and unequal to himself, and what he once most eagerly desir'd, he shall at another time most strongly abhor:

-----*Magno curarum fluctuat æstu,

And gives no Rest to his distracted Heart.

Στραφῶσι ἄλλοι ἐπ' ἄλλα

All Men indeed have th' same Original,
But them to divers Works their Genius's call.

as the more Voices there are, the more harsh and unpleasent would be the Sound, unless they join'd in Confort and Harmony; so would human Life be nothing else but Noise and Confusion, were not the jarring Dissonance compos'd and sweeten'd by Law, and turn'd into a musical Agreement. As Things stand, this exceeding Variety of Parts and of Dispositions, is at the same time an Ornament and an Advantage to Mankind; since, when it is thus rightly temper'd, there naturally results from it so admirable an Order and Grace, as could not have been produc'd by an universal Likeness. And besides, there was likely to be much less Clashing and Contest in so vast a Multitude, whilst their various Humours and Inclinations led them to quite different Objects of Choice. The same wise Counsel Providence seems to have us'd in spreading so wonderful a Distinction of Features over the Faces of Men. For since different Offices are to be discharg'd, and different Behaviour to be us'd towards different Persons; there would arise a most wild and fatal Disorder, if all Men exactly resembled one another, and could not be distinguish'd but by artificial Marks, which would be liable to so many counterfeiting Cheats. Add. Dr. Cumberland, de L. N. Cb. ii. §. 23. And there lies this farther Secret in this natural Distinction, that one Face pleases the Fancy of one Man, and one seems more agreeable to another; so that out of the universal Stock, every Man may choose what he thinks most beautiful, and what may engage his Affection with the sweetest Comfort and Delight.

VIII. Besides all this, it was inexpedient for Man to live without Law upon account of his exceeding Weakness; which is our last Reason. A few Days will set a Brute Creature in a Condition of providing for himself; nor is he in any great Need of the Company of others for his Assistance and Support. But Man, from his first coming into the World, undergoes a long and tedious Course of helpless Infirmary. Quintilian Declam. 306. The Frailty of human Nature appears most in its Beginning and early Growth. The Beasts see their Young, immediately after the Birth, standing on their Feet, and seeking for the Dug; but we are forc'd to take up the helpless Infant, and to protect him from the Cold; and, after all this Nicety and Care, it is not unlikely, he may die between the Arms of the Parents and the Bosom of the Nurse. Add. Plin. N.H. Lib. vii. Prefat. What a Length of Years is requir'd, and what Diligence of Information, to enable him by his own Strength to accommodate himself with Food and Cloathing? Let us suppose a Man bred up by another, just so far as to be able to walk, and without hearing a Word spoken, insomuch that he shall be destitute of all Instruction and Discipline, and enjoying no Knowledge, but such as sprouts naturally from the Soil of his Mind, without the Benefit of Cultivation; let us suppose the same Man to be left in a Wilderness or Desert, and entirely depriv'd of the Company and of the Assistance of others: What a wretched Creature should we at last behold! A mute and an ignoble Animal, Master of no Powers or Capacities, any farther than to pluck up the Herbs and Roots that grow about him; to gather the Fruits which he did not plant; to quench his Thirst at the first River, or Fountain, or Ditch that he finds out in his Way; to creep into a Cave for Shelter from the Injuries of Weather, or to cover over his Body with Moss, and Grass, and Leaves. Thus would he pass a heavy Life in most tedious Idleness; would tremble at every Noise, and be scared at the Approach of any of his Fellow-Creatures, till at last his miserable Days were concluded, by the Extremity of Hunger, or of Thirst, or by the Fury of a ravenous Beast. That Mankind therefore do not pass their Life in a more forlorn, and a more deplorable Condition than any other living Thing, is owing to their Union and conjunction, to their Intercourse with the other Partners and Companions of their Nature. The Divine Saying, 'Tis not good for Man to be alone, is not to be restrain'd to Matrimony, but seems to belong in general to any Society with other Men. But now without Law, 'tis impossible that any Society should be either introduc'd or maintain'd in Strength and Quietness. And consequently, unless Man had been design'd for the safest and the most wretched Part of the animal Creation, it was not by any Means convenient that he should live loose from all Direction and Obligation of Law. Plutarch's Philosophy could teach him, that a general and unbounded License of Acting was disagreeable to the Condition, and to the Dignity of Man. Those Persons only (says he, De Audit.) who live in Obedience to Reason, are worthy to be accounted Free. They alone Live as they will, who have learnt what they ought to will. Those who give the Reins to unworthy Practices and Pursuits, use an imaginary Freedom, to purchase a real Dissatisfaction.

From all these Remarks it is sufficiently evident, that the natural Liberty of Man, such as really and truly agrees to him, and not only in an abstracted Sense, must always be understood as guided and restrain'd by the Ties of Reason, and by the Laws of Nature.

§. viii. Quintilian's Words are, Caducum circa initia animal; homines sumus, nam ferarum, pecudumq; fratribus est statim ingressus, & ad ubera impetus: nobis tollendus infans, & adversus frigori nutriendus: sic quoque inter parentum manus, gremiumq; nutricis saepe labitur. And Theocritus's, these, ἄλλα δ' ἄλλοι ἕως ἑξῆς ἢ ἐπιδοῦσα φῶτα, i. e. GOD made Man to want each others Help. To these we may add the fine Description of Seneca, Quid est homo? imbecillum corpus, & fragile, nudum, sicut natura inermis, aliene opis indigens, ad omnem fortuna contumeliam projectum, quam bene lacertos exercet, cuiuslibet feræ pabulum, cuiuslibet victima, ex infirmis fluidisque contextum, & lineamentis exterioribus nisi limum; frigoris, æstus, laboris impatiens: ipso rursus situ, & orio iturum in tabem, alimenta metuens sua, quorum modo inopia, modo copia rumpitur; anxius, sollicitusq; tutæ, precarii spiritus, & male hævrentis, quem pater repentinus, ad æt' usque ex improposito jonus auribus gravis excutit: Soli semper sibi nutrimentum vitiosum & inutile, i. e. *What is Man?  xii. Natural Peace is not to be trusted to.

BY the natural State of Man in our present Enquiry, we do not mean that Condition which is ultimately design'd him by Nature, as the most perfect and the most agreeable; but such a State as we may conceive Man to be plac'd in by his bare Nativity, abstracting from all the Rules and Institutions, whether of human Invention, or of the Suggestion and Revelation of Heaven; for the Addition of these Assistances seems to put another Face on Things, and to frame human Life anew, by an exacter Model. By this wide Exemption we do not only exclude all the various Arts and Improvements, and the universal Culture of Life, but especially civil Conjunctions and Societies, by the introducing of which Mankind was first brought under the decent Management of Order and Regularity. That we may be able to form clear and distinct Notions of this suppos'd State, we will first consider it in itself, and examine especially what Rights and what Inconveniences attend it; that is, what would be the Condition of particular Men, if there were no Arts or Inventions set afoot, and no Communities form'd and establish'd in the World. And then, secondly, we will consider it in order to other Men, whether in this Regard it bears the Semblance of Peace, or of War; that is, whether Men who live in a natural Freedom, so as neither to be subject to one another, nor to acknowledge a common Master, are likely to prove Enemies, or Friends. In this second Consideration the State we are speaking of, is capable of a Subdivision, being either full and absolute, and so bearing an equal Regard towards all Men in general; or else limited and restrain'd, as it has Respect only to a certain Part of Mankind. This double Notion of a State is answerable to the double Manner in which we may consider the Men who are to compose it, either as each particular Man lives in a natural Liberty towards all others; or as some Men have entred into a Society between themselves, but are join'd to all the rest of the World by no other Ties, besides those of common Humanity.

II. Now to form in our Minds some Image of this natural State, such as it would be, if destitute of all Arts and Assistances either invented by Men, or reveal'd by GOD, we must fancy a Man thrown at a Venture into the World, and then left intirely to himself, without receiving any farther Help or Benefit from others, than his bare Nativity; we must likewise suppose him to be furnish'd with no larger Endowments of Body or Mind, than such as we can now discover in Men, antecedent to all Culture and Information; and lastly, we must take it for granted, that he is not foster'd under the peculiar Care and Concern of Heaven. The Condition of such a Person could not prove otherwise than extremely miserable, whether he were thus cast upon the Earth in Infancy, or in Maturity of Stature and of Strength. If an Infant, he could not but have sadly perish'd, unless some Brute Creature had, by a kind of Miracle, offer'd its Dugs for his Support; and then he must necessarily have imbib'd a fierce and savage Temper, under the Nursery and Tutelage of Beasts. If in Perfection of Limbs and Size, we must, however, conceive him naked, able to utter nothing but an inarticulate Sound, a Stranger to all Institution and Discipline, amazed and startled at the Things about him, and even at his own Being: The Admonition of Hunger

MR. BARB. NOTES on Ch. II. §. 1.

* If Mr. Titius (Observat. 452.) had considered well these Words, he would not have criticised upon our Author, as calling that Estate Natural very unfitly, which is contrary to Nature, i. e. to the Intention of GOD, who appointed Man for Society. See what our Author says at the End of §. 4.

§. ii. † This appears from an Instance which Procopius (Lib. ii. Gothicorum) relates of a Child nursed by a Goat. Mr. Hertius also quotes Hartmann's History of Poland, Lib. i. Ch. ii. who relates something like it of an Infant who had been suckled by a Bear, and being brought to Warsaw, was presented to Casimir King of Poland, in 1661. I shall also add at length a like Story which the same Mr. Hertius has set down in his Treatise of Society, the first Principle of the Law of Nature, Secl. i. §. 8. yet leaving the Reader at Liberty to see into the Truth of it, tho' the Author warrants it. "In 1344 there was a Child found in Hesse, who, as we understand since, was taken away by Wolves, when it was about three Years old, and wonderfully maintained by them. They carried it to a Tree, where they laid up the greatest Part of their Prey, and in the Winter they dug a Ditch, into which they cast Leaves, and Herbs, which they laid under the Child, lying themselves by it to keep it from the Cold. They taught it to go on the Hands and Feet, and run like themselves, insomuch that by Custom it would run as fast, and make as great Leap. When he was first taken, they bound some Pieces of Wood to him, to restore him, and accustom him not to go like a Beast with his Face downward. He was carried to the Court of Henry Prince of Hesse, and was often heard to say, That if it were not for him, he had rather live amongst the Wolves again, than among Men." This Story is related by the Author of the Additions to the History of Lancelotti Schaffnaberg, about 1344.

would make him seize greedily on any Thing that was near him, his Thirst would direct him to the first Water, and Dens or Trees would afford a Refuge from the Injuries of Weather. Should we suppose a Number of such helpless Wretches thrown together by Nature on some uninhabited Soil, we cannot but think that they would so long however continue in a brutal Wildness and Disorder, till at last, either by their own Wit and Experience, or by some Hints and Instructions taken from the Conduct of mute Creatures, they should by Degrees arrive at some Method and Elegancy of Living, and as Virgil says,

———Varias usus meditando extunderet artes,
 Studious Need might beat out useful Arts.

This will easily be acknowledg'd by any one that looks about on the numerous Improvements and Assistances which we make use of in our daily Actions, and at the same Time considers how difficult it would be for any Man to invent all these of his own Head, if he were not put in the Way by the previous Labour and Guidance of others; and how great a Part of these Ornaments and Conveniencies of Life, would at once enter into the Thoughts of the Generality of Mankind. Hence it is no Wonder that the Heathen Writers, who understood not the true Origin of Men as deliver'd in holy Scriptures, should make so foul a Representation of their primitive State.

 Arm'd them with surer Instruments of Fate.
 At length their Voice grew Index of their Thought, Joyful to name the Things for which they fought.
 Now Rage began to cool, and Force to cease,
 And gen'ral Parlies work'd a gen'ral Peace.
 Towns rose, and Laws were settled, to remove Invading Thefts, and check licentious Love.

This is Horace's Description, and we may expect a fuller from Lucretius.

Then Man was hard, as hard as Parent-Stones,
 And built on bigger and on firmer Bones.

Contented they with the poor easy Store
 That Sun and Earth bestow'd, they wish'd no more,
 Soft Acorns were their first and chiefest Food.
 When thirsty, then did purling Streams invite
 To satisfy their eager Appetite.

They knew no Use of Fire to dress their Food,
 No Cloaths, but wandred naked thro' the Wood.
 They liv'd in shady Groves, and Caves confin'd Were Shelter from the Cold, the Heat, and Wind.
 No fix'd Society, no steady Laws,
 No publick Good was sought, no common Cause.
 But all at War, each rang'd, each sought his Food
 By Nature taught to seek his private Good.
 Then to renew frail Man's decaying Race,
 Or mutual Lust did prompt them to embrace,
 Or else the greater Vigour of the Male,
 Or some few treacherous Presents did prevail;
 Some Acorns, Apples some, some Pears bestow,
 The Thing the same, the Price was less than now.

The most they dreaded was the furious Beast,
 For those i'th' dead of Night did oft molest,
 And lengthen into Death their slumbering Rest. }

But when they built their Huts, when Fire began,
 And Skins of murder'd Beasts gave Cloaths to Man;
 When One to One confin'd in chaste Embrace Enjoy'd sweet Love, and saw a num'rous Race;
 Then Man grew soft, the Temper of his Mind
 Was chang'd from rough to mild, from fierce to kind.

For us'd to Fire, his Limbs refus'd to bear
 The piercing Sharpness of the open Air:
 Lust weaken'd him, and the sweet playing Child
 Tam'd his wild Sire, and into Peace beguil'd.
 Then Neighbours by Degrees familiar grown,
 Made Leagues and Bonds, and each secur'd his own.
 And then by Signs, and broken Words agreed,
 That they would keep, preserve, defend, and feed
 Defenceless Infants, and the Female Train;
 A Right which Pity urg'd them to maintain.
 Tho' this fix'd not an universal Peace,
 Yet many kept their Faith, and liv'd at Ease;
 Or else, almost as soon as it began,
 The Race had fall'n, this Age ne'er seen a Man.
 Kind Nature Power of framing Sounds affords,
 And these at length Convenience turn'd to Words.

Mr. CREECH.

We have much the same Story in Prose from Diodor. Sic. Lib. i. c. viii. They tell us, that Men at their first Origin led an irregular Life, in the Manner of Beasts; scattering themselves about in Search of Food, which was presented them by the savoury Herbs, and the Fruits which grew of their own Accord. But being infested on every Side with the wild Beasts, they learnt by Use the Security of mutual Assistance; and being forc'd by Fear to unite in Society, they came acquainted by Degrees with their Similitude of Figure and Shape. The first Men, before any Inventions of Convenience and Use, supported Life with great Labour and Trouble; being, as yet, destitute of Cloaths and Dwellings, unaccustom'd to the Relief of Fire, and Strangers to all sweet and regular Food. Being ignorant of Stores and Provisions, they neglected to secure so much of the Fruits of the Earth as was requisite for necessary Subsistence. And thus many perish'd in the Winter by Hunger and Cold. But being afterwards instructed by gradual Experience, to spend that sharp Season in Caves, and to lay up a Stock of Necessaries, and finding out the Use of Fire and other Comforts and Supports, they began to introduce many Arts, and many Advantages of living. Add, Lib. i. Ch. xliii. Cicero pro P. Sectio. Il'ho amongst you does not know the Condition of Nature to have been once such, that Men, in those Days, before the Settlement of natural or of civil Laws, wandered separately about the Fields, and possess'd no more than what they could get or keep by mutual Force, and Wounds, and Slaughters. Now between our present Way of Life, polish'd with Humanity and Civility, and that rude and barbarous Course, the only distinguishing Marks are Law and Violence. Vid. de Invent. Lib. i.

Euripid. Supplic.

I praise the generous Pow'rs, that fenc'd our Life
 With Rules and Graces from the lawless Herd;
 By giving first a Soul, and next a Tongue,
 The Soul's Interpreter; and Fruit for Food,
 And kindly Rain to breed a future Store:
 And close Abodes, to skreen us from the Rage
 Of threatening Skies; and Sails to wing our Course
 To distant Shore, to join the Globe in Trade,
 And mix the common Treasures of Mankind.

It is a general Custom with the Poets to attribute to the Gods the Invention of all Things useful in human Life. Vid. Oppian. Halieut. Lib. ii. v. 16, &c.

However fabulous these Accounts appear, yet so far the Authors of them were in the right, that upon Supposal of such an Origin of Mankind, the Face of Nature would have born all these Features which we now esteem so monstrous and extravagant. In the same Manner being ignorant of the State of Paradise, they pleas'd themselves in making Descriptions of a singular and constant Temperateness of Air, and of a spontaneous Fertility of the Earth, in the first and the golden Age of the World. Because they thought it impossible that human Race could have been preserv'd, as according to their Notion they were produc'd, if the Weather and the Seasons had been then as changeable and as unsteady as now, and if the Support of Food had not been more easy to procure. And indeed, tho' it is clear from the Authority of Scripture, that the primitive Mortals, by the divine Direction and Assistance, arriv'd at a very early Knowledge of the most necessary Arts (Sec Gen. iii. 21, 23. and iv. 17, 22.)

 Nec nimios aestus; nec magnis viribus auras.*

Nature, whilst new, no cruel Cold brought forth,
 Nor raging Heats; nor arm'd the stormy North.

* Altho' Mankind was never in such a State of Nature as we have described, yet it is good to imagine what that Estate was, not only to convince us, how great an Advantage we receive one from another, and by that Means may be induced to a reciprocal Sense of Love and Sociableness, but also because it may happen, that every Man may be reduced to that Condition, either altogether or in Part. Such an one, for Example, may an Infant be, who is left in a Desert, where no Man passes; and if this Infant, who is thus forsaken by his cruel Parents, lives to grow up without any human Assistance, he'll represent to us perfectly that State of Nature we are now speaking of. Nay, a Person at Man's Estate, who by a Shipwreck, or some other Accident, is cast upon an Island that is desert and uninhabited, will find himself in some Degree of that State of Nature, because he'll be forced to call to mind Arts, and other Conveniences of Life, that he may more easily provide for his Necessities. I have taken this out of the Academical Discourse of our Author, De statu hominum Naturali, §. 5.

† This appears from this Expression in the first of those Texts, And God made Coats of Skins, and clothed them; which, according to the Hebrew, imports, that God taught them to make them; for otherwise how could the first Men, who were destitute of all necessary Instruments of Iron, and before there was any Custom to kill Beasts, in so little a Time find out that Invention, and bring it to any Perfection by their Industry? From hence we may infer, in my Opinion, that divine Providence instructed them in several other Things which were as necessary for human Life, and no less difficult to find out. So God commanded our first Parents to till the Ground, and get their Bread by the Sweat of their Brows, or to that End, 'tis probable, he taught them the Nature of the Grain, the Time of Sowing, and the Manner of Tillage and making Bread; which Things they could not have discovered of themselves, but by long Experience and many Trials. The Histories of Greece tell us, that the ancient Inhabitants there, having lost the Use of Bread-Corn, I know not by what Accident, lived upon Acorns and wild Fruits, before the Use of Husbandry was restored among them; whereas the Sacred History tells us, that Adam's eldest Son was an Husbandman, which shews, that the Art was well known before; and consequently, so was the Use of Iron; for 'tis not necessary for us to understand what the Scripture says of Tubal-Cain, Gen. iv. 22. that he was the Inventor of Iron; for we may suppose the more plain Use of that Metal was before discovered, and that Tubal-Cain found out a Way of forging it into more curious Works; for 'tis said only that he polish'd all Works of Brass and Iron. As to Fire, the Invention of it among the Greeks was looked upon as such a considerable Thing, that they feign'd that Prometheus brought it down from Heaven. 'Tis related of the Inhabitants of the Canary and Philippine Islands, and of an Isle bordering on China, called Los Jordenas, that they knew nothing of Fire till the Spaniards arriv'd there; and perhaps they had been in this Ignorance many Ages, neither their own Ingenuity, nor any Chance, having been which they daily improv'd and increas'd by their own Industry and Application; yet the Condition of Men had been most deplorable and base, if no Societies had been set on Foot, but every one had reign'd a separate Prince in his own Family, and suffer'd his Children, when once grown up, to seek their Fortunes in a State of natural Liberty. And then we might pronounce of all Mankind, as Euripides does of the Cyclops, they would be as wandering Swains, never bearing, and never breeding one another. Hobbes has⁶ been lucky enough in painting the Inconveniences of such a State. Out of Society (says^a he) we are defended only by our single Strength; in Society, by the Strength of all. Out of Society no Man is⁷ sure to keep Possession of what his Industry has gain'd; in Society every Body is secure from that Danger. To conclude, out of Society we have⁸ the Tyranny of Passions, ⁹ War, ¹⁰ Fear, ¹¹ Poverty, ¹² Filthiness, Barbarity, Ignorance, and Wildness; in Society we have the Stay of¹³ Reason, ¹⁴ Peace, Security, ¹⁵ Riches, ¹⁶ Decency of Ornament, Company, Elegancy, Knowledge, and Benevolence^b. And I believe there cannot be a more effectual Way found out to silence the Complaints and Murmurs of the common People, when they pretend to find Fault with the Miscarriages and the Impositions of the Government, than if we would lay before them a true Prospect of the Misery and Confusion which attends a natural State. Which trouble those Persons had certainly a right Notion of, who brought into a proverbial Saying, ¹⁷ That unless there were such Things in the World as Courts of Justice, Men would infallibly devour one another.

III. What kind of Rights attend Men in a State of Nature we may easily gather, as well from that Inclination common to all living Things, by which they cannot but embrace and practise, with the greatest Readiness and Vigour, all possible Ways of preserving their Body and their Life, and of overcoming all such Things as seem to drive at their Destruction; as from this other Consideration, that Persons living in such a State are not been able to gain the Use of so necessary a Thing. See Geo. Hornius de Origin. Gent. American. Lib. i. Ch. viii. Lib. ii. Ch. ix. We find also, that several Nations have been ignorant a long time of the Use of Iron, tho' they had Mines of that Metal in their Country. We must then believe, that the first Men were early instructed by divine Providence in these sorts of Things, and many other Necessaries of Life. And if a long time after we discovered some People among whom the Use was lost, 'twas because they had chose a barren Country, or because some ambitious Persons had forced great Numbers of Men, by their irresistible Power, to fly into far distant Deserts, where they wanted all the Instruments of Tillage used in the Places they had lost; or some Colony going to settle itself in a far Country, neglected to carry those Instruments, or lost them by the Way, by some unknown Accident, after which 'twas very hard to recover them, because Traffick was not yet settled. Nevertheless, some have endeavour'd to supply this Defect, by making use of other Materials for the same End. Thus several People of America use, instead of Iron, Oyster-shells, the Bones and Teeth of some Creatures, Canes, and such like Things. See Dapper's Description of America. This is also taken out of our Author's Treatise quoted in the foregoing Note.

^a De Cive, Ch. x. §. 1. ^b Comp. Polyt. Lib. iv. Ch. xlv. Where he relates the Miseries of the Byzantines, occasion'd by their endless War with the Thracians.

⁶ Our Author ought not to have approved Mr. Hobbes's Words so generally, as Mr. Titius has observed (Obs. 460, 461.) as I shall shew in this and the following Notes. And first, what Mr. Hobbes says is not absolutely true; for what hinders but in a State of Nature, many may join together in their own Defence? I own, that such a Protection, tho' founded upon an united Force, is not comparable to what is found in a well regulated Society; but this may in some measure be sufficient to guard us from the Insults that we are liable to in a State of Nature, because 'tis not likely that we shall be attacked by so great a Number of Enemies at one time; for it often happens in a Civil Society, that private Persons are oppressed by the Forces of the whole Body, an Inconvenience not to be feared in a State of Nature.

⁸ This he ought also to have proved, for why should our Passions have greater Command of us then? If the Fear of Laws keeps the People to their Duty, it will make a like Impression upon the great ones, and Persons of Quality, but they easily find out Ways to evade the Laws; for those in whom the Passions reign with the greatest Fury, and in a manner most prejudicial to Society, are beyond Contradiction these Persons in Authority, of which we can't find any Examples in a State of Nature, nor can there be any in a Condition of doing so much Mischief.

¹⁰ There want not as many Means to appease and lessen Fear. See what is said Lib. vii. Ch. i. §. 7. And in Civil Governments is there not often more Reason for terrible Apprehensions from Princes and their Ministers?

¹¹ Labour and good Husbandry would easily furnish us with all Things necessary for Life. None but Sluggards and Prodigals would fall into Poverty, and this often happens as well in civil Societies.

¹⁵ How comes it to pass that we see so many Families reduced to Beggary, and so many Subjects ruin'd by Extortion?

¹⁶ Under these fine Names are often hidden Vanity, Sottishness, Folly, Pedantry, irregular Passions, and subtle Cheats. There is no good Thing that can be secured to us by Society, but it may have Place in a State of Nature. Further, this Beauty, Politeness, and Pleasures of Life, of which Men boast so, are found only in great Cities; the rustick Behaviour is still kept up every where in the Country, in the most civilized Kingdoms. Let us then, by way of Conclusion, make an exact Parallel between the States of Nature and Civil. Experience teaches us, that contrary to the natural Appointment of the Creator, and thro' Man's Corruption, both States are often troublesome and unhappy; but Civil Government being a proper Means to restrain the Malice of Men, the Civil State, without Contradiction, may be more social and happy than the State of Nature; but then we must suppose the civil Society to be well governed, otherwise, if a King abuse his Power, or devolves the Management of Civil Affairs to Ministers both ignorant and vicious, as it often happens, a Civil State is more unhappy than the State of Nature, which appears by the Wars, Calamities, and Vices which spring up from such Abuses, and from which the State of Nature is free. See what Mr. Locke says in his second Treatise of Civil Government, Chap. i. §. 10. and Chap. xviii. §. 17. near the End.

¹⁷ 'Tis a Proverb of the Jewish Doctors. See Grotius. Lib. i. Chap. iv. §. 4. num. 2.

subject to any Sovereignty or Command. For from the former Reflexion it follows, that Men plac'd after this manner in a natural State, may use and enjoy the common Goods and Blessing, and may act and pursue whatever makes for their own Preservation, while they do not hence injure the Right of the rest. From the latter Supposition it is clear, that they may use not only their own Strength, but their own Judgment and Will (provided they are form'd and guided according to the Law of Nature) for procuring their own Defence and Safety. And in this Respect likewise, the State we are treating of has obtain'd the Name of natural Liberty; in as much as, antecedently to all human Pact and Deed, every Man is conceiv'd to be perfectly in his own Power and Disposal, and not to be controll'd by the Pleasure or Authority of any other. On which account too, every Man may be thus acknowledg'd equal to every Man, since all Subjection and all Command are equally banish'd on both Sides. According to this Temperament, we ought to correct and explain those Assertions laid down by Mr. Hobbes, in the Beginning of his Book De Cive, That the first Foundation of natural Right, is the Liberty which each Man hath, to preserve, as far as he is able, his own Life and Limbs, and to apply all his Endeavours towards the guarding his Body from Death, and from Pains. From which it follows, That since 'tis in vain to have a Right to the End, if one has not likewise a Right to the Means, therefore every Man has a Right of using all Means, and of doing all Actions, without which he cannot defend and ensure himself. But now since in a natural State no Man is subject to another as to a Superior, to whose Pleasure his own Will and Judgment should be submitted, hence every Man is by natural Right a Judge, whether the Means which he uses, and the Actions which he performs, are necessary to the Preservation of his own Life and Limbs, or not: For altho' in this Case one Man should pretend to give Advice to another, yet the other not having subjected his Will and Judgment to his Controul, may still judge of this Advice, whether it be proper and expedient to be follow'd, or not. And therefore he may, perhaps, do according as he was advis'd, but then it will not be for the sake of the Counsellor, but because he himself approves of the Proposal; and consequently he will at last act by the Determination of his own Judgment. From all which he concludes, That Nature has given to every one a Right to all Things; that is, in a meer natural State, or before Men had bound themselves to one another by any Covenants, it was lawful for every one, to do all Things whatsoever and against whomsoever he pleas'd; and to possess, use, and enjoy all that he would or could. Whence it may be understood, that in a State of Nature, Profit or Utility is the Measure of Right. Which Notions, however paradoxical they appear at first View, yet no Man can fairly draw from them a Licence of doing any Thing to any Person, who considers that Hobbes, even in this State of Nature, supposes a Man subject to the Laws of Nature, and to the Government of a sound Reason. But since such an unbounded and injurious Licence could never, by any Man in his Wits, be thought a likely Means for the lasting Preservation of himself, we must presume that it was never granted or intended by Nature. And suppose some Man should be so extravagant as to endeavour the putting it in Practice, it's plain his Experiment would turn in a high Manner to his own Prejudice and Mischief. So that the only fair Sense of Hobbes's Principle is this; the Things which make for the Preservation of Men, Nature has laid in common, before they have divided them amongst themselves by Covenant: And he that has no Superior, may by the Direction of his own best and soundest Reason, do any Thing that is truly conducive to his lasting Safety. But if that Philosopher really intended his Words with the same Harshness, and the same gross Appearance which their Countenance bears, and to reject our kind and favourable Interpretation, the Fault is his own, and let him shift how he can to escape the perpetual Censure and Reprehension of wise Men. This is evident, that the Author of the Theologico-Political Treatise, who goes commonly by the Name of Spinoza, has describ'd that Right of all Men to all Things which attend a natural State, in most horrid and barbarous Terms; and therefore it may not be improper to take the Trouble of discussing his Notions on the Point. By the Right and Institution of Nature, he understands nothing else, but the Rules of the Nature of every individual Thing, according to which we conceive every one of them to be naturally determin'd to a certain Manner of Existence and of Operation. For Example, Fishes are naturally determin'd to swim, and the bigger of them to eat the lesser; and therefore Fishes, by the biggest natural Right, possess the Water; and by the same Right, the larger Kinds of them prey on the smaller. Here it is observable, that by the Term of Right he does not express any Law directive of an Action, but only the Power of acting² and what may be done without Injury, and that therefore 'tis by no Means a fair Conclusion, that one ought necessarily to do

§. III. ¹ Mr. Hobbes, as he himself says in a Note upon §. 1. of the second Chapter, understands by right Reason, not as most do, the infallible Faculty, but the Power of Reasoning, i. e. the proper and true Arguings which every one makes upon his own Actions, so far as they conduce to the Advantage or Detriment of other Men. If we ask him what is this true Reasoning, he'll answer, It is founded upon the Principles laid down in the foregoing Chapter, §. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7. upon the State of War, wherein he supposes all Men to be naturally one against another; a false Supposition, which our Author will conclude a little lower, §. 5, &c. So that we see, that according to Mr. Hobbes, all is reduced to every Man's Judgment, either well or ill founded. This appears clearly from what he positively maintains, That in whatever Manner a Man deals with a Person, with whom he makes a bargain, or Contract, he does him no injury. See above Lib. i. Chap. vii. §. 13. If a Man sins against God, or the Laws of Nature, 'tis, according to him, because we pretend something is necessary for our Preservation, which we know in Conscience not to be so. Note on Chap. i. §. 10. See also that on Chap. iii. §. 27.

all those things, which one has³ a Right of doing. Farther, as it is an improper Acceptation of the Term of natural Law, to make it denote that according to which every thing acts by a certain and determinate Manner, so is it likewise improper to apply the Name of Right to that Power and manner of acting which appears in irrational Beings: For he alone can be truly said to have a Right of acting, who acts on previous Reason and Deliberation. He proceeds to tell us, That Nature absolutely consider'd has the highest Right of doing whatever it can; that the Right of Nature extends itself as far as the Power of Nature: For the Power of Nature is the very Power of God, who hath the highest Right to all things. Here, if by Nature absolutely consider'd,⁴ he means GOD in Conjunction with all created Things, we grant his Assertion, and willingly acknowledge in GOD the highest Right to all Things, yet such a Right as is limited to the Perfections of his Essence. But if by Nature he understand the University of created Beings, as contradictinguish'd to the Creator, then we may deny the Power of Nature to be the Power of GOD himself, or that these two Powers have the same Latitude and Extent. The Power of Nature is indeed produc'd by GOD, but not in such a manner as to exhaust all the Power of the Divinity, but to contain itself within the Bounds prescrib'd by its Author. His next Inference runs thus, Since the universal Power of all Nature is nothing else but the Power of all the Individuals taken together, it follows that each Individual has the highest Right to all things that it can compass, or that the Right of each Individual extends itself as far as the determinate Power of the same Individual. But 'tis beyond me to apprehend the Conclusiveness of this Argument, The Power of all Nature is the Power of all the Individuals together, therefore each Individual has the highest Right to all Things. For is it not rather true, that each Individual has a certain and definite Share or Portion of Right; and that therefore no particular Individual can fairly arrogate to itself that Right which is proper to all; as they make up one universal Nature? He adds, And because it is a supreme Law of Nature, that every thing endeavour as far as it is able to continue in its own State, and this not with any regard or respect to other things, but only to itself, hence it follows, that each Individual has the highest Right to this Advantage; that is, to exist and to operate as it is naturally determin'd. Here, besides that Law of Nature is us'd in an improper Sense, it is apparently false as to Men at least, that their Nature is so determin'd, as to make them endeavour their own Preservation and Continuance⁵ with respect to themselves only, without any Care or Consideration for others. Properly speaking, those things are said to be Naturally determin'd which are tied to an uniform

Method of acting, and are so contradictinguish'd to free Agents: And therefore Men, as to those Actions which are left to their own Guidance and Direction, are determin'd to certain Ways and Courses not by Nature, but by some Law; and consequently they are not presently invest'd with a Right of doing all things within the reach of their natural Powers and Abilities. But the Vanity of such Reasonings will more fully appear, if divesting them of their dark Turnings and Intricacies we thus clearly propose them; GOD has the highest Right to all things; the Power of Nature is the Power of GOD, therefore Nature has a Right to all things: But the Power of Nature is the Power of all the Individuals together; therefore each Individual has a Right to all things. Let any Man judge whether the Connexion in this Argument be just, or not. Spinoza very fully declares, That in this Point no Difference ought to be made between Men, and the other Individuals of Nature; or between Men who understand and exercise Reason, and those who do not; nor between Men in their Wits, and Fools and Madmen. For, as to the first Part of this Assertion, the Question of Right ought not to proceed but about the Right of Men. And as to the latter Part, altho' some Men may have a quicker and some a slower Use of Reason, yet whoever has any Use at all of that Faculty may at least understand thus much⁶, in Order to his own Preservation he has no Need of an unlimited Right to all Things, and that therefore such a Right doth by no Means belong to him. As for those who have no Manner of Use of Reason, 'twould be frivolous to dispute about their Right; nor from the unhappy Circumstances of diseas'd Persons, can we pronounce any thing about the natural Condition of Mankind: Nor is it impossible for any one of these poor Creatures to be preserv'd otherwise than by a Right to all things. The Reason which he subjoins is equally vain and fruitless, For whatsoever any thing acts by the Laws of its Nature, it acts with the highest Right; inasmuch as it acts as it is by Nature determin'd, and cannot do otherwise. Because we deny Man when he acts by the Law of Nature, to affect a Right to all things, or to be determin'd by Nature to the Exercise of any such Right. Spinoza's Conclusion therefore is false, Amongst Men, as they are consider'd to live only under the Command of Reason; he who is not come to a Knowledge of Reason, or who has not yet acquir'd a Habit of Virtue, doth as well by the highest Right live according to the Laws of his Appetite, as he who directs his Life by the Laws of Reason. That is, as a wise Man has the highest Right to all things which Reason suggests, or according to the rational Laws of living; so an ignorant and senseless Person has the highest Right to all things which his Appetite affects, or according to the Laws of living by Appetite. But now the natural

³ In Reality, the meer physical Power of doing a Thing, does not prove that we are indispensibly obliged to do it, nor that we can lawfully do it, if we will; at least, it supposes what is in Question, that a physical and moral Power are one and the same Thing.

⁴ We may see plainly enough that Spinoza does not acknowledge a GOD, or such an intelligent Being as is altogether perfect. What he calls God is nothing but the World, which he supposes eternal, and not created.

⁵ See §. v. below, and the following Chapter, where Society is treated of.

⁶ This is so true, that Mr. Hobbes, whose Notions, at the Bottom, are not much distant from Spinoza's, makes a Necessity to come to some Agreements, which according to him are the Foundation of Justice, upon which it could not be possible to preserve ourselves, by making use of that boundless Right about every thing, and against all Men. See his Book de Cive, Ch. i. §. 11. 13. and Ch. ii. §. 3. Spinoza himself, as our Author observes at the End of this Paragraph, asserts, That it is more advantageous to follow the Maxims of Reason, than the Desires of Nature only.

State or the Command and Dominion of Nature, supposes Reason in Men, nor are other Laws prescrib'd to the Sagacious, and others to the Simple. Those who are govern'd purely by Appetite, are Subjects incapable of Right or Law. But when the Appetite in Men proceeds contrary to their Reason, they are so far from living by any Right, or by any Laws, that they are continually guilty of transgressing the Laws. The Corollaries which he deduces are no truer than the foregoing Propositions. The natural Right of each Man is not determin'd by sound Reason, but by Desire and by Power. For all Men are not naturally determin'd to operate according to the Rules and the Laws of Reason; but on the contrary, all are born ignorant of all Things, and before they can attain to know the true and rational Way of Living, and acquire the Habit of Virtue, a great Part of their Age (altho' they have been well educated) passes away; and yet notwithstanding all this, they are in the mean time bound to live, and to preserve themselves to the best of their Power; and this Obligation is fulfilled by obeying the sole Motion of their Appetite, since Nature has yet given them no other Guide, denying them the actual Power of living by sound Reason; and therefore they are no more oblig'd to live by the Laws of true Sense and Judgment, than a Cat is oblig'd to live by such Laws as are proper only to the Nature of a Lion. For to make a Man oblig'd to live according to Reason, it is not necessary that he should be naturally determin'd to act according to the Laws of Reason, that is, that he should not be able to act otherwise; but it is sufficient, that he has so much natural Power, as may enable him to abstain from bringing Injuries and Troubles on other Men; than which nothing in the World can be more easy. Neither is the Manner and Method of preserving himself so very difficult and laborious, as to make him stand in need of a Right to all Things. And then from him who through Defect of Age is yet in absolute Ignorance, none can require a more accurate Direction of his Proceedings, than is consistent with his low Capacity, and his small and feeble Efforts of Reason. But that what is done in this State of Simplicity may not prove very hurtful or troublesome to others, Nature has carefully provided; by giving it so little Strength of its own, and by commending the Care and Guidance of it to those of maturer Years. The following Inference is as false as the former. Whatever therefore any one, consider'd only under the Command and Guidance of Nature, shall judge convenient for himself, either by the Direction of Reason, or by the Impulse of his Passions, this by the highest natural Right he may desire, and may seize upon by whatever means he can, whether by Force, or by Fraud, or by Entreaty, or the easiest way he can think of; and consequently he may reckon every one his Enemy, who would hinder him from satisfying his Inclinations. As also this, Whence it follows, that the Right and the Institution of Nature, under which all are Born, and the most part Live, is averse to nothing, besides that which none can desire, and which none can hinder; not to Contentions, not to Hatred, not to Anger, not to Deceit, nor absolutely to any thing which it's possible for the Appetite to pursue. This Assertion, if applied to Men, is manifestly false and absurd. But if it includes all living Creatures, and be meant in this Sense, that there is no Way or Manner of Self-preservation, which some animate Being doth not follow and make Use of, out of natural Instinct, then it is nothing to the Purpose; since the only Question is, whether Men have such a Right to all Things, as they may use against all other Men. But that Spinoza intended the latter Sense, is evident from what follows, And no wonder, for Nature is not restrain'd to the Laws of human Reason, which concern only the true Profit and Preservation of Men; but comprehends an Infinity of other Things, which fall under the universal Order of all Nature, of which Man is but a little Part. He afterwards confesses, that it is more convenient for Men to live according to the Laws and infallible Dictates of Reason, which point out their true Interest and Advantage. But then what occasion was there for the feigning of such a Right, as Man, if he intended to be safe, must necessarily relinquish; while other Animals, which exercise a kind of Right to all things, lie under no necessity of quitting it for their own Preservation? Neither indeed, could such an absurd Abdication be necessary for Man, upon supposal, that Nature had invest'd him with the same Right.

IV. We are ready to acknowledge it for a most certain Truth, that all Mankind did never exist together in a mere natural State: Inasmuch as upon the divine Authority of the Scriptures, we believe all human Race to have proceeded from one original Pair. Now it's plain that Eve was subject to Adam, Gen. iii. 16. and those who were born of these primitive Parents, and so on, did immediately fall under paternal Authority, and under Family Government. But such a State might have befallen Mankind, if, as some of the Heathens believ'd, they had, in the beginning of their Being, leapt out of the Earth like Frogs, or had come up from Seed, like Cadmus's human Crop, Ovid. Metamorph. Lib. iii. ver. 122, 123. Which Fable is, methinks, a very exact Representation of that State of Nature, and of that War of all Men against all, which Mr. Hobbes would introduce; where ————— *fuit omnis turba, suorum;

Marte cadunt subiti per mutua vulnera fratres.*

Rage hurries all; and in so blind a Fray,
The sudden Brothers fall a mutual Prey.

A State of Nature then did never naturally exist, unless qualified, and, as it were, in Part; namely, while some Party of Men join'd with some more in a civil Body, or in some Confederacy like that; but still retain'd a natural Liberty against all others. (Tho' it must be own'd that the more and the smaller those Societies were, into which Men at first divided, the nearer Approach was made to a meer natural State. * Thus of Old, when Mankind were parted into distinct Families, and now since they are fallen into separate Communities, those might have been then, and may now be said to live mutually in a State of Nature, neither of whom obey the others, and who do not acknowledge any common Master among Men. Thus in the primitive Age, when Brethren left their Father's House, and set up particular Families for themselves independent from any other, then they began to live in a natural State or Liberty. Therefore not the first Mortals, but their Offspring, did actually exist in such a State. Now a State of Nature thus temper'd and qualified, is attended with none of those Inconveniences which follow a meer natural Liberty, especially if we apply it to publick Communities: And besides, it passes for the highest Pitch of Honour amongst Mortals, by Virtue of the united Strength of the whole publick Body, to acknowledge no earthly Superior. So that Commonwealths, and the Governors of them, may fairly declare themselves to be in a State of natural Liberty, while they are furnish'd with sufficient Strength to secure the Exercise of that grand Privilege. Whereas, when Men live singly in a meer natural State, it is no manner of Pleasure or Advantage to them to own no Superior; inasmuch as upon account of their own small Force and Ability, their Safety must needs be in perpetual Doubt and Danger.

There are some indeed who maintain with great Eagerness, that such a natural State either doth not at all exist, or is not rightly call'd natural, and they form their Argument in the following Manner. Nature inclines Men to an orderly Society or Fellowship; now there being no such thing as Order without Government, it follows that there can be no Society without Government, and that therefore Government or Command ought rather to be shild Natural than Liberty. To strengthen this Assertion, they alledge the Authority of Cicero, * Nothing (says he, De Leg. Lib. iii. Ch. i.) is so agreeable to the Right and to the Condition of Nature, as Government: Without which no House, no State, no Nation, not human Race in General, not the universal Nature of Things, not the World it self could stand. For the World obeys GOD, and the Seas and the Earth obey the superior Frame of the World, and the Life of Man is led in Conformity to the High and the Sovereign Law. Hence they bring a general Accusation against Mr. Hobbes, for feigning such a State under the Name of Natural, as is unworthy of human Nature, and more agreeable to that of Beasts, who are ignorant of Reason and of Speech. For that all Men have a Liberty of doing, of desiring, of possessing all Things, no Reason, no Nature truly and rightly judging can advise. Such Inclinations may indeed flow from depraved Nature, but cannot be the Dictates of right Reason, which by desiring Society, doth at the same time desire an Order in Society, and by that means cuts off all such licentious and irregular Motions. For what Order can be conceiv'd without tending to some first and principal Point? This first and principal Point must be Government, or the Sovereign Power in Society, without Regard to which, no Society can be desir'd by thinking and speaking Beings. Nature itself instructs us, That Government is essential to all Society, but that such a Liberty as excludes all Government, tends to unnatural Confusion. Add. Bœcler. ad Grot. Proleg.

What may be return'd in answer to all this Process of Argument, is clear from the preceding Doctrine. A meer natural State is a Representation of Mens Condition abstracting from all human Institution; but doth not suppose that Nature intended Man for such a Way of Life. For by the same Allowance of Expression, an entire Ignorance of all things may be said to be natural to Man, or to be born with him; without implying any such thing as that it should be repugnant to Nature for Men to acquire very high Degrees of Knowledge. Besides, we have been so cautious as to attribute no such natural Liberty to Man, as shall be exempt from the Obligation of natural Law, or of divine Commands. But such a Liberty as excludes all human Sovereignty and Superiority cannot be said to contradict Nature, any more than it can be said to reach as far as Infinite itself. Government indeed is Natural; that is, it was the Design of Nature that Men should constitute Governments amongst themselves. But this doth not make it e'er the less Natural, that he who himself bears the supreme Government and Command amongst Men, should himself be exempt from all other human Command, and in that Sense should enjoy a natural Liberty: Unless in the same Order, we can fancy somewhat before the first, somewhat superior to the Supreme. Upon the same Account it is in general very agreeable to Nature, that he who hath no Lord or Master should govern himself and his Actions by the Guidance of his private Reason.

V. There is a Dispute of much greater Consequence, whether this natural State, in Regard to other Men, bears the Semblance of War or of Peace: Or, which comes to the same Thing, whether they who live in a State of Nature, that is, who do neither obey one another nor own a common Lord, ought to be reckon'd Enemies amongst themselves, or quiet and peaceful Friends? And here our first and chief Business must be to examine the Opinion of Mr. Hobbes, who as he calls his meer natural State not a single War, but a War of all Men against all, so he maintains, that when some Men have agreed to enter into Society, they immediately quit their hostile State in Regard to one another, but still continue against all the rest of the World. Thus in his Book de Cine, Ch. ix. §. 3. Every Man is an Enemy to every Man whom he neither serves nor obeys. (He ought to have added, and with whom he has no common Master.) And again, Ch. xiii. §. 7. The State of Commonwealths amongst themselves is Natural, that is, Hostile. And tho' they cease to fight, yet this Intermision must not be call'd a Peace, ³ See Plato concerning this whole Matter, De Legib. Lib. 3. a good way from the Beginning. P. 680, 681. Tom. ii. Ed. Steph. and Aristotle's Politics, Lib. i. Ch. ii. p. 297. Edit. Paris.

⁴ He means by it the Law. These are his Words, Nihil porro tam aptum est ad jus, conditionemque nature (quod cum dico, legem à me dici, & nihil aliud intelligi volo) quam imperium, sine quo nec domus ulla, nec civitas, nec gens, nec hominum universum genus stare, nec rerum natura omnis, nec ipse mundus potest. Nam & hic Deo parat, & huic obediunt maria, terraque, & hominum vita jussis supreme legis obtemperat.

but a Breathing-time, during which each Enemy, observing the Motions and the Countenance of the other, rates his Security, not by Covenants, but by the Strength and Designs of his Adversary. (He should have added, and by his own Force^a.) He adds, in his Leviathan, Ch. xiii. That War consists not in Battle only, or the Act of Fighting, but in a Tract of Time wherein the Will to contend in Battle is sufficiently known: And that therefore the Notion of Time is to be consider'd in the Nature of War as in the Nature of Weather. For as the foul Weather lieth not in a Shower or two of Rain, but in an Inclination thereto for many Days together: So the Nature of War consists not in actual Fighting; but in the known Disposition thereto, during all the Time there is no Assurance to the contrary. Nor indeed was Mr. Hobbes the first Inventor of these Notions; for we meet with somewhat much of the same Strain in Plato's First Book of Laws; where Clinias, a Cretan, is giving the Reasons why the Law-giver of that Country introduc'd a great Number of Ordinances in Reference to military Affairs, he concludes, 'By which Conduct he seems to me to have accus'd many Men of extreme Folly and Ignorance, in their not being sensible, that all Cities are in a perpetual War with all. And that which we call Peace is no more than a bare Name, while in Reality Nature has set all Communities in an unproclaim'd War against one another.

We may observe, by the Way, that some Authors have given a very unaccurate Explication of this great Question; while they tell us, that by a natural State is understood that Condition by which we are conceiv'd to live singly, or out of Society; and that this is a State of War, that is, of Inclination to possess what another hath, and to drive the Owner from it; so that their whole Meaning amounts to this, that if Men liv'd without all Society, they would be engag'd in a perpetual Quarrel; or, if Men did not lead a Social Life, they would continue in a State of endless Discord. But now here's a great Impropriety committed, the opposing a State of Nature to a social Life; for those who live in a State of Nature both may, and ought, and frequently do, consent to live Socially.

hurting arises frequently from the Contention of Wit, while every Man thinks himself wiser than his Fellows; and yet at the same time cannot bear the same Arrogance in others. Hence, he says, it comes to pass that it is not only odious to contradict, but likewise not to consent: For not to consent to another in a Thing, is tacitly to accuse him of Error in that Matter; and to dissent in very many Things, is as much as to count him a Fool, in not being able to apprehend such an evident Truth, as every one takes his own Opinion to be. Hence since all Pleasure and Satisfaction of Mind consists in this, that one be able to prefer one's self to others, 'tis impossible but that now and then some Signs of Contempt towards others will break out; than which no Affront is more provoking to human Minds. The last and most frequent Cause of a mutual Desire of hurting, arises, according to Hobbes, from hence, that many desire one and the same Thing at once, which frequently they neither can nor will enjoy in common, nor yet divide: From whence it follows, that it must be given to the stronger; and who is the stronger, can only be known by Fighting. Upon all these Accounts he declares it to be impossible but that Men should live in perpetual Fear and Suspicion of one another. And that since not only natural Passion but Reason too, recommends to every Man his own Safety in the highest Manner, and indulges him in the Use of all Means for the attaining of that End, the Fitness of which, no Superior being yet admitted, is to be determin'd by each Man's particular Judgment; hence there must necessarily arise a Desire rather of preventing others, than of yielding to their Invasion: From whence there will at last result a State of infinite War, of all Men against all; the Consequence of which is, that it shall be lawful for any Man to do to any Man, either secretly or openly, whatever he shall think expedient for his own Affairs: In doing which, altho' his Reason should sometimes fail him, yet he would not offer an Injury to any Body, since

Justice and Injustice have nothing to do but with Societies and establish'd Corporations: Tho' a Man may indeed sin against Reason, by using unfit Means for his own Preservation.

VII. These Notions are in some Measure tolerable, if propos'd only by way of Hypothesis. And that Hobbes design'd them for nothing more, we may be apt to conclude from those Words in the eighth Chapter of his Book De Cive; But to return again to a natural State, and to consider Men as if they were just now risen out of the Earth like a Musbrome, and of full Stature without any manner of Obligation to one another. Yet in the 13th Chapter of the same Book, and frequently in other Places, he calls the State of publick Bodies, not by way of Supposition, but seriously and absolutely, natural, that is, as he explains it, hostile. Which seeming Contrariety we may do him the Justice thus to reconcile; it shall be pure Hypothesis, that all Men did at any time live together in such a State of Nature, as they would have done if they had risen suddenly in a great Multitude from the Earth: But what he seriously maintains shall be only this, that such a natural State doth really exist amongst some Men; that is, amongst such as are neither subject one to the other, nor to a common Master, as is now the Case of all establish'd Communities. And this indeed is his own Judgment, as he has moderated it in his Leviathan. Tho' (says he) there never had been any Time, wherein particular Men were in a Condition of War one against another; yet in all Times, Kings and Persons of Sovereign Authority, because of their Independency, are in continual Jealousies, and in the State and Posture of Gladiators, &c.

But the contrary Opinion seems more reasonable, as what is clearly favour'd by the Origin of Mankind, as related in the infallible Records of holy Scripture; which represent the natural State of Man, not hostile, but peaceful, and shew that Men in their true Condition are rather hearty Friends than spiteful Foes. From these sacred Histories we learn, that the first Man being by

^b Cicero Off. i. *Nam quicquid eiusmodi est, in quo non possint plures excellere, in eo sit plerumque tanta contentio, ut difficillimum sit, sanctam servare societatem. Whatever is of that Nature, as not to admit more than one to excel in it at the same Time, usually proveth the Subject of so much Strife and Contention, as exceedingly to endanger the sacred Peace of Society. Sic ista in Græcorum levitate perversitas, qui maledictis insectantur eos a quibus de veritate dissentiunt. Cicero de bon. & mal. Lib. ii. Chap. xxv. It is a Perverseness not peculiar to the Grecian Levity, to reproach those from whom they differ in Opinion. See also Charron of Wisdom, Lib. i. Chap. vii. Edit. Bourd. Thus Socrates discourseth, Xenophon. Apomem. Lib. i. Ἐστὶ γὰρ ἔχθρη οἱ ἀνθρώποι τὰ ἢ φιλικὰ (δοῦμαι γὰρ ἀλλήλων, καὶ ἐλεῖσι, καὶ συμπροσέτισι ἀφίστασι, καὶ τῆσσι σωματικῆς χάριτι ἔχθρη ἀλλήλων) τὰτε πολεμικὰ, τὰτε γὰρ αὐτὰ καλὰ καὶ ἴδια νομίζοντες. ὡσεὶ τῶνται μετῴνται, καὶ διαφορημωμένους ἐναντιῶνται, πολεμικὴν δὲ καὶ ἐχθρὴν καὶ ὄργην, καὶ εὐσφῆν μὴ ὁ τὰ πλεονεκτητῆ ἔως, μετῴνται δὲ ὁ φιλία. Men have partly a natural Propension to Friendship. For they stand in need of each other's Assistance, and are comforted with each other's Pity, and make the Return of mutual Thanks, upon receiving mutual Helps and Favours. And partly they are inclin'd to Enmity; for taking a Fancy to the same Things, as good and pleasant, they must needs fall into Quarrel and Opposition about them. Now Anger and Contention are the proper Marks and Characters of Enemies. And then Envy, and Suspicion, and Covetousness never fail to produce the most violent Hatred. Seneca de Ira Lib. iii. Ch. xxxiv. *The desiring the same Thing, which ought to be the Band of Love and Friendship, is often the Cause of Hatred and Sedition. divine Power produc'd out of the Earth, a Companion was soon join'd to him different in Sex, whose Substance was therefore taken out of him, to engage him immediately in the deepest Love and Affection for her, as being Bone of his Bone, and Flesh of his Flesh. This primitive and original Couple GOD Almighty was pleas'd to unite in the most solemn Manner, and with the most sacred Tie; and since from them all human Race orderly descended, we may conceive Mankind mutually engag'd, not only by such a vulgar Friendship as might result from Similitude of Nature^a, but by such a tender Affection as endears Persons allied by a Nearness of Race and of Blood: Altho' the Sense of this kind Passion may be almost worn off amongst the Descendants, by Reason of their great Distance from the common Stock. Now if any Man should pretend to divest himself of this Affection, and entertain a Temper of Hostility against all others, he ought to be censur'd as a Revolver from the primitive and natural State of Mankind. Nor will it signify much here to object, that even from this Account of Matters it follows, that the natural State of Men is a State of War; in as much as if Societies were therefore instituted at the Beginning of the World, to make Men live peaceably together, it must be true on the contrary Side, that without Societies, Men would not have liv'd peaceably, and that hence arose the Necessity of making Societies be born with them. To which we reply; that our present Enquiries are not made after such a natural State, as may be conceiv'd by the Help of Abstraction, but after such an one as really has been and is now in the World. And that therefore, since the first Mortals were plac'd in such a State as inspir'd them with Love, and not with Enmity, and since from this State all the rest of Mankind descended, it is plain if Men were mindful of their first Original, they might be rather accounted Friends than Foes. Nor were Societies therefore establish'd amongst Men from the Beginning, to hinder a natural State from taking Place, but because human Kind could not otherwise have been propagated and preserv'd. But a State of Nature did then arise, when Men being largely multiplied could no longer be contain'd in one Society². Hence it's Nonsense to say that without the Help of a social Condition, Mankind at the Beginning of their Being would have liv'd like Enemies one to another, unless we first suppose, that in the Beginning of Things a Multitude of Men started up together, without being beholden to one another for their Production. Aristot. Rhetor. Lib. i. Ch. xi^b. Because whatever is according to Nature, is pleasant and agreeable, and because those Things which are allied in their Original have a natural Resemblance to each other, all Things that are thus related, and thus alike, are, commonly speaking, as mutually delightful as Man to Man. Cicero De Fin. Lib. iii. Ch. xix. Nature hath given Men an universal Recommendation to each other; on which account, every Man owes so much to his Neighbour barely for the sake of being a Man like himself, as should hinder him from shewing any Unkindness or Strangeness. Idem De Nat. Deor. Lib. i. Ch. xxvii. Do you not see how full Nature is of Charms and Engagements, as if she intended to act the kind Procureess to herself? Do you imagine there is any Monster of Land or Sea, which is not delighted with the Fellow-Monster of its own Race and Shape? And is it any Wonder then, that she should have insill'd this Principle into Man (the most noble Member of her Family) to think nothing so beautiful as Man? Quintil. Declam. v. There is a publick, or universal, Kindred amongst Men, derived from Nature their common Mother. Add. M. Antonin. Lib. ix. §. 9. Where he prosecutes at large the Argument of the Likeness of Nature, inclining Men to Unity and Love. Add. & D. Cumberland, De L. N. Ch. ii. §. 18. We must interpret only of particular Love and Hatred that Saying of Belisarius in Procop. Hist. Vandal. Lib. ii. Ch. xv. By Nature Men have neither mutual Affection nor mutual Aversion. But their particular Actions, either by their Agreeableness inviting our Company and Friendship, or by their contrary Dispositions provoking our Hostility, render some the Objects of our Love, others of our Hate.

VIII. As to Mr. Hobbes's Reasons, they are easily answer'd. In the first Place, those cannot immediately hurt one another, who are divided by Distance of Place; for he who is absent cannot hurt me, except by some Body else who is present, and my Possessions cannot be destroyed unless by one upon the Spot: Therefore, since those who live separately, or at a Distance from one another, can offer no mutual Hurt so long as they continue thus distant, it doth not appear why such Men should not rather be reckon'd Friends than Enemies. For if any Person is more inclin'd to call them Neuters, he ought to understand, that the Term of Friendship may be there fairly applied, where there is neither Will nor Power to injure¹. And then

^a And such is that spoken of in Lib. iii. D. De Jusit. & Jure. ^b This is contrary to Aristotle's Notion of Friendship, who makes it to consist, not only in doing no Injury to others, but in the real and outward Performance of Kindness towards them.

§. VII. ¹ The Original has it, ne illi pacatè viverent, that they might not live in Peace. A gross Contradiction, tho' it be continued in all the Editions, even that of Mr. Hertius in 1706, and therefore I have changed the Words, and rendred them, That they might not live in perpetual Discord, as the English has also.

² Tradition has preserv'd some plain Footsteps of it among the Pagans. See Grot. de Ver. Rel. Christianæ Lib. i. §. 16. and the Interpreters upon Acts xvii. 26.

³ The Greek of Aristotle is, *Και επί τὸ κατὰ φύσιν ἴδου, τὰ συγγενῆ δὲ κατὰ φύσιν ἀλλήλοις εἶναι, ἅπαντα τὰ συγγενῆ καὶ ὅμοια, κτλ. α, ὡς ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ. οἷον αἰθρῶπος ἀνθρώπων, καὶ ἵππος ἵππων. καὶ ἄλλοι κτλ. — Cicero's Words are, Ex hoc nascitur, ut etiam communis hominum inter homines naturalis sit commendatio, ut oporteat hominem ab homine, ob id ipsum quod homo sit, non alienum videri. And again the same Author says, Non videt quam blanda conciliatrix, & quasi sui sit lena Natura? An putas ullam esse terra marique belluam, que non sui generis bellui maxime deleatur? — Quid igitur mirum si hoc eodem modo homini natura prescripsit, ut nihil pulcrius, quam hominem pularet, eam esse causam quod Deos hominum similes putaremus? Belisarius's Words in Procopius are, *ψοσι μὲν ἴδ, ἕδεις τῶν πάντων ἀνθρώπων οἰκίαις ἐν ἡ ἐνωπίαις ἀλλήλοις ἔχουσιν, αἱ δὲ πράξις ἐκαστων, ἢ τῶ ὁμοιότητι ἐς ζυμωχῶν σωμαπτασαι, ἢ τῶ διακρίσσει τῶ γρημῆς ἐς τὸ δυσπῆξις οἰακίαισσι, οἴαις (αἱ ἕταις τύχει) ἢ πολεμῆς ἀλλήλους ποῖσσι.

§. VIII. ¹ The Original imports, Word for Word, by the Will and Power not to hurt; but since our Author treats here of such Men as are not in a Condition to do Injuries one to another, tho' they have a Desire to do it, I believe that this Sentence may be better translated, A simple Want, if a Desire to hurt, joined with an Impossibility to do it actually, may pass for Friendship.

as for that Equality of Strength which Hobbes asserts, it is certainly more ^a ² fit to restrain, than to provoke a Desire of hurting. For no Man in his Wits is very fond of coming to an Encounter with his Equal, unless he is either driven upon it by Necessity, or by the Fairness of the Opportunity put in Hopes of Success. Otherwise, to engage in an unnecessary Fight, where the Blows one gives will be return'd with no less Force, and where the Event is merely dubious; is no better than Foolhardiness. For when two equal Combatants are so far engag'd as to put both their Lives in Danger, neither of them can possibly gain so much by the Victory, as he must lose who is kill'd in the Fight; nor is it so much to have taken away another's Life, as to have hazarded one's own. For the Danger to which I expose my Life, takes from me more Good, than can possibly accrue to me from my Enemy's Life being in the same Danger; nor is his Safety increas'd upon account ³ of the Uncertainty of mine: But each Party is a Loser, and yet the Loss of neither turns to the Advantage of the other.

Besides, the Causes alleg'd by Mr. Hobbes, why Men must have a mutual Desire of hurting, are only particular, and therefore cannot infer a Necessity of an universal War of all Men against all, but only a War of some particular Men against some others. And then it doth not always happen, as he would suppose, that modest and civil Men should have a more fierce and insolent Generation living near them; or if the Case be so, yet it is not necessary that the latter should be in a Humour of invading the former. Contention of Wit prevails only amongst Men exalted above the ordinary Level; the greater and vulgar Part of Mankind have none, or but very slight Touches of that Disease. Nor has the All-wise Creator been so unkind, or so sparing in his Provisions for human Race, that two Persons must always lay Claim to the same Thing. Farther, the general Wickedness of Men may have so much Effect as to hinder any one from rashly thrusting, or offering (as it were) his bare Breast to another, especially if he has not a Knowledge of him ^b ⁴. But, that this Suspicion or Diffidence should proceed so far as to the seizing, or the oppressing another, unless he hath declar'd a particular Desire and Design to hurt us, no Man of Sense will admit ⁵. Cicero (Off. i. 7.) rightly calls it, an Injury out of Fear, when he that is contriving to do another Man Mischief, doth it by way of Prevention, suspecting he should otherwise suffer Hurt from the Quarter where he now offers it. Hobbes is the more inexcusable for maintaining that his natural State cannot be remov'd and broken up, but by letting in the Sovereignty of another, and by uniting in the same Commonwealth: For that those Commonwealths, how distinct soever, which are allied by Friendship and by Leagues, should still continue in a State of mutual War, is a Contradiction evident to the common Sense of Mankind. Nor should we (as he would have us) discard all Peace, as not deserving that Name, which is not sufficiently firm and certain, any more than we should forbear saying, that such a Man is in Grace and Favour with another, because the Wills of Men are subject to continual Alterations.

IX. We must likewise take special Care to observe, that we are not disputing about the natural State of a meer Animal, govern'd by the sole Impulse and Inclination of the sensitive Soul; but of an Animal whose noblest and chiefest Part is Reason, the Sovereign and Controller of all other Faculties; and which, even in a natural State, has a common, a firm, and an uniform Measure to go by; namely, the Nature of Things; which, lastly, is very free and ready in offering itself, so far as to instruct us in the general Precepts of Living, and the Dictates of natural Law. And those who would rightly design and represent a State of Nature, ought by no Means to exclude the just Use of this Reason, but should join it with the Operations of the other Faculties. Forasmuch then as Man has not only the rash Cry of his Lufts, but also the sober Voice of Reason (not measuring itself purely by private Interest) to hearken to, if his wild Affections incite him to a War, such as that extravagant one of all Men against all, his Reason will be more powerful in dissuading him from it; and that chiefly by giving him these two Intimations, that a War undertaken without Provocation from the other Party, is both ¹ unseemly and unprofitable. For it is easy for any Man to gather thus much, that he did not exist of himself, but was produc'd by some Super-

¹ See D. Cumberland De L. N. Ch. ii. §. 29. Thus the Scythians argue in Q. Curtius, Lib. vii. Ch. viii. The firmest Friendship is between Equals, and those seem properly to be Equals, who have not made Experience of each other's Strength. So Cesar (De B. C. Lib. iii. Ch. x.) admonisheth Pompey, that this was the only Time to treat of Peace, whilst both seem'd Equals, and each had good Confidence of his own Power. Florus makes the like Remark on another Occasion. The Romans and the Parthians, says he, having try'd their Force against each other, and Crassus on the Side of the former, and Pacorus of the latter, having given them Examples of their mutual Abilities, they renew'd their antient Friendship with equal Deference and Respect. In *Thucydides, Lib. iii. §. 11. ² In the Latin of Q. Curtius the Scythians thus speak to Alexander, Nam & formissima est inter Pares amicitia, & videntur pares esse, qui non fecerunt inter se periculum virium. Cesar's Words are, Hoc unum esse tempus de pace agendi, dum sibi utroque consideret, & pares ambo viderentur. The Words of the Embassadors of Mitylene in Thucydides, are these, ὅτι ἐς ἀντιπαλον δεος, μὲν οὐκ ἐς ἐχθρομαχίαν, ὁ δὲ παραεὐνήθη βελήμπος τῶν [and not τῶν as it is commonly read] μη ἀμελεῖν ἐν ἰπ: ἄθειν δὲπρεσεται.

§. 18. ³ It is in the Original, inutile, but the Sequel makes it evident, that it ought to be understood, hurtful and prejudicial, and not barely, unseemly and unprofitable. See Note 1. upon §. 7. of Chap. iii. Lib. 1.

rior, who consequently retains a Power and Authority over him. And when he finds himself spurr'd on as it were by a double Principle, of which one is wholly fix'd on Things present, the other can embrace in its Thought what is absent or future; of which one drives him furiously on Dangers, Doubts, and Disorders, the other conducts him to nothing but what is comely and safe; he will conclude without any Difficulty, that 'tis the Pleasure of his Creator, he should rather follow the latter Guide than the former. And when to this Consideration is added, the exceeding great Benefit and Advantage of that quiet Condition which Reason advises, a Man cannot but naturally incline to Peace. Especially, since if at any Time he should happen to neglect his Reason, and follow his blind Passions, he would find by the sad Event that he took the wrong Measures, and would be ready to wish those Things to be undone, which were done against the Orders and Directions of his noblest Faculty. From all which we conclude, that the natural State of Men, altho' they be consider'd as not united in Commonwealths, is not War, but Peace. And this Peace chiefly depends on the following Laws and Conditions; that no Man hurt another, who doth not assault and provoke him; that every one allow others to enjoy their own Goods and Possessions; that he faithfully perform whatever shall be covenanted for, and voluntarily promote the Interest and Happiness of others, in all Cases where a stricter Obligation doth not interfere. For since the natural State of Man includes the Use of Reason, we must by no Means separate from it those Obligations which Reason tells us we lie under. And because every Man may discover it to be most for his Interest and Advantage, so to manage his Behaviour, as to procure rather the Benevolence, than the Enmity of others; he may easily presume from the Likeness of Nature, that other Men have the same Sentiments about the Point as himself. Therefore it is very foul Play, in describing this imaginary State, to suppose that all Men, or however, the greatest Part of them do act with Disregard and Defiance to Reason, which is by Nature constituted supreme Directress of human Proceedings; and such a State cannot, without the highest Absurdity, be call'd natural, which owes its Production to the Neglect, or to the Abuse of the natural Principle in Man ^a.

X. It will be in vain for any one here to object, the strange Barbarity which reign'd among most of the antient Nations and People; who seem to have had scarce any other Pleasure, or any other Business, but the Pursuits of Plunder and ¹ Prey; and amongst whom Robbery pass'd for one of the particular Professions and Ways of Living. For thus Aristotle in his Politicks, reckoning up the several Callings or Lives of the Herdmen, the Husbandmen, the Fishermen and the Hunters, adds to the rest the βίη ληστεικῆς, the Life of Thieves. And afterwards, War is in some sort a natural Way of acquiring Possession. For Hunting, or violently pursuing, is one of its chief Parts; and this may not only be used against Beasts, but likewise against such Men as, tho' they were born to obey, do yet refuse Subjection. We have numerous Testimonies to this Purpose in antient Writers. Vid. Homer. Odyss. iii. v. 73. and Odyss. ix. v. 252. on which Place Didymus tells us, that the Profession of Robbers amongst the Antients was not infamous but glorious. Diodor. Sic. Lib. iii. Ch. xlix. The Libyans on no Account observe any manner of Right, or any manner of Faith towards Strangers. Cæsar reports of the Germans, that those Robberies do not fall under Censure or Reproach, which are practis'd beyond the Bounds of each particular State: And the Excuse they alledge for them is, That they serve for the Exercise of Youth, and the Discouragement of Idleness. De B. G. Lib. vi. He tells us farther, That every State reckon'd it the greatest Honour and Glory to have as large Solitudes round them as possible, caus'd by their own Devastations: esteeming it a noble Testimony of their Valour, that their Neighbours were forc'd to quit the Country, and that none are so hardy as to live near them. Mela, Lib. iii. Ch. iii. gives the like Account of the Germans in general; but Tacitus speaks in manner only of the Vendredi, a particular People amongst them. Of the Spaniards, Plutarch (in Mario) reports, that Robberies pass'd amongst them till that Time for gallant Adventures. And Thucydides says as much of the antient Grecians, Lib. i. To the same Purpose some produce the Roman Law (l. ult. D. De Colleg.) where those Covenants are declar'd valid which pass between τῶν ἐπὶ λείαν ἐρχομένων, or ἐιχομένων, Persons who unite on the account of Booty or Prey. Tho' Salmasius, de Usuris Lib. i. Ch. xii. corrects the antient Reading into εἰς κατήλειαν, on the account of a drinking Match. Polybius, Lib. iii. mentions it as a Clause in a League between the Romans and Carthaginians, that the former should neither drive Booty to Massia and Tarfeium, beyond the fair Promontory, nor exercise Merchandize: As if both these Practices had been then esteem'd equally lawful. Justin, Lib. xliii. says of the People of Phocis, that they supported themselves by Piracy, which at that Time was look'd upon as Glory. Sextus Empiric. Hypot. Lib. iii. Ch. xxiv. To rob and spoil is reckon'd by no Means disgraceful amongst many of the barbarous Nations: Nay, the Cilicians are said to have accounted these Adventures most highly creditable and renown'd, so as to pay Honours to the Memory of such as died in their Prosecution. And Nestor, in the Poet, having kindly receiv'd Telemachus and his Company, asks them,

What, are you Rovers of the Plundering Trade—?

Now if Robbing had been then scandalous, it is not likely he would have entertain'd with so much Civility Persons whom he suspected of such a Course. Lib. ii. D. De Captio & Postlim. If there be a Nation, with which we have no Tye of Friendship, Hospitality, or League, we must not presently esteem them Enemies: Yet whatever of ours comes into their Possession belongs to them; and even a free Man of our Country, if taken by them becomes their Slave. Comp. Lib. ex. viii. de verb. signific. Dio Cassius, Lib. liv. speaking of the Rhetians, Often plundering, says he, their Neighbours the Gauls, they had driven Booty from the Borders of Italy, and had infested the Romans and their Allies in ^a This is most largely demonstrat'd by Bishop Cumberland, to whom the Reader is recommended for fuller Satisfaction.

§. x. ¹ Here our Author uses Virgil's Words, as he makes Numanus, surnam'd Romulus, to speak, their Passage through those Parts: And it was then a receiv'd Custom amongst them, to deal in this Manner with all those whom they were united to by solemn Leagues and Agreements. Mocrates (Panathen.) observes of the Triballians, There are no Men who observe a stricter Concord amongst themselves; but then they endeavour utterly to destroy all besides; not only their Borderers and Neighbours, but any People to whom they can force an Access. Add. Grot. Lib. ii. Ch. xv. §. 5. This ancient Hostility, amongst other Reasons that are given for it, might proceed, in a great measure, from the gross Superstition and Idolatry of those Nations, by which every People imagin'd themselves to have peculiar Gods, and those only true ones². Vid. Juvenal. Sat. 15.

In return to this vulgar Argument, 'tis sufficient to say, that in those blinder Ages of the World, the Dictates and Informations of sound Reason were choak'd and stifled by the Prevalency of corrupted Manners. Yet it doth not follow from hence, that there was no Man, even in those Nations, sensible enough to apprehend that the Laws of Nature were violated by this Course of Robberies and Spoils, or to disallow that State to be natural, into which wild and ungovernable Men had thrown themselves, in Neglect and in Contempt of the noblest Part of their Being. For that a promiscuous Liberty of Rapine doth not flow as a Consequence from a State of Nature, is evident, because the like ill Effect is not seen in the State which different Commonwealths now bear to one another, which is really natural. Nor must we admit what Hobbes farther asserts, that supposing Matters stood thus, Robbery or Pillaging would be contrary to the Law of Nature. For those who had plunder'd us in this Manner without Provocation, we might have treated with the like Violence, and have made Reprisals on their Possessions for the Loss of our own: But then we could not have shewn such rough Usage to a third Person, who had offer'd no Injury or Molestation to us before. The Impudence of some Persons, in breaking the Law of Nature, is no justifying Example for us to imitate. Nor is the Remark more tolerable which Hobbes subjoins, that this Kind of Life was not without Glory to them who exercis'd it valiantly, and yet not cruelly. As it was the Custom of some, who laid violent Hands on every thing else, to spare the Persons Lives, and to pass by the ploughing Oxen, and all the Instruments of Husbandry. Which they did, not as if they were oblig'd to it by the Law of Nature, but purely consulting their own Glory, lest their Cruelty should betray their Cowardice. A wondrous Glory indeed, to accomplish only half a Villany, when to have carried it through, would not have turn'd to so much Advantage!

XI. When we affirm that the Exercise of a Peace towards all Men as such, is the natural State of Man, we imply that it is instituted and establish'd by bare Nature, without the Intervention of any human Deed; and that therefore it depends solely on that Obligation of natural Law by which Men are bound as they are reasonable Creatures; and doth not owe its first Introduction to the Agreement and Covenant of Men. Hence to us it seems useless to frame any Pacts or Leagues, barely for the Defence and Support of this Universal Peace¹. For by such a League or Bond, nothing is superadded to the Obligation of the Law of Nature; or, no Agreement is made for the Performance of any thing, which Men were not before by the Law of Nature bound to perform: Nor is the former Obligation rendred stricter or firmer by such an Addition. For we suppose both Parties to remain in a natural Equality, and consequently not to be held to their Covenant by any other Tie, than that of Reverence towards GOD Almighty, and Fear of such Evil as may fall on them if they break the Agreement. Though indeed there appears somewhat of Balencis and Foulencis in refusing a Thing which one has expressly engag'd to perform. As for the Power and Liberty which the injur'd Party hath, of proceeding against such a Violator of Nature's Law, this is altogether the same, whether any antecedent Covenant hath been made, or not. Men of any tolerable Culture and Civility must needs abhor the entering into any such Compact, the Heads and Conditions of which imply only thus much, that the Party concern'd shall not offend in some Point, which was before an express Command of Nature. Besides, we should be guilty of great Irreverence towards GOD, should we suppose, that his Injunctions had not already laid a sufficient Necessity upon us, unless we ourselves voluntarily consented to the same Engagement; as if our Obligation to obey the divine Will depended on our own Pleasure. Therefore in every Covenant some Matter is to be insert'd, the Performance of which the other Party could not have required from me, by a bare Right of Nature, or which by viture of that Right only I did not fully and perfectly owe him; tho' it now becomes a true and absolute Debt, upon my Declaration, and his Acceptance of my Consent. Thus, as a Man who lets himself out to hire as a Servant to another, doth not set it down expressly and immediately amongst the Terms and Conditions of the Bargain, that he will not act perfidiously towards him, or that he will not pillage or plunder him; so that would be a shameful Agreement, in which a Man should only bind himself not to break the Universal Peace towards another; that is, not to use such a Right against him, as he obtains and exercises over Beasts. Yet supposing any such Robberies and Depredations, as we have been lately speaking of, to prevail amongst some Barbarous Nations, then, in order to the restoring the Universal Peace, there

² But this very Example may prove to our Author, that his Conjecture is not good, since the Poet sets it down as a singular Example, and he could not but know, that the Heathens did not hate, and persecute one another purely for Religion's sake. The Truth is, it was their Ignorance of the Law of Nature, and of the true Religion, which caused them to approve of these publick Robberies. And if any Persons looked upon them as unjust, yet they were forced, in a manner, to practise them, partly for their own Preservation, and partly by way of Reprisal. We may find that the Israelites themselves used them, as appears from the Example of Jephtha, Judges xi. 3. upon which Place consult Mr. Le Clerc's Comment. In fine, We may observe, that in the Select Observations, printed at Holt in Saxony for some Years, there are two Discourses upon this Subject worth our reading, viz. the sixth and seventh in Tom. VII. thus entituled, the one, Historia de latrocinio Gentis in Gentem; and the other, Moralitas latrocin. Gent. in Gent. The Author is James Thomajus, the Father of Mr. Thomajus, the famous Professor of Law at Hall in Saxony.

§. xi. * See Lib. viii. Ch. ix. §. 2. following.

would be Occasion to enter into Covenant, by which all Parties should tie themselves to the Practice of the Law of Nature towards one another. The Case is much the same, when two Nations, hitherto engag'd in War, shall, by Agreement, lay down their Arms on both Sides; for supposing that they do not come to any Terms of Settlement about particular Matters and Performances; then the only Thing concluded on and establish'd, is that general and common Peace. We find indeed in History, many Examples of Commonwealths reduc'd to such Extremities, as to purchase of their Spoilers this ² universal Peace and Forbearance of Injuries, not only by Compact, but by Tribute. Claudian De Laudib. Stilicon. Lib. i. v. 210, 211. says, that the Antients were obliged to do so, in these Verses,

*Illi terribiles, quibus otia cedere semper
Mos erat, & fœda requiem mercede pacisci.*

—————Those dreaded Foes, Traders in Peace, and Hucksters of Repose.

If between Nations or People, hitherto not known to one another by Benefits or Injuries, by Peace or War, any common Leagues are made, without descending to particular Points or Conditions; such Leagues are suppos'd to be entred on for the Establishment of a Friendship, which is reckon'd to imply a closer Union, than is produc'd by that general Peace of Nature. Or else we may take them only for solemn Protestations made by both Parties, that they will for the future observe ³ their mutual Offices and Duties. In the same Manner as Persons related, at their first Meeting, or their first Knowledge of one another, are us'd to make long Declarations and Promises to express their mutual Benevolence and Love.

XII. After all, it must be confess'd, that this natural Peace is but too weak and uncertain, and such as, without other Assurances, would prove but a very mean Defence to the Safety of Mankind; so that we might well enough express, and represent it in Ovid's Verse ⁴;

Pax tamen interdum est; pacis fiducia nunquam,
A Peace which all pretend, yet none can trust.

The Cause of which Unhappiness is the great Wickedness of Men, their unbridled Lust of Power, and their Desire of encroaching on the Rights and Possessions of others. When Micipsa King of Numidia, in Salust's ⁵, grew jealous of the growing Power of Jugurtha, we are told the chief Things that frighted him and set him on his Guard, were the Nature of Mankind, covetous of Dominion and Government, and violently bent on gratifying its Desires; and then the Advantage of Opportunity, which by the fair Hopes of Gain and Success, is able to seduce Men to ambitious Practices, who were otherwise moderate enough in their Wishes and in their Pursuits. Indeed these pernicious Charms of Avarice and of Ambition have taken so fast hold on human Minds, that even the most mild and gentle Doctrine of our Saviour CHRIST, which is perpetually inculcating the Rules of Peace, of Kindness, of Good-will, of Propension to forgive Injuries, of Humility, of Contempt of Riches and worldly Power; hath not been able to extinguish the most unjust Oppressions, Treacheries, and Wars amongst the Professors of that holy Religion. So that Plutarch's ⁶ Description will too exactly hit the Character of some Christian Princes, whose Desires, not Seas, nor Mountains, nor Deserts, can stop and conclude; not the Bounds which separate Europe and Asia can circumscribe. When such ambitious Spirits border on one another's Possessions, it is scarce possible that they should live satisfied with their proper Shares, and abstain from mutual Injuries and Invasions. In Effect they are continually engag'd against each other, Envy and Plotting being the necessary Consequences of their Temper. As for the two Names of Peace and of War, they use them just as they do Money, not as they are determin'd by Reason, but according to Custom and Convenience. Nor doth Paterculus's Remark affect only the Romans and Carthaginians, when he says ⁷, Amongst those People, there was perpetually either a War, or a Preparation for War, or a deceitful Peace. Therefore, as it is the Duty of an honest and good Man to rest contented with his own Lot, and not disturb the Portion of his Neighbour either by actual Invasions, or by covetous Desires: So it becomes a cautious and wary Man, and one who has a true Care and Concern for his own Safety, in such a Manner to believe all Men his Friends, as that they may soon turn his Enemies; in such a Manner to observe this Peace with all the World, as a State which may suddenly be converted into War ⁸. And the famous Saying of Dionysius Halicarnassensis ⁹, should often run in our Thoughts: So long as wicked Men have the Power of doing Mischief, they cannot want the Will. For which Reason Euripides ¹⁰, tells us, that a prudent Diffidence is a most useful and advantageous Quality: And that a wise Man ought ¹¹ neither to act like a Sheep, nor like a wild Beast, to be neither tame in suffering Violence, nor furious in offering it ¹².

Nations, hath left these two Characters of the Chauci and the Cherufci, very remarkable for their Opposition ⁸. The former he calls a most noble People, who choosing to maintain their Greatness by their Justice, living in Secrecy and Quiet, without Ambition, and without Insolence, by never inviting War, they never feel it; by never doing, they never suffer Violence and Spoil. And this is the principal Mark of their Virtue and of their Power, that their Superiority is not obtain'd by Injury. Yet they have always Arms ready at hand for their Defence; and upon Occasion could bring together a mighty Army: And their Numbers of Men and Horses make them famous and terrible, in the midst of their peaceful Repose. The latter, he tells us, Ch. xxxvi. were too fond of cherishing a long and a decaying Ease. This was more pleasant to them than safe. For amongst stout and daring People, 'tis never the true way to lie still; and where Men are busy in Action and Contention, Honesty and Probity belongs to the Titles of Conqueror ⁹. Thus the Cherufci, who had once the Repute of Equity and Justice, now lie under the Imputation of Folly and Cowardice. So true is the Observation of Dio the Orator ¹⁰, that those who are best prepar'd for War, may most securely live in Peace.

⁸ Tacit. de Morib. German. Ch. xxxv. n. 4, 5, 6. Populus inter Germanos nobilissimus, quique magnitudinem suam malit iustitia tueri, sine cupiditate, sine impotentia, quieti secretique, nulla provocant bella, nulli raptibus, aut latrocinis populantur. Idque precipuum virtutis ac virum argumentum est, quod, ut superiores agant, non per injurias adsequantur. Prompta tamen omnibus arma, ac si res poscat, exercitus; plurimum virorum, equorumque, & quiescentibus eadem summa.

⁹ The same Author's Words are, Cherufci nimiam ac marcentem diu pacem inlaccessit nutriterunt, idque jucundius, quam tutius fuit; quia inter impotentes, & validos, falso quiescas, ubi manu agitur, modestia, & probitas nomina superioris sunt. Ita qui olim boni & quique Cherufci, nunc inertes, & stulti vocantur.

CHAP. III.

Of the Law of Nature in general.

The CONTENTS.

- I. The Connexion.
- II, & III. The Law of Nature is not common to Man and Beasts.
- IV. The Object of the natural Law is not necessary before there is a Law.
- V, & VI. Whether the natural Law is common to GOD and Man.
- VII, VIII, & IX. The natural Law does not depend upon the Consent of Nations.
- X, & XI. Whether Profit be the Foundation of Law.
- XII. Whether the Law of Nature appears plain from the End of the Creation.
- XIII. The Principles of natural Right are discover'd by the Light of Reason.

- XIV. The true Original of the Law of Nature is derived from the Condition of Man.
- XV. The fundamental Law of Nature.
- XVI, XVII, & XVIII. Hobbes's Opinion is enquired into.
- XIX. The former Original is sufficient.
- XX. The Obligation of the Law of Nature is from GOD.
- XXI. Of the Establishment of the Law of Nature.
- XXII. Some Things are said to be of the Law of Nature reductively and improperly.
- XXIII. Whether the Law of Nature is different from the Law of Nations.
- XXIV. A Division of the Law of Nature.

SINCE then it appears inconsistent with the Nature and the Condition of Man, that he should live entirely loose from all Law, and perform his Actions by a wild and wandering Impulse, without Regard to any Standard or Measure; it follows, that we make Enquiry into that most general and universal Rule of human Actions, to which every Man is oblig'd to conform, as he is a reasonable Creature. To this Rule Custom hath given the Name of natural Law, and we may call it likewise the Law universal and perpetual; the former, in Regard that it binds the whole Body of human Race, the latter, because it is not subject to change, which is the Disadvantage of positive Laws. What this Law is, whence the Knowledge of it arises, what are the chief Marks and Tokens by which it is discover'd, what Matters are to be refer'd to that, and what to positive Constitutions; are Points which require the more careful Examination, because if this Basis and Ground-work should be ill laid, whatever we afterwards build upon it must fall of Course. 'Tis a good Rule of Plato (in Cratyl, p. 299. Edit. Francof.) A Man ought to be very strict and accurate in examining the first Principle and Foundation of Things, and no less copious and distinct in explaining them; inasmuch as these Points being once clearly settled, the whole Scheme of Doctrine regularly follows. And so much the more ought this Rule to be observ'd in our present Subject, the more Truth there is in that Remark of ² Lactantius, Lib. iii. Ch. vii. p. 224. Ed. Oxon. Because in framing the Manners and forming the Model of Life, it is the highest and most fatal Danger to mistake; we ought to apply the stricter Diligence to the Study of our Duty. In this great Point there is no Allowance for Error or Disagreement, all ought to be of one Opinion, and to declare with a common Mouth the same Doctrine : Since the least Slip may overturn the Rule and Order of Living. To the same Purpose Diogenes Apollonias (in Diog. Laert. Lib. ix. Segm. 57.) Every Discourse, in my Judgment, ought to take its Rise from some clear and manifest Principle ; and the Style made use of should be plain and grave.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. III.

² Lactantius's Words are, Et quoniam in disponendo vite statu fermandisque moribus, periculo majori peccatur, majorem diligentiam necesse est adhiberi, ut sciamus, quomodo nos oporteat vivere. — Hic vero nullus dissilio, nullus errori est locus, omnes unum sentire oportet, ipsamque philosophiam, uno quasi ore precipere, quia, si quid fuerit erratum, vita omnis evertitur.

II. The Roman Lawyers defin'd the Law of Nature, to be that Law which Nature teaches all living Creatures ; which therefore is not peculiar to Man, but is apprehended and observ'd by other Animals. So that according to this Hypothesis, those things must be said to belong to the Law of Nature, which Brute Creatures either affect and pursue, or avoid and abhor : Whence it naturally follows, that there must be a Law common to Men and Beasts. Which Opinion it's likely might proceed from that famous old Notion about the Soul of the World, of which all other Souls were a kind of ἀσπάρματα or Particles, being in themselves all of the same Nature, but exerting different Operations, according as they fell on different Bodies, and met with different Organs for the Conveyance of their Strength and Powers. Nearly allied to this Fancy was the Μετεμύθεσις, or Transmigration of Souls, according to which Men and Beasts were thought to differ only in their corporeal Figure, having Souls altogether of the same Nature, and mutually lending to each other. But the general Consent of learned Men hath discarded this common Law of animate Beings : Inasmuch as it is impossible to conceive how a Creature should be capable of Law, and at the same time incapable of Reason. Hesiod. Op. & Dier. Lib. i. ver. 275.

Τὸν δὲ ὃ ἀνθρώποις, ἴμεν (Δίκα) διδάξει Κρόνος,
Ἰχθύων, ἔρ, καὶ θηρίων, καὶ ἀσπίδος πετεινῶν,
Ἐστὶν ἀλλήλων, ἐπεὶ καὶ δίκην ἐστὶν ἐπ' αὐτοῦ.
Ἀθρότοις, ὁ ἔδωκε δίκην, ἢ πομπὴν ἀρίστην Γότα.

This Law did Jove for human Race ordain :
The Beasts, the Fishes, and the feather'd Train
He left to mutual Spoil and mutual Prey,
But Justice gave to Men.

And altho' there are several Actions of Men and

Beasts very much alike, on the Performance of which the former are said to have fulfill'd the Law ; yet in Strictness and Reality they are extremely different, since they are done by Brutes out of simple Inclination of Nature, but by Men out of Obligation, of which those other Creatures have no Sense. And therefore we must suppose Authors to speak figuratively, when they attribute to such inferior and dumb Animals, Justice, Fortitude, Pity, Gratitude, or Chastity ; only because they perceive in some of their Proceedings the Shadow and Semblance of these Virtues. For Things which seem alike in their external Face and Appearance, are by no means the same, if they proceed from different internal Principles. As for Grotius's Opinion, that some Acts of other Creatures are dispos'd in an extraordinary manner, by an external Reason or Principle, as the Works of Bees and of Ants, and the Frugality which some seem to use about what they have got, for the Benefit of their Kindred and Offspring ; this is allowable only if we mean by it, that the Nature of these Creatures is in such a manner temper'd by the Divine Creator, as to be capable of producing such Actions ; not that any outward Principle violently guides and steers them, as a Pilot doth a Vessel. Nor is it difficult to understand, why they do not discover the same Cunning in other Matters equally obvious ; if we suppose with the new Philosophers, that whatever Form irrational Animals enjoy, arises purely from the Figure and Disposition of material Particles, and from the Variety of their Movements. Especially since even amongst Men we may find those who are extremely quick and ready at some sorts of Business, yet strangely dull and heavy about others, not more difficult and abstruse : Which can proceed from nothing else, but from the particular Disposition of their Parts, especially of the Brain and Spirits. Those therefore who will have a Law of Nature in Brutes, because they see them acting now and then with some Appearance of Regularity and of Design, abuse the Term of Law, by an undue and unnecessary Application.

Besides, there can be found no dumb Creature

^a 'Tis certain, that this was the Opinion of the Stoicks, as Justus Lipsius in his Physiol. Stoic. Lib. i. Diff. viii. and Lib. iii. Diff. viii. makes it appear, and most of the Roman Lawyers were of the same Principles as that Sect of Philosophers, as Mr. Gravina has proved by many Examples. See his Origines Jur. Civil. printed at Leipzig in 1708. p. 80, &c. But it does not from hence follow, that the Definition of natural Right which Ulpian gives, is grounded on this Opinion, as after our Author, Mr. Buldus in his first Discourse of the Errors of the Stoicks, which is amongst his Analecta Hist. Philosoph. §. 6. and Mr. Ludovici in his Delineatio Hist. Juris Divin. Nat. & Posit. &c. §. 14. affirm, who also quotes, Ja. Thomae. Physic. Chap. xxxviii. Quest. xxxii. and Hornius, De Subjecto Jur. Nat. &c. for they suppose, as they necessarily must, that the Stoicks attribute Reason to Beasts, but they take it for granted, by a Petito principi, without Proof, since they alledge no Authority but the Definition itself, which they produce, to prove, that according to them, these ancient Philosophers must believe that Beasts have Reason. The contrary appears by divers plain Passages. In homine optimum quid est? Ratio (says Seneca) hac antecedit animalia, Deos sequitur—Quid in homine proprium? Ratio Epist. lxxvi. p. 294, 295. See also his cxxiv. Epist. p. 621, 622. Ed. Gron. 'Tis certain that the Stoicks did not acknowledge a Law common to Man and Beasts. Cicero is plain as to this Point, Et quo modo hominum inter homines juris esse vincula putant, sic homini nihil juris esse cum bestis. De finib. bon. & mal. Lib. iii. Chap. xx. and Diog. Laertius. Ἐπι αἰσθητῶν ἀποτοῦ μὴ εἶναι ἡμῶν δικαίον πρὸς τὰ ἄλλα ζῶα, διὰ τὸν ἀνομοιωτήτα. &c. In Zenone, Lib. vii. §. 129. p. 446. Edit. Amstel. See what is said upon §. 3. Note 10. following. As also Cicero De Offic. Lib. i. Ch. xvi. and Grotius, Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 11.

^c The Original has it, Principio intrinseco, contrary to the Connexion of this Discourse, and the express Words of Grotius. But Mr. Horius has amended it in his Edition of 1706, and made it, extrinseco, as it ought to be.

^d See Mr. Bayle's Dictionar. Historiar. & Critic. Tom. iii. p. 261c. of the second Edit.

^e Nevertheless our Author does not follow that System, as we may judge from many Places in his Works, which suppose the contrary. See what I have said, Lib. i. Chap. iii. §. 1. Note 1.

which performs all the Duties and Offices of Man; on the contrary, there is scarce any rational Proceeding, to which some Brutes do not ⁶ act directly opposite. Yet in Harangues to the People, it is reckon'd a high Aggravation of a Crime, to shew, that even brute Creatures abhor the Commission of such Enormities. Thus Plato ^a says, that in arguing against the unnatural Vice of Pollution with the same Sex, it would be proper to appeal to the Nature of Beasts, in whom we do not discover the same foul and monstrous Practices ^b.

III. Some Persons indeed (rather I believe to shew their Wit, than out of any serious Design, have asserted this Community of Law between Men and Beasts, and back'd their Assertion with a numerous Heap of Arguments, all which have been long since most solidly confuted. It shall be enough for us to touch lightly on the Proofs which they draw from Scripture. That Text then in Gen. ix. 5. Your Blood will I require at the Hand of every living Thing, according to some Expositors, imports only thus much, that GOD would revenge the Murder of a Man committed, not only by the Hands or the Weapon of another, but by the Fury of wild Beasts set on him by the others Command. Inasmuch as in the Antediluvian Times many violent Tyrants and Oppressors us'd to keep wild Beasts, to serve for Executioners of those who displeas'd or affronted them ^c. Others give this

Interpretation, that GOD will sometimes make even wild Beasts ² the Instruments of punishing Murderers. Others again understood by every living Thing ³ only every Man, as if GOD only declar'd that no human Murderer should escape his Justice. In Leviticus xviii. 23. and xx. 15, 16. Command is given, that if any Man or Woman are found guilty of Bestiality, ⁴ the Beast shall be ston'd, without any Difference of Age. Yet the Jews observ'd such a Difference of Years in regard to the human Parties of both Sexes; so that if a Boy were not above nine, and a Girl above three Years old, they maintain'd that no Punishment ought then to be inflict'd, either on the Person, or on the Beast; because they would not allow that the Pollution forbidden in the Law could be actually committed at such an Age. Now when they ston'd the Beast, they did not do it because the Beast had properly offended; but partly lest the Sight of that Creature should incite some other Person to the like foul Passion, and partly lest the Beast remaining alive should keep up the scandalous Remembrance of the human Offender, who had suffer'd Punishment, Gratian, Caus. xv. Quest. i. Ch. iv. The Reason why the Beasts were order'd to be kill'd, seems to have been because they would renew the unhappy Remembrance of the foul Crime. Philo Judæus (De special. leg.) adds a third Reason, Lest the Beast should bring forth any detestable Monster, such as usually proceed from unnatural Impurities, and such as

⁶ Mr. Bayle has made some Reflexions which may please the Reader, and therefore I shall give him them in his own Words: It is a pretty Common-place in Morality, to compare Mens irregular Actions with the regular Motions of the Beasts. (See Horace Epod. vii. Juvenal. Sat. xv. and Boileau Sat. viii.) But how finely soever it may appear, and however it may affect, it is nevertheless but a weak way of Arguing; for first, it may be eluded by way of Banter, and secondly may be more seriously answered by this Maxim:

Nil agit exemplum, litem quod lite resolvit.

That Argument is of no Force,
Which when retorted is the worse.

Barbara, the Wife of Sigismund the Emperor, designing to marry again after the Death of her Husband, one suggested to her the Example of the Turtle, which always remains single after the Death of her Mate. To which she answered, if you will propose to me the Example of a beast, instance in that of Pigeons and sparrows. Thus the first Sort of Argument is easily solv'd without any Inconvenience. Nor is the other more difficult, for the Man whom you'll send to school to the Beasts, to learn his Duty, will reply, he desires no better Masters, for he'll tell you, I shall learn of them to yield up Right to Force. The strongest Dog makes no Scruple to take the Moriel from his Fellow. How often do we see Dogs quarrelling for their Meat? Will not Chickens fight one with another in the Sight of their common Mother? Do not Cocks fight so furiously one with another, that nothing but the Death of one of them can end the Combat? Do not Pigeons, the very Image of Mildness, often come to Blows one with another? What more furious Quarrels are there than those of Bulls? Does any Thing but Force decide Right among them in Matters of Love? (Horace Lib. i. Sat. iii. v. 110.) Can a more unnatural Barbarity be any where learned than at this School? Do not some Beasts devour their own Young? Shall I not learn Incest from them? (Ovid Metamorph. Lib. x. v. 323, &c.) Must I learn to conform my self so to them, as to lay up my Provisions as the Ant does? (Horace Sat. 7, Lib. i. Sat. i. v. 32, &c.) May not I rescue myself from that hard Bondage which makes all Men groan, and wrings such grievous Complaints from them as these?

How blest are you,
Wild Beasts, that are, in loving, ty'd unto

No Laws but those of Love! whilst human Laws Inhumanly constrain us, rather than Canje. Pastor Fido.

This does not hinder but that such Morality may be properly applied to the greatest Part of Mankind, Distionar. Historie. Crit. Tom. i. p. 475, 476. See what our Author has said, Ch. i. §. 4. Grotius also observes, that there is no Action commendable in Man, but GOD has impress'd some Footsteps of it in the Beasts which are destitute of Reason. De Jure bel. & Pac. Lib. ii. Chap. xiv. §. 2. Num. ii. in the Notes. Lastly, It is always certain, that no Right common to Man and Beasts, can be established, nor can the Instinct of Beasts be taken for a Rule of natural Right, properly so called: and such as take such a Course run a great Hazard of falling themselves into Scepticism, or leading others into it, by the manifest Uncertainty of the Maxims built upon such weak Principles. See the Discourse, De Scepticismo Morali, among Mr. Puddeus's Academiæ Hist. Philosoph. §. 32.

§. III. ¹ This is but a Vision of some Rabbi. See Selden of the Law of Nature and of Nations among the Hebr. B. i. Ch. v. Ed. Argent.

² Some turn it thus, God will require your Blood at the Hand of every Beast: but the Proposition in the Original will not bear that Translation.

no pious Man can bear the Sight of ^a. Thus too, Deut. xiii. 15, 16. GOD commands the Israelites, in rooting out the idolatrous Nations, to destroy the very Beasts; only to shew the Heinousness of that Crime, not as if the Beasts could be Partakers of it. It is observable, that if a Gentile living amongst the Jews, had been polluted with a Beast, the Man only suffer'd Death, but the Beast escap'd. According to the Law in Exodus xxi. 28. the going Ox was to be ston'd; not because he had properly committed a Fault, but that he might not offer the like Hurt another Time, and that the Owner who had negligently kept him, might be punish'd by his Loss: And hence they were not allowed to eat the Flesh of such an Ox. This Punishment was thought sufficient when the Owner was but slightly in Fault, or when he was ignorant of the Fierceness of the Beast: Whereas if he knew him thus furiously dispos'd, and still neglected to keep him up, he paid for the Mischief with his own Life, being made a sad Partner in the Punishment. And here again the Rabbins tell us, that the Ox was ston'd only when he had kill'd a Jew, not if a Gentile had perish'd by his Violence. And indeed it was a Custom in several other Nations, to destroy such Things as had been the Instrument of any Mischief, or of any Misfortune ^c. Thus it appears from the Orations of Demosthenes against Aristocrates, and of Aeschines against Ctesiphon, that by the Athensian Laws, Stones, Clubs, Axes, and several other such Things, when they had been made use of in the Commission of Murder, were brought formally into Court, as it were in order to undergo a Penalty. Thus the Statue of Theagenes in Thasos having unfortunately kill'd a Man by falling on him, the People order'd it to be dragg'd into the Sea ^b. St. Ambrose calls the Copulation of Asses and Mares, by which Mules are produc'd, forbidden, not because the Beasts contract any Guilt in those Practices, but because Men are forbidden to procure any such unnatural Mixture ^d.

We may excuse those learned Compilers of the Roman Laws, by urging in their Defence, that by the Term of the Law of Nature; they meant that ⁷ Order instituted by the great Creator, chiefly in those Things which make directly for the Preservation of Nature, or of the Species and Individuals of all animate Beings. And it is the more probable, that they took it in such a Sense, because ⁸ they set down as the chief Heads of this Law, only the Conjunction of Sexes, the Procreation and Education of Off-spring, and Self-defence. Many other Authors have us'd the same Terms in the same improper Manner; as particularly Mr. Yves of Paris, in his Treatise concerning the natural Law ordain'd by God over all created Things, and Des Cartes, in his Principles of Philosophy. We may conclude this Point with the excellent Observation of Plutarch ^e, Nature, says he, as in those Trees and Shrubs which we call wild, she hath sown the crude and imperfect Principles of true and pleasant Fruits; so in Brutes hath implanted an imperfect Love of their Off-spring, not belonging to the Head of Justice, nor reaching beyond the Inducements of Profit and Advantage. But in Man, whom she produc'd for a rational and a civil Being, for the Worship of God, for the Observation of Justice and of Laws, for the building of Cities, and for a social and friendly Life; in Man, I say, she has fix'd the Seeds of this Love in a fairer and in a more plentiful Manner: And in this she hath follow'd the first Principles of his Body, and the original Ingredients of his Constitution.

IV. Others make the Object of natural Law to be such Acts as do in themselves include a moral Necessity or Turpitude, and which are therefore in their own Nature either absolutely requisite or unlawful, and which we must of Consequence suppose to be necessarily commanded, or necessarily forbidden by GOD. And this Mark, they say, distinguishes natural Law, not only from human, but from the divine positive Law, which doth not command or forbid Things in their own

⁵ Our Author hath forgot a fourth Reason, as considerable as any of them, which is this, That GOD, that he might make us sensible how detestable such abominable Crimes were to him, would have every Thing destroyed which contributed any way to the Commission.

⁶ The Officers of Lyons, Maçon, and Autun in the xvth Age, pass'd several Sentences upon the Beasts that annoyed their Country. Sometimes also they caus'd the Case of the Inhabitants and Beasts to be pleaded judicially by their Advocates, who produc'd the Reasons for each Party, before they pass'd Sentence. See the Critical History of Superstitious Practices, written by F. Le Brun, an Extract of which is found in the News from the Republ. of Letters, in July 1702. Article iv. p. 63.

⁷ There is all the Evidence in the World to believe, that they understood by it what the Stoicks call, τὸ πρῶτα κατὰ φύσιν, as Mr. Hærtius briefly observes. See Aul. Gellius. Lib. xii. Chap. v. & Cicero De fin. bon. & mal. who translates it, Prima secundum naturam, Lib. v. Ch. vii. Not that they believed, that this natural Impression, which inclines Men to preserve themselves and theirs, is exactly the same, as is observed in Beasts, or that it established a common Right in either of them; but they held, that this latter had some Relation to the former, and the Likeness of the outward Effects made this natural Right to be looked upon to be in some sort common to Man and Beasts, in a figurative Notion. See Vinnius upon the Institutes, Lib. i. Tit. ii. init. This appears, in my Judgment, from the Manner in which Ulpian expresses himself, for he doth not say that the Beasts are, istius juris perita, but only, perita censerit; that is, they did not properly know the Engagements of natural Right, but are only thought to know them. The same Ulpian says elsewhere, That a Beast in hurting a Man, or doing him some Damage, does him no Injury, because he doth not know what an Injury is; from whence it follows, that there is no Right common to Man and Beast. Pauperies est damnum sine injuria facientis datum. NEC ENIM potest animal injuriam fecisse, quod sensu caret. Digest. Lib. ix. Tit. i. Leg. i. §. 3.

⁸ Hinc descendit maris atque fœminæ conjunctio, quam nos matrimonium appellamus, hinc liberos procreatio, hinc educatio. Digest. Lib. i. Tit. i. De justitia & jure, Leg. i. Nam jure hoc evenit, ut quod quisque ob tutelam corporis sui fecerit, jure fecisse existatur. Ibid. Leg. iii. This last Law, as it is placed, has Respect to the Right of Nations, as Vinnius upon the Institutes has observed; and this appears by the Reason alledged by the Lawyer of Florence, from whom these Words are taken, for he appeals to Nature, which has established a kind of Relation among us, by Virtue of which one Man can't, without a Crime, do any Evil to another. Our Author, who ought to have observed this, says, That divers learned Men, and among them Yves of Paris, in his Treatise De Jure Nat. à Deo rebus creatis constituto, and Mr. Des Cartes, in his Principles, have made a wrong Use of this Term, natural Right.

Nature necessary or unlawful ¹, but by forbidding Things makes them unlawful, and by commanding Things makes them necessary: while the Things forbidden by the natural Law are not therefore evil, because GOD hath forbidden them; but GOD therefore forbid them, because they were in themselves evil: And, on the other Hand, the Things enjoin'd by the same Law, are not made good or necessary by GOD's enjoining them; but were therefore enjoin'd by GOD, because they were in themselves simply good and necessary ². But now besides that upon admitting this Opinion, it would remain a most perplexing Doubt what those Acts are which we thus suppose in themselves unlawful, and by what distinguishing Token they may be clearly known from others: We have already shewn in our former Book b, that no Actions are in themselves good or bad, honest or vile, till they are made so by some Law. Nor ought any Man to be shock'd with such a Scruple as this; "If all the Morality of human Actions depends on some Law, might not GOD therefore have so fram'd the Law of Nature, as to enjoin Things directly contrary to the present Duties?" for Example, if amongst the mutual Offices due from Men to one another, he should have put killing, stealing, fornicating, and bearing False-witness; and amongst the prohibited Actions, Gratitude, keeping Faith, paying Loans, and the like." For here, tho' it seems altogether a needless and an impudent Curiosity to enquire what GOD might have done, when it appears plainly what he hath done; yet if any Man should persist in such Vanities, we may assure him, that such a Doubt as we have been proposing, implies a manifest Contradiction. For altho' GOD was not oblig'd by any Necessity to create Man (as I think those Persons have but a very narrow and unworthy Notion of the divine Power, who believe it would have diminish'd any Thing from GOD's Glory, not to have made these poor Inhabitants of the Earth ³) yet when he once decreed to create him a rational and a social Being, it was impossible but that the present natural Law should agree to him; not by an absolute, but ² by an hypothetical Necessity. For should Man have been engaged to the contrary Performances, not a social Animal, but ³ some other Species of barbarous and horrid Creatures had been produc'd. Notwithstanding all which, it remains for a certain Truth, that antecedently to the Imposition of any Law, all Actions are to be esteem'd indifferent. For by decreeing to create Man, that is, to create an Animal whose Actions should not be all indifferent, GOD immediately constituted a Law for his Nature. Neither from our Assertion, that all Actions are in themselves indifferent, before the Application of Law, doth it follow, that GOD could have order'd our worshipping him with Blasphemy, or ⁴ with Contempt; as Vasquez ^d rashly maintains. For a rational Creature, that is, a Creature indued with the Faculty of apprehending Things as they truly are, cannot form any other Conception of GOD than to acknowledge him a Being not only vastly his Superior in Nature and Dignity, but likewise his proper Lord and Governor in the highest Degree. For otherwise he would conceive a meer Idol, or indeed any Thing rather than a GOD. But now it is plainly contradictory, to suppose a Being at the same Time the most eminent and the most despicable; a Governor design'd purely to be insulted on by his Subjects; and to express our Acknowledgment of the Excellency and the Power of the divine Nature, by such Signs as denote directly the contrary. Therefore to say that GOD cannot establish such horrid Absurdities by a Law, doth no more detract from his Omnipotence, than to say, that he cannot die, that he cannot be untrue, that he cannot make Things undone, which have been already done.

§. IV. ^a Grotius (Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 15. Num. i.) criticises upon the Philosopher Anaxarchus, as having spoke too generally, that what Things GOD wills, he wills not because they are just, but they are just because he wills them. This was the Occasion; Alexander the Great, despairing of the Life of Clitus, his Favourite, whom he had slain in his Passion, because he had spoken sincerely to him, Anaxarchus, to comfort him, said to him, in vile Flattery, "Οὐκ ὀσέει δὲ τὴν Διὸς ἔχει παρεδρονὸν Ζεὺς, καὶ τὸ Θέμισ, ἢ αὐτὸν τὸ πραχθεὶ ὑπὸ τῷ κρατύντος θεοῦ καὶ δικαίου; Plut. in Alexand. p. 695. ed. Wech. i. e. Know'st thou not that the Poets say, that Jupiter has Themis? i. e. Right and Justice sitting by him, which signifies, That all that a Prince does is holy, right and just? By which Anaxarchus gives us to understand, That as GOD regulates Justice according to his Will, so a Prince can change, as he pleases, the Rules of Right and Wrong. This is just the Language of Flatterers, and the Principle of Mr. Hobbes, who destroys all Justice, and yields up plainly the Will of GOD to the Humour of Princes, since all that a Prince does being just, because he does it, if he thinks good to do it, GOD must will it also, and approve of it as just. Plutarch elsewhere relating this Story, maintains that Anaxarchus did very ill to speak so to Alexander, because instead of advising him to repent of his Fault, he had laid down a Maxim, which would encourage him to do the same again. The Truth is (says he) that Jupiter has not Justice sitting on his side, but is himself perfect Justice, and is more ancient, as well as more perfect than all Laws. This Fiction of the Antients tends to make us understand, that without Justice, Jupiter himself could not govern as he ought, "Οὐκ ὀσέει εἶναι τὴν Διὸς παρεδρονὸν, ἀλλὰ αὐτὸς δίκη καὶ θεμὶς ἐστὶ, καὶ νόμος ὁ πρῶτος καὶ τελειότερος: οἱ παλαιοὶ ἔτα δέξασθαι, καὶ γράφασθαι, καὶ διδασκασθαι, ὡς ἀπὸ δικῆς ἄρχεται μηδὲ τῷ Διὶ καλῶς δυναμῆρα. Ad Princip. indoct. Tom. ii. p. 781. We may see by these Words, that this Philosopher in establishing the Will of GOD, as the Foundation of Right and Wrong, supposes at the same Time, that his Will is not purely arbitrary, but that he immutably follows what the Perfection of his Nature requires. See also the Reflexion which Arrian makes upon this Matter in his Expedit. Alexand. Lib. iv. Ch. ix.

² We understand by hypothetical or conditional Necessity, that which is founded upon some Supposition without which it could not be. And so in the Matter in hand, we must suppose the Will of GOD as a Condition, without which there could be no Law of Nature, since if GOD had not freely determined to send into the World such a Creature as Man, we can't conceive that there should be any Rule of Life given, which should necessarily agree to the Constitution of a reasonable and sociable Creature. See Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 4. Note 4.

⁴ Our Author observes here, that the Sacrifices of Hercules of Linlus, of whom, among others, Laclantius speaks (Insultu. Divin. Lib. i. Ch. xxi. p. 98, 99. Edit. Oxon.) are the abominable Inventions of senseless Men.

We may observe farther on this Argument, that if the Definition of natural Law is to be founded on that necessary Honesty or Turpitude of some Actions, it must be always perplexed and obscure, and run round in an unconcluding Circle; as will appear to any Man who examines the Definition laid down by Grotius. And Dr. Cumberland excellently remarks, Ch. v. §. 9. that in defining the Law of Nature, when we use the Word Good, we must mean natural, and not moral Good; since it would be the highest Absurdity to define a Thing by such Terms as suppose it to be already known; those very Terms being deriv'd as Consequences from it, and depending on it as to their own Evidence and Certainty.

V. Those Authors who search for the first Pattern, or the original Draught of natural Law in GOD himself, are divided into two Parties. For some placing the Spring and Fountain, as it were, of it in the divine Will, do thence conclude, that inasmuch as that Will is in the highest Manner free, the Law of Nature may therefore be chang'd by GOD, or 't the contrary be commanded, as is the Case and the Condition of positive Laws. Others affirm this natural Law to be founded after such a Manner, in the essential Holiness and Justice of GOD, as to represent and express a kind of Image or Copy of those Attributes. And hence likewise, they say, proceeds the Immutability of the Law of Nature: Inasmuch as the divine Justice and Holiness are utterly incapable of Change or Alteration. Concerning the former of these Opinions, we have this to remark, that it was indeed at first entirely free to the divine Pleasure to produce or not to produce an Animal to whom the present Law of Nature should agree. But that since GOD Almighty hath been pleas'd to create Man, a Being not possibly to be preserv'd without the Observation of this Law, we have no manner of Reason or Colour to believe that he will either reverse or alter the Law of Nature, so long as he brings no Change on human Nature itself; and so long as the Actions enjoin'd by this Law do by a natural Consequence promote Society, in which is contain'd all the temporal Happiness of Mankind; while the contrary Actions do by as strong a Necessity destroy that Society: That is, so long as Beneficence, Kindness, Fidelity, Gratitude, and the like Practices, shall have a Power of engaging and of winning on Mens Minds; and Injuriousness, Treachery, and Ingratitude, a Power of raising and provoking them. And therefore supposing human Nature and human Affairs to be fixt and constant, the Law of Nature, tho' it owed its original Institution to the free Pleasure of GOD, remains firm and immoveable; unlike to those divine positive Laws which depend in such a Manner on the divine Will, as not to seem so necessarily requisite to the good and safe Condition of Mankind in general. Besides, tho' this Opinion be so far right, as it makes GOD the Author of natural Law, a Truth which no Man in his Wits can doubt of³; yet it still remains an Uncertainty, by what Means this divine Will is to be known, and what Tokens there are to evince, that GOD intended to comprehend such or such a Thing under the Law of Nature. And the same Inconvenience attends likewise on the latter Opinion. For though no one can be guilty of such horrid Impiety, as to assert that the Law of Nature contains any Thing in it repugnant to the divine Holiness or Justice⁴; yet it would be very difficult to prove, that the same Law is so exact a Copy or Resemblance of those Attributes, that in what Manner soever GOD Almighty is pleas'd to deal with his Creatures, particularly with Men, in the same Manner the Law of their Nature commands Men to deal with one another. Nor doth it ap-

³ Our Author proves this in his Apology, §. 19. thus, If we demand of them who define the natural Law so, What Things are the Matter of this Law? They'll answer, Such as are honest or dishonest in their Nature. If we again ask them, What are those? They can answer nothing else, than that they are the Matter of the natural Law. This makes well for the Schoolmen. But can't we speak something here in the Behalf of Grotius? I own, that the Notions of this great Man are not sufficiently cleared and freed from vulgar Prejudices: But I am very much mistaken, if he has not found out the Truth, and can't explain his Notion so, that when the Thing is searched to the Bottom, the Difference between him and our Author will prove a verbal Dispute only. The Right of Nature (says Grotius, Lib. i. Chap. i. §. 10. Num. 1.) consists in certain Principles of right Reason, by which we know that an Action is honest or dishonest morally, according to the necessary Agreement or Disagreement: it hath with a reasonable or sociable Nature. So that it is no Circle; for if you ask Grotius whence comes that necessary Honesty or Baseness of the Actions commanded or forbidden by the Law of Nature, he'll answer you, From the necessary Agreement or Disagreement with a reasonable and social Nature. Very well. He seems to acknowledge also, with our Author, that this Necessity is not absolute and independent upon the Will of GOD. This appears not only by the following Words, which finish Grotius's Definition, And by Consequence GOD, who is the Author of Nature, orders or forbids such an Action, but by what he says in his Preface, where he expresses himself more fully, The Law of Nature, as well that which consists in our uniting in Society, as that which is so called in a more extensive Sense. This Right, I say, altho' it flows from the internal Principles of Man (i. e. from the Constitution of the human Nature) may nevertheless, and that with Reason, be attributed to GOD, because he has implanted such Principles in us. I will now leave it to any Man, whether the Commentators upon Grotius have not mistaken his Sense, and if when he speaks of honest or dishonest Actions, he does not mean them in the same Sense that our Author allows them, as I have shewed above, Lib. i. Chap. i. §. 4. Note 4. and Ch. ii §. 6. Note 1.

§. v. ¹ Mr. Buddens esteems them Scepticks who favour this Opinion: For, says he, they may easily imagine that it is uncertain, whether GOD has not changed this or that Law, in this or that Case, and whether he does not command what we suppose forbidden, and on the contrary forbid what we believe commanded, since he may do it at all Times without any Hindrance, according to them. De Sceptic. Moral. §. 32. p. 257.

² The Immutability of the natural Law is a Principle acknowledged by all such as reason well. Hear what the Roman Lawyers say about this Matter. Sed naturalia quidem jura, quae apud omnes gentes peraeque observantur, divina quadam providentia constituta, semper firma atque immutabilia permanent; ea vero, quae ipsa sibi quisque civitas constituit, saepe mutari solent, vel tacito consensu populi, vel alia postea lege lata, Institut. Lib. i. Tit. ii. §. 11. See also the Digest. Lib. i. Tit. i. De justitia & jure. Leg. xi. and Lib. iv. Tit. v. De capite minutis, Leg. viii. as also a Passage in Cicero, which is quoted a little lower, §. 20. Note 4. and Mr. Noodt's Probab. Juris, Lib. ii. Chap. xi.

³ Upon this it is that they ought to reflect, who lay down for the fundamental Principle of the Law of Nature, the Will of GOD, affirming, that there is no great Difference between that and our Author's Hypothesis, whereas what we seek chiefly to know is, what is the general Rule, by which we may discover what is the Will of GOD, that we may draw from that Rule, by direct Consequences, all the Maxims of the natural Law.

⁴ In which Sense we allow the Saying of Euripides (Hecub. v. 800.) GOD himself acts by a Law, i. e. by the Rules of Right and Wrong. See Lib. vii. Chap. vi. §. 3. Note 1.

pear how a Right which is to obtain amongst Persons by Nature equal, can be copied from that transcendent Right, which the Creator useth towards his own Works; that is, how a Law imposing a mutual Obligation on Men, can represent any Image of Omnipotency, which no Laws, no Obligations can restrain's. For that Argument drawn from Scripture, about Man's being created in the Image of GOD, is of no Force as to the present Case. For even those who confess that Image to be lost, do yet acknowledge the Sense of natural Law to have still remain'd in Man. Amongst our selves we usually call him a holy or righteous Person, who abstains from grosser Sins, and regularly observes his Duty: But now, who ever fram'd a Notion of the divine Holiness by so unworthy a Model? He amongst Men is accounted just, who makes it his constant Purpose and Resolution to hurt no body, and to pay every one their Due: But in GOD it is Justice to destroy his Creatures, even in the most grievous and painful Manner. Neither can he so owe a Person any thing, as to be accus'd with doing an Injury upon withholding it. If he hath been pleas'd to promise any thing to Mortals, he indeed performs it: Not because by virtue of such a Promise they obtain a Right against GOD; but because it would be some Kind of Deregation from his Greatness and Goodness, to command Men to expect any Favour from him, and afterwards to frustrate their Expectations. For he who breaks his Promise, either wants Power to perform it, or else through Inconstancy or Dishonesty falls from the Engagement he had once well made, or else at the same Time of making his Promise, he was ignorant how the State and Condition of Things would be, when it was afterwards to be fulfill'd; all which Cases imply some kind of Failing and Imperfection. Hence GOD cannot but observe his Promises, and Men ought not but to observe theirs: Hence human Promises turn into Debts, but divine Promises are made good out of pure Favour. What Rules the vindicative Justice of GOD proceeds by, is far above our Apprehension to discover. But thus much is certain, that they are not altogether conformable to the Methods of human Judicature. Arist. Ethic. Nicom. Lib. x. Ch. viii.
6 What Kind of Actions ought we to attribute to the Gods? Shall we say they are just? But alas! it would seem most ridiculous to fancy that they are concern'd in driving Bargains, in restoring Loans, and the like Performances, which we reckon honest amongst Men. Shall we call them valiant and brave, able to endure Hardships, and encounter Dangers? Shall we pronounce them liberal? Who then shall be the Object, or what the Matter of their Bounty? Certainly we must not oppress them with the Load of Money or Treasures. In like Manner it would be an impertinent and troublesome Commendation, to say they are temperate; inasmuch as they have no inordinate Affections to govern and restrain. And so thus, if we run through the whole Train of human Actions, we shall find them all so mean and contemptible, as to be infinitely unworthy of the Heavenly Natures. Catull. ad Manl. 68. ver. 141.

Atqui nec deus homines componitur æquum est.

No just Comparison 'twixt Gods and Men.

From this Consideration, that we ought not to admit any Law common both to GOD and Man, we may draw an easy Answer to those Instances, which some give of GOD's dispensing with the Law of Nature, as when he commanded Abraham to kill his Son, and the Israelites to rob the Egyptians, of their Vessels of Silver and Vessels of Gold. For GOD the supreme Lord and Disposer of all Things, hath a much higher and fuller Right over his Creatures, than one Man can have over another, who is by Nature his Equal. Therefore we cannot properly call it a Dispensation of the Law of Nature, when a Man by express Command from Heaven, executes GOD's Right upon other Men, merely as His Instrument. Comp. Grot. Lib. i. Ch. i. §. x. Note 6. None, I believe, can be so simple as to imagine, that when the Object is chang'd, or the Circumstances varied, the Law it self suffers Alteration. When the Creditor hath forgiven a Debt, it loseth that Name, and therefore is no longer comprehended under the Law, which enjoins Payment. And as for the other Instance, when the Goods of a Person who gave a Thing in Trust, are adjudg'd to the publick Treasury, neither the Law is chang'd, nor its Object. For thus runs the Law, He who receives a Thing in Trust, ought to restore it either to him who committed the Thing (being his own) to his Charge, or to him on whom the Right descends. Now this Law cannot affect the Thief, because the Thing was not his own; nor the former Owner, who is suppos'd to be at present a banish'd Man, because the Propriety of all that was his passeth to the Publick.

VI. But neither do the Arguments which the

¶ We must add here two important Observations. I. That there are several Acts of human Justice which can't be attributed to GOD, because of the Excellency of his Nature. Such are a great Number of the Acts of universal Justice, and those of particular Justice, which regulate Contracts, invented to carry on the Business and Necessities of Life. See Psal. l. ver. 10, 11, 12. Rom. xi. 25. For who, for Example, dare reason thus? Pay your Debts, because GOD pays his. Be grateful, because GOD is kind to them that serve him. Obey your Governours, because GOD is subject to his Superiors. Honour your Parents, because GOD honours his. Are not these Arguings manifestly absurd? II. Moreover, as we know GOD by his Works, and by ascending from the Effect to the Cause, we can't know the Perfections of GOD, but by taking from the Perfections of the Creatures, and especially from Man's, whatever is imperfect, and then attributing them to GOD, when they are so purified. Thus having observed that these are the Perfections of Man, to keep one's Promise, speak the Truth, do no Man any Injury, distribute Justice impartially, we thence conclude, that they ought to be in him, who is the first Cause and absolute Lord of the World, but in a most excellent Manner, and worthy of the supreme and sovereign Being. It would be ridiculous then to establish divine Justice upon the Foundation of human, because this last is better known than the first, as Dr. Cumberland, De Leg. Nat. Prolegom. §. 6. and Ch. v. §. 13. acknowledges. I have taken this out of the Specimen Controvers. Pufendorf. notarium, &c. Ch. iv. §. 4. and out of his 1st pist. ad amicos p. 262.

6 Aristotle's Greek is this, Πράξις ἢ ποίως ἀποκρίναι χρῆσι αὐτοῖς; ἢ ποῶρα τὰς δικαίας; ἢ γελῶσι φιλῶνται συναγαγόντες, ἢ παρακαταθήκας ἀποδοῦντες; ἢ ὅσα ἄλλα τοιαῦτα; ἀλλὰ τὰς ἀνδρείας; ἐπιφθόντας τὰ φάρμακα ἢ χυδαινοτάτας, ἢ καλεῖται ἢ τὰς ἐλευθερίας; τῆν ἢ δόσεις; ἀποποιεῖσθαι, εἰ ἢ ἔσαι αὐτοῖς νόμισμα, ἢ τι τοῖστων εἰ ἢ σώφρονες, τι ἀν' ἑαυτῶν; ἢ φρονητικὸς ὁ ἐπιπαινετός, ὅτι ἀκ' ἔχουσι φαντασίαν ἐπιθυμίας; διεξιῶσι ἢ πάντα φανείναι ἢ τὰ ἀπὸ τῶν πρῶτων, μικρὰ ἢ ἐκείνων ἔσονται.

7 See Lib. iv. Ch. xiii. §. 5. following.

Author^a of the Treatise De Principiis Justitiae & Decorum produces, seem forcible enough to establish a Twofold natural Law, *divine, and human, which, supposing the present Order of the World to continue, do fall in with one another*¹. For inasmuch as all Law implies Obligation, and that again presupposes some external and superior Principle, it doth not appear how we can, without Absurdity, apply any such Matter to GOD. And it is alike Impropriety to say, that² GOD is oblig'd by himself, or by his own Essence. Nor will that Text which he alledges, of Rom. i. 32. ever prove³ such a Law to be in GOD. For since the Gentiles, from the Dictates of their Reason, were able to gather the Knowledge of the Law of Nature, the next thing which they must infer, was, that GOD the Legislator would not suffer the Law to be violated without punishing the Offender. Therefore upon the Violation of that Law, there arises a Right to GOD (if it be decent so to speak) of exacting Punishment; or upon Commission of the Sin, GOD most justly executes what he before threatened. But who can conclude from hence, that GOD is obnoxious to Law? What follows is an ambiguous Expression, That the supreme Right of GOD over his Creatures is discover'd by natural Reason from those Principles, which make the Foundations of natural Right and Equity amongst Men. For if this only be the Sense of it, that in many Cases GOD doth proceed in the same Manner in his Dealings with Men, as he would have them follow in their Transactions with each other; it will easily pass without Contradiction^b. For thus GOD by the natural Law, hath enjoin'd Men to keep their Promises, as he will firmly keep those which he makes himself^c. So he forbids human Judges to condemn the Innocent, declaring that he himself will acquit them in his own Judgments^d. But if it be meant to assert that GOD hath no more Right over his Creatures, than Men are allow'd to obtain over each other; there will be need of more convincing Arguments to make us believe, that the supreme Lord and Master hath no fuller Right over his Servants, than the Servants have over their Fellow-Servants, with whom Nature has set them on a Level: Or, to use Grotius's^e Terms, that the Jus Recltorium, and the Jus Aequatorium, the Right of Governors, and the Right of Equals are exactly the same Thing.

Neither must we let that Assertion pass by uncentur'd, which the Author of the same Treatise lays down, pag. 52. That GOD ought necessarily to esteem the Laws of Nature as just, the Order of the Universe being establish'd in the Manner we now behold: And that he cannot but own every Deviation from them to be indecent and unjust. For without doubt those imperious Terms, GOD ought necessarily, are very unsuitable to the Majesty of an Omnipotent Legislator. Nor is here any Necessity to be discover'd in the Case^f, except such as owes its Original merely to the divine Pleasure. The Reason which he subjoins is not strong enough to maintain his first Position; All Things, says he, which our Thoughts can imagine, have always some Kind of $\xi\lambda\epsilon\sigma$ or Relation, arising from the intrinsic Nature of the Thing, and which cannot be separated from the Thing, without offering Violence to Reason. For this Nature, and this adhering Relation, Things have not from themselves, but from the free Will of GOD; and the Decrees of his Will cannot properly be called his own Law. Thus, the Reason why amongst Men one Benefit obliges to the Return of another; why Violation of Covenants, Inhumanity, Pride, Slander, can never be allowable, is, because GOD hath given Man a sociable Nature, and as long as that Nature remains unalter'd, those Things which are agreeable to it must be good and honest, and those which are repugnant to it uncomely and unlawful. But who can hence infer, either that there is but one Law common to GOD and Men, or that Things are indued with any $\xi\lambda\epsilon\sigma$ or Habitude, independent from the divine Disposal?

VII. Those who found the Law of Nature on the Consent of Mankind in general, or on the Agreement either of all, or however of the most, and the most polish'd Nations, seem chiefly to follow¹ Aristotle, as the Author and Patron of their Opinion. He, in his Ethicks to Nicomachus, B. v.

§. VI. * Our Author here breaks off his Discourse in a strange Manner, to confute a Writer which he had read over in too great Halle. Veltbuisen does no where make two distinct Kinds of natural Right, one to which GOD is subject, and the other to govern Man; but that natural Right which he calls divine, as well as that which he calls human, is a Law only for Man. He has no Word that so much as intimates, that he would establish a Right common to GOD and Men. He only endeavours to prove that the Law of Nature, which is taught us by Reason, is really a divine Law, and that GOD can't dispense with it, but he must contradict himself, so far as the Constitution of Things is such as he himself appointed at the Creation of the World. This appears both by the Coherence of his Discourse, and by what he had before said, p. 52, 53. I had not minded to justify this Author in this second Edition of my Work, if I had not forgot it in my first. I know not how to read what follows in the Original.

² I know not what our Author means here, for these Words are not the Person's whom he confutes.

³ Nor is this Mr. Veltbuisen's Conclusion which he aims at. His Design was only to prove, that the Gentiles might know very well, that by breaking the Laws of Nature they disobeyed God, and so deserved his Corrections, so that he might justly punish with Death any that had sinned against the Law of Nature. From whence it follows, that in sinning against the Law of Nature they sinned against the Law of GOD.

⁵ I can't see that Mr. Veltbuisen intends any other Necessity here, than what is founded upon the Perfections of the Deity, who permits us not to will the End, without willing at the same Time the Means necessary to arrive at it, for this is the Principle he uses, as well as our Author, to discover the Original of the Laws of Nature. See §. 12. following.

§. VII. * The Greek of Aristotle is, Φυσικὸν ἢ δίκαιον τὸ πανταχῶς τὴν ἀσιν ἴσον ἐπιφέρει, καὶ ἢ τῷ δικαίῳ, ἢ μὴ. And again, Ἔστι γὰρ ὁ ἀνεπινοῦνται τὴ πάντες, φυσικὸν καὶ δίκαιον, καὶ ἀδικον. καὶ μηδένια κοινά πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἢ μηδὲ συνθέτα. See Cicero's De Officiis, Lib. i. Ch. xiii, xiv. The Consent of all Men in any Point, is so to be esteem'd a Law of Nature. And again, The Consent of all Men is the Voice of Nature.

Ch. x. calls that natural Justice, which bears the same Force in all Places, and doth not depend on particular Sentiments. And in his Rhetorick, Book v. Ch. xiii. he tells us, there is a general Right and Wrong, or Just or Unjust, believ'd and profess'd by all Men; although no Society should be instituted amongst them, and no Covenants be transacted.

Now besides, that this Way of proving the Law of Nature is only à posteriori 2, and therefore cannot shew the Cause and Reason of the Thing; so is it very slippery and uncertain, and involv'd in an endless Maze of Doubts and Perplexities. To appeal to the Consent of all Mankind, Mr. Hobbes 3 observes to be inconvenient upon this Account, because at this Rate it would be impossible for a Man, actually using his Reason, to sin against the Law of Nature. Inasmuch as his Consent being wanting, who is a Part of Mankind, the common Agreement must needs be main'd and imperfect. Then again, because it would not be fair to gather the Laws of Nature from the Consent of those who break them more frequently than they observe them 4. For, as Isocrates b speaks, It is a natural Misfortune which we all lie under, that we should more frequently transgress than perform our Duty.

Nor will it be a more happy Way of arguing to appeal to the Consent of all Nations. For, were it possible for us to understand all the Languages of ancient and modern People, yet we should be still far enough to seek in the Knowledge of their Manners and of their Institutions. We cannot hit off this Difficulty by saying, that the Consent of the most civiliz'd Nations is sufficient, and that the Opinions of Barbarians are not to come into the Account. For, what Nation, any Ways able to manage and to preserve itself, will own the Title of Barbarous? Or what Nation can take so much on itself, as to desire its own Manners and Proceedings should be the Standard in trying all others, and that whatever People did not exactly conform to its Model, should be immediately 4 pronounc'd barbarous and savage? Heretofore the Pride of the Grecians censur'd all as Barbarians, who liv'd without the Bounds of their Country. The Romans afterwards succeeded them, as well in their Arrogance as in their Empire. And at the present, some few Nations here in Europe have the Vanity to prefer themselves to the rest of the World, in the Opinion of their own Civility and Improvements of Living. But there are not wanting other People, who imagine themselves to have the Advantage of them in all Respects: And 'tis an old Proverb amongst the Chinese, that themselves only have two Eyes, only the Europeans one, and all the rest of the World are stark blind.

Some too there are, who fall foul upon our Learning, in prosecuting which we spend so much good Time; they will have it to be no better than a Prop, or a Crutch to support and assist our Dulness: Inasmuch as the good Disposition of many Men carry them on to a natural Innocence and Probity, without Improvement or Ornament of Letters; and because it requires no great Clerkship to be an honest Man. It is likewise too evident that high Attainments of Knowledge are not always bless'd with the Attendance of good Manners or of good Temper. Many Nations we see pride themselves in the tedious Pageantry of vain unnecessary Things; despising those who lead a Life of less Gallantry and more Simplicity. Yet were we to seek for Innocency and Integrity, we might, perhaps, find them much sooner amongst these plain and unartificial Mortals, than amongst their stately and formal Neighbours. 'Tis a shrewd Remark of Justin, Lib. ii. Ch. ii. speaking of the Scythians; It seems wonderful, says he, that meer Nature should give them, what the Grecians, with the long Institutions of their wise Men, and the Precepts of their Philosophers could never attain; and that the politest Manners should be distanc'd and out-done in the Comparison with Barbarity. Of so much greater Benefit on one side was the Ignorance of Vice, than on the other the Knowledge of Virtue. Vid. Valer. Max. Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 2. Extern. & Sect. Empiric. Hypotyp. Lib. ii. Ch. v. where we meet with several Things to the same Purpose.

Besides, that such a Consent can be of no Force, appears from this farther Reflection; that the Number of Fools far exceeds that of wise Men; and that few Persons have form'd their Opinions upon a full Search into the Foundations of Things; but most Men follow on in the Track of others, and yield an implicit Assent to their Notions, without applying their own Thoughts or Judgments to the Points in Debate. Farther, altho' we have a tolerable Assurance of the Consent of most People, at least as to the general Precepts of natural Law; and altho' we may presume on the Consent of the rest, from the Principles of those who are better known to us, yet it is more safe to conclude hence, what those Nations esteem just and equal amongst themselves, than what they think fair Ways of dealing with Strangers; all whom 6 are by some People accounted Enemies, and treated accordingly 4.

VIII. Tho' the common Use and Custom of many Nations may seem to be alledg'd with more Force for proving a Thing to be lawful or allowable, than for the proving it to be actually commanded by the Law of Nature; yet that we cannot with any Security make so much as the former

2 That is, not from the Nature of the Thing it self, but from some external Principle, as from the Consent of People.

3 The Greek is, ἅλλα ἢ πάντες πλείω πιφικωμὶ, ἔξαρμαστάνην. ἢ κατορθόν.

4 Charron reckons this among the foolish Opinions that are in the World, to condemn and reject all Things, Manners, Opinions, Laws, Customs, and Observances, as barbarous and evil without Knowledge of them, merely because they are not used by us, and are not thought proper for our Practice. Of Wisdom, Lib. i. Ch. vi. §. 9. Numb. 2. See also Lib. ii. Ch. viii. and Ch. ii. §. 5. Let the Reader further consult Mr. Bruyere's Characters in his Chapt. of Judgments, p. 420. and he'll find something very ingenious and smart upon this Subject there.

5 Justin's Words are, Prorsus ut admirabile videatur, hoc illis naturam dare, quod Greci longa sapientium doctrina præceptisque philosophorum consequi nequeunt, cultosque mores inculta barbarie collatione superari. Tanto plus in illis proficit vitiorum ignorantia, quam in his cognitio virtutis.

6 This appears especially by the Example of Two of the most famous People in the World, I mean the Greeks and Romans. See Parrhasiana, Tom. i. Page 202, 203. and Mr. Le Clerc's Ars Critica, Tom. i. Part II, §. 1. Ch. vi. §. 2, &c.

Of these Conclusions seems probable from the great Variety and Contradiction discoverable in the Manners and in the Institutions of the most famous People upon Record. So that we may well apply to the present Case, that Saying of ^a Socrates, ἐκ εἰς σπεδαίεις γε διδασκάλους καταρέυεις, εἰς τὰς πολλὰς ἀναρέρων. You consult no very expert Masters, when you refer yourself to the Multitude for Instruction. To the same Purpose Plutarch ^b observes, that the Laws of Men are vastly different, some making one Thing to be good, and some another: And Tacitus's Description of an Army compos'd of various Nations, may serve to represent the same wide Disagreement. Their Languages, their Manners, their Desires, says he, are different; and while some will have one Thing to be lawful, and some the contrary, amongst them all, nothing can escape as unlawful ^c. To give some Account of this Variety by way of Specimen. Aristotle ^d reports of some savage Nations on the Confines of Pontus, that it is customary with them, to borrow one another's Children, to furnish out their Feasts. And these People he presently after calls Irrational, Wild, and living only by Sense. Eusebius, in his Book de Præparatione Evangelicâ ^e, reckoning up the foul Customs and Manners which had been corrected by the Doctrine of the Gospel, amongst others, mentions the Pollution with Mothers and Sisters in Persia (which Diogenes Laertius ^f too takes Notice of from the Authority of Socion) the eating of human Flesh, and the murdering of Children under a religious Pretence amongst the Scythians: He adds that the Massagetæ, and the Derbices us'd to kill their Relations when they grew very old, and make an Entertainment with their Bodies; that the Tibareni in Cappadocia, threw their ancient Persons down Precipices; that the Hyrcanians cast out their Dead to the Birds, and the Caspians to the Dogs, to be devour'd. Hither also may we refer those foul Watchings and other Ceremonies, design'd for the Honour of their Gods, but mixt with all the licentious Practices of Adultery and Lewdness; as also the human Sacrifices barbarously murder'd on their Altars. The same excellent Author ^g gives the following Relations out of Bardesanes the Syrian. 'Tis a Law amongst the Getulians, that the Women offer their Bodies to whomsoever they please, especially to Strangers; and that their Husbands shall not accuse them on these Accounts, or pretend to censure them as guilty of Adultery. The same Liberty obtain'd amongst the Bactrians: Whereas, on the contrary, amongst the Arabians, all Adulteresses were punish'd with Death, and if suspected only, underwent some lesser Penalty. In Parthia and Armenia it is provided by Law, that no Man shall be accus'd for killing his Wife, his Son, his Daughter, or his unmarried Brother or Sister. Amongst the Atrians petty Robberies are punish'd with Stoning; amongst the Bactrians only with the Ignominy of being publicly defiled with Spittle. The wise Men of Greece are not ashamed to court the Love of little beautiful Boys. In Britain many Men possess one Wife. In Parthia many Women belong to one Hus- band. ^a Sextus Empiricus ^b the Sceptick, to shew that there is no Certainty in the Notions of Honesty or Dishonesty, hath raked up a great Heap of these contradictory Customs and Institutions. But he hath stumbled very fatally in the very Entrance of his Design, while he talks in this Manner: Amongst us Pollution with the male Sex is unlawful and abominable; yet amongst the Germans, as is reported, it is no Disgrace, but rather a fashionable Practice. For the Grecians were so scandalously addicted to this unnatural Vice, that Plato, in his 8th Book of Laws, thought there was need of using some Reasons to prove the Possibility of restraining it by publick Edicts. And that the Bæotians, Sextus Empiricus's Countrymen, ought not to stand excepted from this Imputation, may be gather'd from a Passage in Cornelius Nepos's Life of Epaminondas; though perhaps the vile Custom had ceas'd in those Parts before this sceptical Philosopher wrote. That it once prevail'd there, he himself afterwards relates. But what he reports of the Germans, is so groundless a Fallity, that 'tis wonderful how it should enter into the Head of any one, who is the least acquainted with the Manners and the Story of that Nation. He adds, that the Cynick Philosophers, and Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus, esteem'd the same foul Enormity an indifferent Thing. That some of the Indians thought it no Indecency to be familiar with their Wives in Publick. That in several Parts of Egypt for Women to prostitute themselves was look'd on as a creditable Profession; and that 'twas usual with the younger Sort first to get themselves a Fortune by the jilting Trade, and then to marry. That the Stoicks held it to be no irrational Practice either to frequent the Stews, or to maintain one's self by Pimping. That the Persians contracted Marriages with their Mothers, and the Egyptians with their Sisters: The former of which Zeno maintain'd to be agreeable to Reason ⁱ. That Chrysippus permitted a Father to have Children by his Daughter, a Mother by her Son, and a Brother by his Sister. That Plato allow'd the Community of Wives. That 'twas a receiv'd Custom with many of the Barbarians to feed on Man's Flesh; which the Stoicks themselves approv'd of. That, amongst many others, Adulteries pass'd for indifferent Matters. That the Scythians offer'd Strangers to Diana; and kill'd their own Parents, when they arriv'd beyond the Age of Sixty Years. That by a Law of Solon's at Athens, the Parents were empower'd to put their Children to Death. That the Roman Gladiators, after the Performance of their Murther, receiv'd Honours and Rewards. That Thieves amongst the Spartans were punish'd, not for stealing, but for letting themselves be catch'd. That the Amazons, if they happen'd to bear male Children, willfully made them Cripples, to prevent their Performance of any manly Actions or Exploits. He enlarges farther about the different Opinions in reference to the divine Nature, about the Diversity of religious Rites and Ceremonies, about the various Manners of Burial, and the absurd Procurements of Death ^a. Tully ^b reports that the Egyptians, having their Minds overcome by wicked Errors, will sooner let themselves be cut in Pieces, than they will hurt a Serpent, an Asp, a Cat, a Dog, or a Crocodile: And if they happen unawares to do any of these Creatures a Mischief, they voluntarily undergo any Punishment. Busbequius ^c informs us, that Theft is an honourable Practice amongst the Colchians: And Fran. Alvarez that in Abyssynia the Custom is, for the Thieves to present a Part of their Booty to the King, keeping the rest without Scandal for their own Use. Philo Judæus de Temulentia, p. 208, 209. Ed. Genev. ³ And these Things may give us Warning not easily to credit those Uncertainties, which being diffus'd thro' almost the whole World, have thrown both Greeks and Barbarians into common Errors of Judgment. I mean those early Institutions, those national Customs, those antient Laws, through the whole Sum of which we cannot find one in which all agree; but in every Country, People, City, Street, and even in every House, the Men at least, differ from the Women, and the Children from both. And indeed I do not wonder, that a confus'd and miscellaneous Rabble, meer Slaves to Laws and Customs, however introduc'd, inur'd from the Cradle to yield Obedience to them no less than to Masters or Tyrants, and having their Mind clogg'd and broken by Severity and Blows, and not able to aspire to any great and manly Attainments, should believe the Traditions they receiv'd from their Ancestors, and letting their Reason lie without Use or Exercise, affirm Things, or deny them unexamind and unobserv'd. But I cannot forbear wondering at the Philosophers; who, whilst the greatest Part of them pretend to hunt for the real Truth and Certainty of Things, dividing themselves into so many Troops and Orders, pronounce of almost every Matter, great or small, ever with Difference, and often with Contradiction. IX. But that Notion of extracting the Law of Nature from the Manners and Customs of the World, is accompanied with this farther Inconvenience; that 'tis almost impossible to find any Nation, which is govern'd purely by natural Law; but every Country hath its own particular Laws superadded, either in Writing or otherwise; to be made use of when the People have any Bargains or Transactions with their Fellow-subjects. And many times Affairs in Debate between whole Nations, are decided either by civil Law common to both, or by the Law of Nature, as it is not naked, but cloath'd, as it were, with many positive Additions. So that it is no easy Matter to distinguish what those Nations admit for natural Law; and what for positive and civil. We may add to this Consideration, that meer Use and Custom when it hath born a long, and an unquestion'd Sway, frequently puts on the Face and Semblance of natural Reason. 'Tis manifest, says Agathias ^d, that whatever Law or Institution hath obtain'd thro' a long Course of Time amongst many People, they certainly cry it up for most excellent and most equitable; and if any Thing be attempted contrary to it, this they reject as ridiculous, and unworthy of all Credit and Allowance. We have a famous Example to this Purpose in Herodotus. Darius, for Experiment's sake, put the Question to the Greeks, who were under his Command, what Sum of Money he should give them to feed on the Bodies of their deceas'd Parents, after the Manner of the Indians. Upon their Refusal to comply on any Considerations, he ask'd some of the Indians, what they'd take to burn their dead Parents after the Grecians Fashion, and not to eat them: But they setting up a general Outcry, desired the King to have better Thoughts of them. Besides, to have been inur'd in any Opinion from one's Infancy, is so forcible a Prepossession, that altho' the Opinion be false, yet it scarce enters into any Person's Head to question it; at least it passes with an uncontrol'd Currency, amongst Men of vulgar Parts and Capacities. ¹ Aristot. Problem. §. 18. Qu. 6. Those Things which Men have at first made Choice of, and to which they have been accustomed, in these they are not able to judge the better. For their Mind is already corrupted by evil Prejudices and Prepossession. Cicero. Tusc. Quæst. Lib. iv. Ch. iii. Some Persons are tied and restrain'd in their Notions, before they are capable of judging what is best, and afterwards, in the weakest Part of their Age, either following the Opinions of some Friends, or taken with the Speech of the first Master they have heard, they give their Verdicts on Points which they do not in the least understand, and being carried with the Violence, as it were, of a Tempest, to some particular Doctrine or Sect, they cleave to it as if they were bugging a Rock to save their Lives. And a little after, I know not how it comes to pass, that most Men had rather continue in a Mistake, and quarrel and fight in Defence of an Opinion which they have once lov'd and embrac'd, than to examine without Obstinacy or Partiality, what is deliver'd with most Agreement on all Sides. Add. Mich. Montaigne's Eff. Lib. i. Ch. xxii. Philo Jud. de Abrahamo p. 294. B. Ed. Genev. Inveterate Custom usually bears as much Force as Nature itself. To the greatest Part of Mankind we may apply Sextus Empiricus's ² Saying, they follow the usual Ways of Life without Thought or Reflection ³. And Tully's Words are, Nam cateri primum ante tenentur adstricti, quam, quid esset optimum, judicare poterunt: deinde infirmissimo tempore atatis aut obsecuti amico cuidam, aut una alicujus, quem primum audierunt, oratione capti, de rebus incognitis judicant, & ad quancunq; sunt disciplinam quasi tempestate delati, ad eam, quasi ad saxum, adhaerescunt.

² S. Empiricus's Words are, Ἐπειὴ καὶ ἀδοξάζουσι τῇ βιωτικῇ τῆρσι:

³ Euripides's Observation is no less true, that the Traditions which we receiv'd from our Parents, and which are grown up with us, no Reason can confute, no Strength of Wisdom can over-rule^a. To the same Head we may refer that Text of the ⁴ Apostle, 1 Cor. xi. 14. and that Remark in Plato, in his seventh Book of Laws, that our using one of our Hands more readily than the other, proceeds purely from Custom: Inasmuch as Nature equally favours both. Amongst many People Honour and Respect are measured by the Length of Beards^b; whereas, on the contrary, the greatest Part of the Americans think it a brutish Indecency to appear with any Beard at all^c.

But all this while, we do not ascribe so much Force to Custom, that it should be able in such a Manner to deprave and seduce the Judgment of Reason, as to render the Truths concerning natural Laws impossible to be apprehended^d.

X. This strange Diversity of Laws and Manners, by which most Nations in the World contradict each other, hath, without doubt, been the Occasion why some Men have asserted that there's no such Thing as natural Law, but that all Law first arose from the Convenience and the Profit of particular States, and is incapable of any other Measure. Thus Horace, Serm. Lib. i. Sat. iii. v. 98, 111, &c.

Atq; ipsa utilitas, justii prope mater & aequi.

*Jura inventa metu injusti fateare necesse est,
Tempora si fastosq; velis evolvere mundi.
Nec natura potest justo secernere iniquum,
Dividit ut bona diversis, fugienda petendis.*

Of Mother Profit, Just and Right were born.

Turn o'er the musty Annals of Mankind,
And you'll confess that Laws were first enjoin'd Thro' Fear of Wrong: Meer Nature never knew,
Or Good, or Bad to shun, or to pursue.

Ovid Ep. Heroid. iv. v. 131, &c. makes his Phœdra declare her Mind to the same Purpose.

*Ista vetus pietas ævo moritura futuro,

That Thread-bare Virtue only held its Sway,

³ Tully's Words are, in quo [verbo] lapsa consuetudo deflexu de via, sensimq; eo deducta est, ut honestatem ab utilitate secernens, & conjunxerit honestum esse aliquid, quod utile non esset, & utile quod non honestum, qua nulla pernicies major hominum vite potuit adferri.

Again, itaq; accepimus, Socratem execrari solitum eos, qui primum hæc natura coherentia opinione distraxissent.

Photinus's wicked Counsel in Lucan, B. viii. v. 488. Et seqq. proceeds on the same Principles,

————— Sidera terrâ

Sceptrorum vis tota perit, si pendere justa
Incipit; exertitq; arces respectus honesti.
Libertas scelerum est, que regna invisa tuctur.

As Fire from Water, as each heavenly Light
From Earth, so Profit stands remov'd from Right:
If nice Regards to Faith and Truth are shewn,
Your Scepter drops, and you unhinge your Throne.
The Way to fix all hated Reigns has been
To grant a general Liberty of Sin.

Aristippus too, and Pyrrho in Diogenes Laertius^c, deliver themselves very grossly concerning the Origin of Just and Unjust. But of all the Antients none disputed this Point so largely as Carneades is said to have done. His Arguments, as Lactantius^e hath contracted them, are² to this Effect: That Men first instituted Laws to secure and to promote their own Advantage; whence they came to be so various according to their different Manners, and different Times; but that there was no such Thing as natural Law in the World. That Mankind and all other animate Beings, are by the Guidance of Nature, carried on to the Pursuit of their own Profit; and that consequently there can be no Justice; or, if there be, that it must be the highest Folly, inasmuch as it would make a Man injure himself in consulting the Conveniences of others. That all Nations famous for Empire and Command, and the Romans themselves, who then reign'd Masters of the World, if they would be just, that is, if they would restore every one his own, must return to their antient Cottages, and to their primitive Poverty³. In clearing up these Objections, it will not be amiss to begin with Tully's Remark, in his second Book of Offices, Ch. iii. ³ Profitable, says he, is a Word, which by the Corruption of Time and Custom is perverted insensibly to the Signification of somewhat that may be separated from Honesty; so as to make something honest which is not profitable, and something profitable without being honest: An Error of the most pernicious Consequence to the Life of Man. On which Account, in his third Book of the same excellent Work, Ch. iii. he tells us, that Socrates us'd to curse the Authors who first divided these Names in Notion and Opinion, which were in Nature so inseparably united. For those Masters of false Politicks cheated the heedless Vulgar with the ambiguous Term of Profit; which is of two Kinds, as it is rated by two different Principles. One sort of Profit is that which appears such to the deprav'd Judgment of ill compos'd Affections; these being mov'd chiefly by present and transitory Advantages, and very little solicitous about future Concerns. ⁴ The other and the true Profit is adjudg'd so by sound Reason, which doth not only consider Things at hand, but weighs and examines the Effects and Consequences which they are likely to produce. Which therefore must pronounce that alone to be truly profitable, which is universally such, and which gives Assurance of Constancy and Duration ³, but can never judge it a desirable Thing to enjoy a momentary Advantage, drawing after it a Train of endless Mischiefs. 'Tis a most unhappy and a most dangerous Pleasure, in the Heat of a Fever to relieve ourselves with cold Water, which will be sure afterwards to redouble our Tortures. Actions perform'd in Conformity to the Law of Nature have a double Excellency, not being only Honest, that is, conducive to the Preservation and to the Increase of the Honour and the good Credit of Men; but likewise Useful and Profitable, promoting their Interest and Advantage, and contributing largely to their Happiness. And this latter Quality is so far from being an unworthy Attribute of Virtue, that even in Holy Scripture, 1 Tim. iv. 8. Godliness is said to be profitable to all things, having both the Promises of this Life and of that which is to come. On the other hand, those Actions which contradict the Law of Nature, are always base and dishonest, and tho' they now and then bear some Appearance of Profit and of Pleasure, yet these Charms are quickly over, and never fail of being attended with a more considerable Croud of Evils and Misfortunes ^b. ⁵ Tully in his first Book of Offices, Chap. 4. talks admirably for our present Business. Between a Man and a Brute, says he, there is eminently this Difference; the one is carried on by Sense, and to that only which is present, with little or no regard to what is either past or to come: Whereas the other, by the Benefit of Reason, sees the Consequence of Things; their Rise and their Progress, and couples together Causes and Effects; compares Resemblances of Actions and Events; tacks the present to the future; and so taking in his whole Life at a View, he prepares all Things necessary for the Use and Comfort of it. Therefore 'tis so far from being true, that Civil Laws were first instituted for the sake of this momentary and bastard Profit, that it appears to have been their chief End and Design, to hinder Men from squaring their Actions by so false a Measure. For, should any one resolve to direct all his Proceedings to his own private Advantage, without any regard to the rest of Mankind; since all other Men might as well take the same Course, there could not but arise the deepest Confusion, and a kind of War of all against all, a State ⁶ the most unprofitable and the most inconvenient in the World. On the contrary, it is very manifest, that he who, by observing the Law of Nature, endeavours to win the Affections and the good Grace of others, may conceive much surer Hopes of Profit attainable by their Assistance, than he, who trusting to his own single Power, takes the Liberty of treating others as he lists ^c. Nor is it possible for Men to frame a Notion of any Profit, which will be their own Peculiar, or to which all Men will not have as good a Title as themselves; since Nature hath never given any Man so large a Privilege, as to let him exercise any kind of Right against others, the Use of which they are not allow'd to turn again upon him. Therefore 'tis a great Mistake to fancy 'twill be profitable to you, to take away, either by Fraud or Violence, what another Man hath acquir'd by his Labour ^d; since others have not only the Power of resisting you, but of taking the same Freedom with your Goods and Possessions. And you have as little Reason to think it will prove advantageous to you to break your Faith; since your own Example may be made use of to your own Prejudice. Isocrates in Areopagitic. p. 252. ⁷ They judge those who break Faith and Contracts, to injure the Poor more than the Rich. The latter, by losing their Dependents, could suffer only some little Damage in their Revenues. The former, if they were thrown off by their Patrons, whose Support and Assistance they continually needed, must be reduc'd to extreme Indigence and Misery. ⁸ The same Orator, in Orat. de Pace, p. 285. Ed. Paris. placeth the chief Strength and Foundation of all his Advice to his Countrymen, in this Principle, that there is more Gain and Profit in a peaceful Competency, than in a needless Pursuit of Abundance. That Justice is much more eligible than Injury, and the Care of their own Possessions, than the Desire of other Mens ^e. ⁹ Nor should any presume so much on his own Strength and Power, as to imagine that others will not repay him with such Ulage as they receive from him: For all true Power arises from a Con-

^a Marc. Antonin. Lib. vii. §. 74. Those Actions are profitable or advantageous, which are agreeable to Nature. ^b See Prov. xx. 17. v. 3, 4. — ix. 17, 18. — xxi. 6. ^c Add. D. Cumberland, Chap. ii. §. 29. n. 2. ^d See Prov. i. 13, 14, &c. ^e Which Assertion he afterwards proves at large, and which is much more to the present Purpose than that above-mention'd by our Author.

⁴ As the Objects which are near us are commonly esteemed greater than those vast Bodies that are at a Distance; so in respect of Good and Evil, the present have the Advantage, and, in Comparison of those that are at a Distance, are always the greatest: So the most of Men are like prodigal Heirs, believe a lesser Good in present preferable to the Reversion of a greater; and so for the present Possession of a small Thing, they'll part with a large Inheritance which would certainly come to them. This proceeds from a false Opinion. Every one ought to know, wherein consists his Pleasure, for what is absent now, will one Day be present certainly, and then having the Advantage of Nearness, he'll see Things at their just Proportion, and so prevent in Time the unreasonable Estimate he has set on them by reason of the unequal Measures. Mr. Locke's Essay of the Understanding, Lib. ii. Chap. xxi. §. 93. See also, what goes before and follows.

⁹ "There are more Men that poison, steal, and cheat us, than there are against whom we can commit those Crimes. Every one is more liable to be offended, than offend; for among Twenty Persons that are Equals, it is manifest every one of them has less Power against the Nineteen, than they against him." Bayle's Dict. Hist. & Crit. Tom. iii. p. 2745. Col. 2.

junction with other Men, whom 'tis impossible to keep together by your single Force. So that if that false and spurious Profit were to be the Measure of all our Proceedings, the Life of the stoutest Mortal would be as often in Danger, as it should seem profitable to any one to rid him out of the Way: And whoever took such a Course, would only set a fatal Pattern, and chalk out the Way to his own Destruction. On the whole Matter then, not Justice, but Injustice is really the highest Folly; which, tho' it may seem to succeed for the present, yet is neither general nor lasting; and tends to the Dissolution and Destruction of human Safety; Men being chiefly guarded and secur'd from Dangers by Society and by Friendliness. Nor will this hold true only of particular Men, but likewise of whole States and Communities; there having never been any Commonwealth so powerful, or so well establish'd, as not sometimes to stand in need of their Neighbours Assistance; since no single Kingdom could long bear up against the united Forces of a strong Confederacy.

Quintilian observes ¹⁰ that an ill Example can never be truly advantageous; for tho' it may give some Delight as the Occasion now stands, yet it afterwards draws on us a heavier Load of Mischiefs. It is impossible, says Demosthenes, Olynthiac. 2. to obtain any firm and durable Power by Injuries, by Perjury, and by Lies. Epicurus himself, in his Notions of Justice, was very honourable and very fair, as Gassendus hath given us this short Representation of them ¹¹. Justice not only never hurts any one, but, on the contrary, always carries along with it something conducing to the Ease and Tranquillity of the Mind; which it likewise further supports with the Hopes of wanting nothing that uncorrupted Nature can desire. A Soul where Injustice hath taken up its Seat, cannot but be in perpetual Disorder and Confusion, whilst when it attempts any thing with never so much Secrecy, yet it hath no Assurance that the Fact will always be undiscover'd. And since Justice is design'd for the Promotion of the common Good, it's plain that nothing can be just which doth not tend to the Advantage of whole Societies, and of each Member in particular. And because every one by the Guidance of Nature, desires and pursues what is good for him, it is necessary, that whatever is just should be according to Nature, and should therefore be call'd natural. And this Justice is nothing else but the Pledge and Assurance of general Profit; for while it takes Place by the Universal Consent of all Parties, there arises this common Advantage, that Men do not mutually give and receive Injuries, but live in Peace and Quietness together; which as it is good and profitable, so doth Nature incite every Man to embrace and to pursue it. Tho' it must be observ'd by the Way, That what Gassendus afterwards delivers about a different Profit, among different Persons; and about a variable Justice, must not be admitted in regard to Natural Law, but only to Civil Constitutions. Diodor. Sicul. Lib. xxv. Eclog. 1. Epicurus, in the Book which he calls Settled Notions, affirms, That a Life led according to Justice is free from all Trouble and Disquiet; but that Injustice is full of Disturbance and Disquiet. Lucretius, Lib. v. 1151, &c.

*Circumrexit enim vis atque injuria quemque,
Atque unde exorta est ad eum plerumque revertit.
Nec facile est placidam ac pacatam ducere vitam,
Qui violat factis communia fœdera pacis.*

Because diffusive Wrong can spread o'er all,
No State's secure; nay, oft' the Wrongs recoil }
With double Force on the Contriver's Fall.
Nor can those Men expect to live at Ease,
Who violate the common Bonds of Peace.

Mr. CREECH.

In short, any one is able to judge what a Contradiction it is almost to common Sense, to make such a Profit as is opposite to Justice, the Standard of Acting. ¹¹ The Sophist Protagoras in Plato, p. 225. Ed. Fran. Ficin. though a Trifler in other Matters, yet had Wit enough to speak smartly on this Point. In other Habits, says he, if a Man pretend, for Example, to be an excellent Piper, when he doth not understand a Note, he either raises the Laughter or the Indignation of those that hear him; and his Friends admonish him of his Madness and Vanity. But the Case is quite otherwise in Injustice. For suppose some Persons know another to be really unjust, yet should the Man himself confess that he is guilty of that Vice before Strangers, they would take it for granted, that he was out of his Wits; maintaining that such a Wickedness is never to be discover'd, but the contrary Virtue always to be pretended to, whether it be really practis'd, or not. Not to counterfeit Justice therefore they take to be a senseless Extravagance; since ¹¹ Ἐν τῇ ταύτῃ ἀρχαίᾳ ἀρεταίᾳ (ὡς περὶ σὺ λέγεις) εἴαν τις φῆ ἀγαθὸς ἀνθρώπος εἶναι ἢ ἀλλοτρίων ἰσχυρῶν τεχνῶν, ἢ μὴ ἐστὶν ἢ καταλαγῶσιν, ἢ καὶ ταύτῃ, ἢ οἱ οἰκείῳ, προσεντες νετεῖσιν ὡς μαμοῖσιν. ἐν τῇ δικαιοσυνῇ, ἢ ἐν τῇ ἄλλῃ πολιτικῇ ἀρετῇ, εἴαν τις καὶ εἰδῶσιν, οἱ ἀδικῶν ἔστιν, ἐν ἑστῶ ἄνθρωπος κατὰ αὐτὴν τάληθῃ λέγει ἐναντίον πολλῶν, ὃ ἐκείνῳ σωφροσύνην ἔχοντο εἶναι, τάληθῃ λέγειν, εἰ ταῦτα μαρτυρῶν, ἢ φασὶ πάσης δὲ ὄψεσθαι εἶναι δικαίους ἔαν τε ᾄσιν, ἔαν τε μὴ, ἢ μαρτυροῦσθαι τὴν μὴ προσπειρημένον δικαιοσυνῇ, ὡς ἀνιχνεύοντες εἶναι, ὅτι ἄνθρωπος ἀνιστοῦσθαι μετὰ τὴν αὐτῆς, ἢ μὴ εἶναι ἐν ἀνθρώποις. But I do not see how this Passage and the following one of Quintilian make for our Author's Purpose, since they only prove the Maxim of the Duke of Rochefoucault, That, Hypocrisy is an Homage which Vice pays to Virtue. Moreover, there is not any thing that can prove, that Profit may be opposed to Justice, and any Man's private Interest to the Publick. I shall alledge some more pertinent Authorities to this Purpose, out of Seneca and Arrian's Epictetus. Seneca's Words, Epist. 48. are, Nec potest quisquam beate degere, qui se tantum intuetur, qui omnia ad utilitates suas converterit: alteri vivas oportet, si vis tibi vivere. Hæc societas diligenter & sanctè observanda est, quæ nos omnes omnibus miscet, & judicat aliquod esse commune jus generis humani: i. e. " 'Tis not possible for any Man to live happily who regards himself only, who minds his own Interest only; we must live to others Profit, if we will advance our own. This Union in Society is carefully and sacredly to be preserved, which intermixes us together, and teaches us, that there is a common Right of Mankind." Arrian's Words in Epictet. Lib. 1. Ch. xix. are, Καὶ οὕτως τε [οὗ Ζεὺς] τοιαύτην φύσιν τῷ λογικῷ ζῷος κατασκευάσασθαι ἵνα μηδεὶς, ἢ ἰδίαν ἀγαθῶν δυνταί τυχεράνῃ, εἰ μὴ τι εἰς τὸ κοινὸν ἀφελίμων προσφέρται, ἕτως ἕκαστος ἀκονώθηον γινεται τὸ πάντα αὐτῷ ἕκαστος ποιῆν i. e. God hath disposed the Nature and Order of reasonable Creatures in such a Manner, that every one of them should advance each other's Interests, so as contributes to the publick Advantage; so that tho' we refer all to our private Advantage, we ought yet to do what in us lies to promote that of others." M. Antoninus has many ingenious Reflections in his Works tending this way.

whoever makes a contrary Profession deserves to be driven out of human Converse and Society^a. No Man is so bad, says Quintilian^a, as that he desires to seem bad. And almost every Body speaks more honestly than he either thinks or acts.

But the divine Providence hath sufficiently confuted this pernicious Opinion, by making its boldest Patrons and Assertors feel the fatal Consequences of it. To give an Instance or two. "Lysander, that crafty Designer, who manag'd most Affairs by Cheats and Shuffles, who plac'd all Right in Profit, who affirm'd Truth and Lies to be indifferent Things, and either to be most valuable as it was most advantagious; who bragg'd that Men were to be deceiv'd with Oaths as Children with Dice or bounding Stones; as Plutarch^b and Polyenus^c give his Character; did he build his Fortunes on a sinner Bottom, than if he had made Truth and Honesty the Mark and the Standard of his Proceedings^d? Agefilaus^e, who at other Times and in other Speeches, us'd to cry up Justice for the Queen of Virtues, without which, Valour and Fortitude would be of no Use, yet when Phœbidas had without Orders possess'd himself of the Fort Cadmea, defended that Boldness by such kind of Rhetorick as this, That the Action of Phœbidas was to be rated and judg'd of according to the Benefit and Advantage it brought to the State. Since whatever conduc'd to the publick Good of Lacedæmon, was to be done at a Venture; whether Men were empower'd by Commission for such Performances, or not. But was not this very Exploit the Occasion of the Spartans miscarrying in their Design of rendering themselves Masters of Greece?

XI. These Foundations being settled, 'tis easy to solve the Objections of the opposite Party. 'Tis ridiculously weak to conclude, that supposing different States to have set up different Laws upon the Account of Profit, therefore there can be no perpetual or natural Law. For all civil Laws do either presuppose or include the chief Heads of the Law of Nature, those by which the Safety of Mankind is secur'd: Neither are these in the least injur'd or impair'd by the particular Ordinances, which each Commonwealth finds a Necessity of superadding, for its separate Interest and Benefit. Penal Laws, or Sanctions, we acknowledge to have been instituted out of Fear of Justice, or to restrain the Wickedness of Men, when the bare Dictates of natural Law were found insufficient for that Purpose. When Horace denies that Nature is able to distinguish betwixt Right and Wrong; we agree with him, if he means only that Nature which Man bears in common with Brutes; whereby

Brutes themselves, through the Information of their Senses, do perceive what is agreeable to their Body, and what not; without the least Apprehension of Honesty or of Dishonesty. But if he means the rational Nature, we deny the Position, as absolutely false. As for Carneades his Argument, that if the Romans would be just, that is, if they would restore every one his own, they must return to their primitive Cottages; and that therefore Justice is Folly; in vulgar Esteem this may bear some Semblance of a plausible Truth; but to those who look farther into it, it will appear exceeding empty and trifling. For since whatever Right we assume upon others, they may in like Manner use against us; it can by no Means be profitable for us by injuriously seizing on other Mens Goods, to invite them to make Reprials on our own. And in stating the Nature and the Definition of Profit, we are not to consider what seems advantagious to such or such a Man, at such a particular Time, to the Prejudice of others; but what is of universal and perpetual Benefit and Expediency. Thus, for Instance, let us suppose an Officer to have rais'd a vast Estate, by robbing the publick Treasury: such an one certainly imagines it would be Folly in him, to make an exact Restitution, and so to return to his first Narrowness of Fortune. But when the Prince, upon convicting him of Extortion, hath adjudg'd his Goods to the Treasury, and his Person to the Gallows, do we then think he took a wiser Course to raise himself in the World, than another Person who rests contented with a competent Maintenance, innocently acquir'd? Thus I know not whether it had not been better for the Roman People to have fate down with Satisfaction in the Enjoyment of that moderate Wealth which at first they got together, without the Expence of their Virtue or Honour; than when they had rifled and plunder'd all the whole World, to turn their Weapons upon themselves, and to expose the feeble Carcass of their Empire to be torn in Pieces by the barbarous Nations. Nor do the other Arguments of Carneades, as set down by Lactantius^e, require any long or any laborious Reply. For if any think it a Piece of Wisdom in the Seller of a House, to dissemble its being infected with the Plague, certainly it must be own'd for Wisdom in the Buyer, if he either give false Money for his false Goods, or to punish the Author of the Cheat by the severest Methods. Lastly, as for those Cases, whether it be fair^a in a Shipwreck for a stronger Man to force a Plank from the Arms of a weaker, or in a Flight, for a found Man to dispossess a wounded Soldier of his Horse, preferring his own Preservation to the Safety of his Fellow, we shall hereafter find Occasion to discuss and to determine them^a. It will be sufficient for the present to make this short Remark, that Actions done upon extreme Necessity, and out of Conster-nation of Mind arising from imminent Danger, and which do therefore meet rather with Excuse, than with Approbation; ought by no Means to be establish'd for common Rules of Proceeding^b.

XII. The Author of the Treatise De Principiis justis & decoris, in searching after the right Notion of the Law of Nature, follows this Method. In the first Place he lays down this confess'd Principle, That there is a GOD, and that he created the World in Wisdom; which no Man in his Senses will dispute. He adds, that GOD hath declar'd his Resolution of exercising the Virtues of Truth and Justice, in his Government of the World^c. But here, besides that it scarce seems right to conceive the divine Justice or Truth after the Manner of Virtues, it is sufficiently manifest, that the Disposition or the Inclination to Justice which we attribute to GOD^d, is very different from that which Men are to exercise towards one another: Inasmuch as the former denotes that Method by which an infinitely great and good Creator is pleas'd to govern his intelligent Creatures; whereas the latter obtains only amongst Persons by Nature equal, and subject all alike to a common and a supreme Lord. Neither can it be at all made out that divine and human Justice are capable of the same Measure, from this Argument, that in holy Scripture we are frequently refer'd to the Example of GOD^e: For in those Passages the holy Spirit is pleas'd to follow the usual Way of Reasoning^f, from a greater to a less. But from these Principles the said Author, p. 9, 10. concludes, that in the Creation of the World GOD propos'd to himself some End. That he hath appointed Means sufficient for the obtaining that End. That a Man shall certainly be punish'd, if he deviates from that Order which GOD would have us observe, in the Prosecution of the End propos'd by him to himself, and to Mankind. And on the contrary, shall certainly be rewarded, if he direct his Life according to the Order prescrib'd by his Creator. In fine, that the Justice of GOD implies nothing else, but his lawful Distribution of Rewards and Punishments. In Regard to this Doctrine, I question whether it can be said with any tolerable Sense, that GOD hath constituted an End, common to Man with himself; or that the Order prescrib'd by him to Man, that is, the Observation of the Law of Nature, doth produce the End for which GOD created the World. Nor can the Crudeness of the following Aphorism pass with ordinary Digestions: That the natural Necessity which is in GOD doth lay on Men a Necessity of pursuing Virtue, and of flying Vice. Yet suppose we should be brought to grant all this, and then should guide our Search after the Law of Nature by some such general Maxim and Rule, Whatever Things are by Nature so dispos'd, as to hinder the End which GOD propos'd in the Creation of the World; all those Things are prohibited by the Law of Nature: But whatever Things are so naturally order'd, that the End before-mention'd cannot be obtain'd without them, those are certainly enjoin'd or commanded by the same Law: We shall still be at a loss to understand what necessary Relation every particular Precept of the Law of Nature bears to that End; whilst the End itself is not perfectly discover'd by us. Thus, for Example, there would be need of a Train of Deductions, to make me apprehend, that the End for which the World was created cannot be attain'd without honouring one's Parents, or that Theft is repugnant to the said End. 'Tis meer trifling therefore to stick upon such general Terms, without calling in the Assistance of nearer and more distinct Principles. And the Foundation of the Law of Nature must be always left in the Dark by him who can make no farther Progress in the Question, than to tire us with such Repetitions, that since the World was made in Wisdom and Order; and since Man hath his Part assign'd him in the universal Harmony; therefore that Order ought necessarily to point out to every Man his Duty, in every Action or Proceeding.

XIII. Thus far most are agreed, that the Law of Nature is to be drawn from Man's Reason; flowing from the true Current of that Faculty, when unperverted^g. On which Account the holy Scriptures declare it to be written in the Hearts of Men, Rom. ii. 15. This we judge to be a most manifest Truth, that altho' the sacred Writings do throw in a more enlarged Light to direct us in the clearest View of Nature's Law^h, yet the same Law may without any extraordinary Assistance be found out and solidly demonstrated, by the bare Force of Reason, such as GOD first implanted and still preserves in Man-

^e §. XII. I do not see that Veltbuisen says any Thing that can intimate the contrary. His Notion is, That GOD hath dispos'd all Things in a Manner suitable to his Perfections; and this is that natural Necessity of which he speaks a little lower.

^f Our Author says, That in those Places of Scripture the Arguments are drawn, a minori ad majus, i. e. from the Less to the Greater; whereas 'tis evident that they are drawn just the contrary Way; for thus the Argument runs, and he himself speaks so in another Place: "If GOD, who is the Lord of all the World, and has from all Eternity enjoyed a compleat Happiness, who is self-sufficient, and has no need of Pardon, is very merciful to his Creatures, who have provok'd him to Anger by their Sins, with how much greater Reason ought Men to have Compassion on their Brethren, whose Pardon they themselves often want, and whose Help they can't live without? If a Master hath Pity of his Servant, the Servant ought much more to have Pity on his Fellows. If GOD causes the Sun to rise on wicked Men, much more ought Men to do good to their Enemies. Men, I say, who are so subject to offend one another, and who have so great Need of Assistance one from another." Specimen Controvers. Chap. iv. §. 5. To call this way of Arguing, a minori ad majus, is contrary to the Language of all Orators and Logicians. See Aristot. Rhet. Lib. ii. Chap. xviii. and Top. ii. Chap. x. as also Quint. ii. Instit. Orat. v. 10.

^g 'Tis true, that this is not much to the Purpose, but we must own, that Veltbuisen did not much depend on it; and though he does not explain himself so distinctly as our Author, yet he lays down a Principle which reaches to the very Bottom of that which establishes Society, in another Place, which is this, "That which is such in general, and of that Nature that Men can't dispense with the Observation of it, without bringing a great Prejudice to all Mankind, or which if Mankind should permit to every Body, 'twould be to their great Damage, whatever is such, say I, is forbidden by the Law of Nature." Page 115.

kind. Yet here we by no Means think it necessary to maintain, that the general Principles of natural Law are innate, or imprinted, as it were, upon Mens Minds, from their very Birth, in the Manner of distinct and actual Propositions, so as to be readily express'd and utter'd by them, as soon as they arrive at the Use of Speech, without farther Instruction or Meditation. For that these native Idea's or original Characters are no better than unwarrantable Fictions³, any one may discover, who will be so curious as to observe nicely the Steps by which Children make their Progress in Knowledge, clearing themselves by little and little from the Ignorance of their Infant State. Nor is it a Consideration of little Weight in this Point, that the holy Scriptures frequently describe Infancy and Childhood⁴ by the Ignorance, and riper Age by the Knowledge of Right and Wrong⁵. Dr. Cumberland must be our Guide and Master in these Disquisitions, who hath most clearly demonstrated, that altho' we reject the Notion of those innate Propositions, yet the Knowledge of the Law of Nature is truly and really imprinted on human Minds by GOD, as he is the first Mover and Director of them: Whence likewise any one may readily discover, that 'tis his Will and Command we should act according to that Law. That Phrase in Romans ii. 15. which is urg'd so hardly by some Authors, is certainly⁶ figurative, and implies no more than a clear and certain Knowledge treasur'd up in the Memory; of which the Persons spoken of are convicted in their own Consciences, by what Means soever those Notions first enter'd into their Thoughts. Thus too those Sins which in Jeremiah xvii. 1. are said to be engraven on the Tables of the Heart, inasmuch as they are actual Transgressions, could not be discover'd at the Nativity of the Offenders⁷. That Readiness which we see in Children and in the ignorant Multitude, to distinguish Right from Wrong, is owing in a great Measure to Exercise and Use; whilst from their early Years, and the first opening of their Reason, they observe good Things to be approv'd of, and evil Things to be exploded; the former to be attended with Praise, the latter⁸ with Punishment. Their Minds are so fix'd and dispos'd by daily Practice, and by the whole 7 Series of common Life, that few of them so much as doubt whether they may not proceed by other Methods. Whoever considers this Matter accurately, will discover, that 'tis very hard to give a Reason for many Practices, which yet the common People undertake without Scruple or Hesitation. To borrow an Instance from a late Author^d, If a Man be found committing a Robbery, the Multitude presently join Hands and Minds to pursue and to seize the Thief: But if upon a Quarrel one Man hath kill'd another, every Body wishes he may get off safe; at least no Body willingly assists in the taking of him. The Reason of such a Difference the Vulgar understand not, which is this; Everyone is more in danger from a Thief, who designs to plunder wherever he can meet with Booty; than from an Actor of Manslaughter, who intends Mischiefs to none but to the Person who gave him Provocation. Therefore when we acknowledge the Law of Nature to be the Dictate of right Reason, our Sense and Meaning is this, that the Understanding of Man is endued with such a Power, as to be able from the Contemplation of human Condition, to discover a Necessity of living agreeably to this Law; as likewise to find out some Principle by which the Precepts of it may be clearly and solidly demonstrated^e. Nor is it any Rub or Prejudice to this Doctrine, that the artificial Method of demonstrating these natural Precepts is not known or apprehended by all Men; and that most Persons both learn and observe the Law of Nature by Custom, and by the common Course and Tenour of living. For we see every Day the common Mechanicks and Artificers performing many Things, either by Imitation, or by the compendious Direction of Instruments, the Proof of which they do not in the least understand: And yet this doth not hinder such Operations from being truly mathematical, or from being founded on solid Principles of Reason. Hence it likewise appears what Rule we are to measure our Reason by, in judging of its Fitness for the Discovery of natural Law: or whence we may be assur'd, whether such a Dictate proceeds from right, or from deprav'd Reason. The Dictates of right Reason are true Principles, which agree with the Nature of Things well observ'd and examin'd; and which

³ Our Author treats more at large of this in his Apology, §. 24. and in his Specimen Controversiarum, Chap. iv. §. 23. But Mr. Locke has set it in its full Light in his Essay upon Man's Understanding. See also what I have said in my Preface, §. 3.

⁴ Our Author must understand here by Good and Evil, Recti & Turpis, Honesty and Dishonesty; but that is not the true Notion of this Expression in the sacred Writers, who, according to the Idiom of their Language, would have us to understand by that Phrase in general, All that can't be known, because in Reality all Things that we know are either good or evil, i. e. profitable or hurtful; as is judiciously observed by Lud. Cavellius in his Notes upon Gen. iii. 5. which it would be well to consult; as also Mr. Le Clerc's Commentary on the same Place. Nevertheless, if any Consequence ought to be drawn from the Expressions of sacred Writers in Matters of Philosophy, in respect to which they commonly follow the most popular Notions, we might infer, that these Passages very much favour the Opinion of those who deny innate Ideas, since he that says all, excepts nothing. In fine, we find this way of speaking among the profane Authors. See Mr. Le Clerc's Ars Critica, Part II. §. 1. Chap. ii. §. 26. pag. 153. Tom. i. and Hesiod's Theogonia, v. 900.

⁷ Add to this the manifest Proposition that these Maxims have with the Light of right Reason for it is perceived by the most simple, the very Moment that 'tis propounded, and they understand it, tho' they would never have found it out themselves, nor can they apprehend the Reasons so well as to deliver their Thoughts distinctly about it. Further, it is certain, that no Man at the Age of Discretion, can reasonably pretend an invincible Ignorance for his Excuse; but yet it is no less true that Education, Instruction, and Example, are the ordinary Means by which Knowledge is convey'd into the Mind of Man, and without it either the natural Light would be almost wholly extinguish'd, or we should not attend to it. This Experience shews us, not only among several savage Nations, but even among the more civilized, there being many Men that make good this sad and mortifying Truth. Whence we may conclude, that every one ought to take special Care to contribute as much as may be to the Instruction of others in their Duty, and to establish, confirm, and spread abroad so necessary a Knowledge.

are deduc'd from other true and first Principles, by the Rules of good Consequence. On the contrary, those are Dictates of deprav'd Reason, in which a Man either lays down false Principles, or by a wrong Method deduces false Conclusions. For ^a at the same time as we affirm the Law of Nature to be imprinted on us by the Nature of Things, we imply that it is most true and infallible: Since Nature presents us with nothing but what really exists, and produces no Effect that can be charg'd with Falshood: All Falsity arising from the Mistakes of Men, whilst they either divide such Notions as naturally cleave together, or join such together as Nature hath separated and plac'd at a Distance ^a. And this Course of Judging being duly follow'd, we need not fear that any one shall be able to foist upon us for natural Law, either the frantick Notions of his ill-purg'd Brain, or the irregular Desires of his misguided Mind. For 'tis in vain for that Man to make his Appeal to Reason, who cannot demonstrate his Assertions from Principles of unquestion'd Truth, and such as agree with the Nature of Things; inasmuch as all Truth and all Rectitude consists in the Agreement of Conceptions and of Propositions with the Things themselves, which they are intended to express. And he who hath not Parts enough to frame and unite the Chain of a Demonstration, must supply that Defect by an exceeding Stock of Impudence, if he desires any Regard should be had to his vain Conjectures, when they run alway from the receiv'd Opinions of Mankind. Moreover, it is manifest to all those who understand the Force and the Manner of Demonstrations, that there is not only a Necessity that the Principles made use of be true, and the first or highest that we can ascend to, but likewise that they be proper and peculiar to the Question in Debate, and so very clear, that the Mind apprehending by their Means, the Cause of the Thing asserted, may rest satisfied, and neither desire nor want any farther Proof. Now against this Rule of finding out the Dictates of right Reason, those Authors have not only transgress'd, whose Foundations of natural Law we have already examin'd: But those too who think it sufficient to build that Law on so slender a Bottom as this, That natural Honesty consists in the Agreement of Reason and Appetite; the Rule of which Honesty is the Excellency and the Dignity of human Nature, and that most noble End for which Providence seems to have given us the Dominion and the Possession of the World. For tho' we could argue never so fairly, this Action is suitable to the Excellency and the Dignity of Man, and therefore honest and to be perform'd; yet this doth not furnish us with any clear and certain Knowledge, in which our Minds may rest safely without farther Enquiry: But the Question still remains, in what that Excellency consists, and by Virtue of what Cause it comes to agree to Mankind. Thus, if one should say to a Clergy-man, It doth not become you to frequent Taverns and Houses of Debauchery, because such Courses are repugnant to the Dignity of the sacerdotal Office; he says nothing but Truth, in all this, but he doth not alledge the last and the strongest Reason, so as to set the Matter beyond Doubt and Dispute ^b.

Altho', as hath been already observ'd, it is not in the Power of every Man, to deduce the Law of Nature artificially from its Principle: yet that it may be properly said to be known to all Men enjoying the Use of their Reason, it is sufficient, if even Persons of tolerable Heads are able to apprehend the Demonstration when propos'd by others, and clearly to perceive the Truth of it, by comparing it with their own natural Condition. As for the lowest Degree of Mortals who are acquainted with the Law of Nature, chiefly by popular Information and by common Use, they ought to require no farther Proofs of its Certainty, than that first the Exercise of it is maintain'd by their Superiors, by whose Authority they are to be guided; and then, secondly, that they themselves cannot find any probable Reasons by which they might either confute or weaken its Force; and lastly, because they are every Day sensible of its Usefulness, and of the Benefits which it confers upon Mankind. And upon this Account the Law of Nature appears to be sufficiently promulgated; so that no Person of competent Years and of sound Understanding, can by any Means plead invincible Ignorance of it.

For the easy Knowledge of what the Law of Nature dictates, Hobbes ^c commends the Use of this Rule, When a Man doubts whether what he is going to do to another be agreeable to the Law of Nature, let him suppose himself in the other's Room. For by this Means, when Self-love and the other Passions, which weigh'd down one Scale, are taken thence and put into the contrary Scale, 'tis easy to guess which way the Balance will turn ^d. Mosebus Idyll. ^d This Period was not in the first Edition of this Work; and not being exactly fitted to the Coherence of the Discourse, I have changed the Reading in my Translation, but without any Prejudice to the Author's Sense.

^e We find the same Maxim in Sadder, or the Collection of the Precepts of Zoroaster, made by the Persian Magi (Porta. lxxi.) in Mr. Hyde's Book. See the Passage of Hierocles set down in my following Notes.

Dr. Sbarrock is of Opinion ^a that this Rule is not univerfal, becaufe if fo, a Judge must needs abfolve the Criminals left to his Sentence, in as much as he would certainly spare his own Life, were he in their Place: I must needs give a poor Petitioner what Sum soever he desires, becaufe I should wish to be thus dealt with, if I was in his Condition: Or I must clean my Servant's Shoes, becaufe I require him to clean mine. But the Rule will still remain unshaken, if we observe, that not ¹⁰ one Scale only, but both are to be consider'd; or that I am not only to weigh and examine what is agreeable to me, but likewise what Obligation or Necessity lies ¹¹ on the other Person, and what I can demand of him, without injuring either of our Duties. Yet we must confess, that this Precept cannot be esteem'd a Fundamental Axiom of the Law of Nature; since it is only a Corollary of that Law which obliges us to hold all Men equal with our selves; and therefore may be demonstrated à priori.

XIV. According to our Judgment, there seems no Way so directly leading to the Discovery of the Law of Nature, as is the accurate Contemplation of our ¹ natural Condition and Propensions. Altho' in this Consideration regard must be had to some Things which are extrinsical to a Man, and chiefly to those which are likely to promote his Interest, or to procure his Damage and Inconvenience. For whether this Law was impos'd on Man to advance his Happiness, or to check his Wickedness (which might otherwise break out to his own Destruction) ² we cannot proceed more clearly in gaining a Notion of it, than by examining in what Points and Respects he hath need of Assistance, and in what he hath Occasion for Restraint and controul. In the first Place then, Man hath this in Common with all other Creatures endued with a Sense of their own Being, that he loves himself as highly as is possible, that he endeavours by all Ways and Means to secure his own Preservation, to obtain what appears conducive to his Good, and to repel what is in his Judgment Evil. And this Self-love, regularly speaking, is so very strong, as to supersede any Inclination which a Man may have for another. Sometimes indeed Men seem to affect others with a more tender Passion than themselves, to be more delighted with their Happiness, and more disturb'd at their Misfortunes than at their own. Thus Des Cartes ^c observes, that the Love which a Good Parent bears towards his Children is so very pure, as to make him desire neither the gaining of any thing by them, nor the possessing them in any other Manner than he doth at present, nor the being joined to them by any stricter Engagements than those of the present Union. But considering them as his other Self, he seeks their Good equally with his own; or rather with greater Care, in as much as he reckons himself and his Children to make up but one entire Thing, of which not thinking himself the better Part, he frequently prefers their Advantage to his own, and is not afraid to secure their Safety by his own Destruction ^d. But now besides that this Love is not always constant, there are other Reasons why Parents are sometimes willing to have the Misfortunes of their Children transferr'd on themselves, namely, becaufe they think themselves more able to sustain them: or becaufe they cannot but confess, that Persons of those tender Years are more worthy of Life and of Safety. And a Reason why on the other hand Parents are so highly satisfy'd and pleas'd with the Success and Prosperity of their Off-spring, may be, becaufe they are sensible a great Part of the Glory will redound to themselves, for bringing such excellent and worthy Persons into the World ^e. Qui tanti talenti

¹¹ So that, altho' a Judge, if he were in the Place of a Criminal, would undoubtedly wish, as well as he, to escape the Punishment inflicted by the Law; nevertheless he ought to pass Sentence, becaufe otherwise he can't discharge the Duty of his Office, and will bring on himself much Trouble by such an Indulgence. We must relieve the Poor, but not to hurt ourselves much by it, nor satisfy his insatiable Avarice. It is just to use our Servants kindly, but we are not oblig'd to make clean their Shoes; this were to become a Servant instead of a Master. In a great Business, for Example, in a Disease, a Master may and ought, unless by another's Fault, to do such Services for his Servants as they have a Right to require of him; but to go farther, is to reverse the Order of Society, and accustom his Servants to Idleness, or rather to make them insolent in the highest Degree.

§. xiv. ¹ The very Name of natural Right shews us, That the Principles ought to be deduced from the Nature of Man, as many of the Antients have acknowledged. Natura enim Juris, says Cicero, explicata est nobis, eam ab hominibus retentam. Natura, De Leg. Lib. i. Chap. v. Παρατηρή τι σα ἢ φυσικὴ ἐπιζητεῖ, ὡς ἐπὶ φύσεως μὲν οἰκονομικῆς καὶ πολιτικῆς, ἢ προσώπου, εἰ μὴ χρεῶν μὲν δὲ διατιθεῖ σα ἢ ὡς ζωῆς φυσικῆς ἐξῆς ὃ παρατηρητικῆς, τι ἐπιζητεῖ σα ἢ ὡς ζωῆς φυσικῆς, ἢ πᾶν ἔστο παρατητικῆς, εἰ μὴ χρεῶν μὲν δὲ διατιθεῖ ἢ ὡς ζωῆς λογικῆς φύσεως ἐπὶ δὲ τὸ λογικὸν εἶδος ἢ πολιτικόν, τῶν δὲ καὶ οἰκονομικῆς, καὶ μὴ δὲ διατηρικῆς. Marc. Antonin. Lib. x. §. 2. i. e. Consider well what your Nature requires, as if you were governed by Nature only; and do this, if the Nature of the Creature be not any ways disorder'd. Then consider what the Nature of the Creature requires, and do not refuse to do it, if it be not contrary to the Nature of a reasonable Creature; for he that speaks of a reasonable Creature, speaks of a Political one; i. e. one born for Society. If you observe these Rules, you need not be uneasy for any thing. Further, Our Author speaks only of a natural obligatory Right; he thinks not in the least of the natural Right by simple Permission. See above, Lib. i. Ch. 6. §. 16. Note 1. and what is said in the last Note of this Chapter.

² The last of these Periods was added in the second Edition, and is not well placed.

genere Parentes ^a? It is likewise evident, that many Persons have contentedly suffer'd Death for other Persons, whom they either lov'd with an entire Affection, or to whom they devoted themselves with an absolute Service. For these Men fancied themselves to be join'd to such Friends or Masters as lesser Parts of the Whole, and therefore chose to be themselves destroy'd for the Preservation of the greater Part ^b. Procopius ^c tells us, that amongst the Ephalite Humns the more wealthy Men pick out about Twenty, or perhaps more Persons, for their special Friends; these are constant Guests at their Tables, and have the Use and Command of all their Riches and Possessions, being allow'd a kind of a Common Right over all Things: And when their Patron happens to die, Custom obliges them to be put alive with him into his Grave. And that such Ways of Mens devoting themselves are still practis'd in Japan, we are assur'd by the Authors who describe that Country and People ^d. The Truth is, in the Opinion of such Persons, the Boasts of Faith and of Affection with the Glory thence arising, are of more Value than all the Things in the World besides, and are not over-purchas'd at the Expence of Life itself. Some too being depriv'd of a near Friend, or of a singular Benefactor, do cast away their own Lives only out of Impatience and Despair, imagining it is impossible they should be otherwise than very miserable, having lost him on whom alone all their Hopes and Fortunes depended. Certain it is, whatever a Man doth for others, he never forgets himself; and Satan in Job ii. 4. well express'd the common Temper and Inclination of Mankind, when he said, Skin for Skin, and all that a Man hath, will he give for his Life.

Besides this Self-love, and this Desire of preserving himself by all Means and Methods, there is discoverable in Man a wonderful Impotency and natural Indigence; so that if we should conceive any single Person quite destitute of the Assistance of others, we should conclude his Life was given him rather for a Punishment than for a Blessing. It is farther manifest, that, next to the Support and the Defence of Heaven, Men draw their chief Help and Comfort ^e from one another. For, as the Strength of particular Persons is so unable to compass their Preservation and their Maintenance, that to live happily and conveniently they have continual Occasion for the Works and for the Supplies of their Neighbours, in as much as their own Time, as well as Power, would fail them to procure the most useful and the most necessary Things; so on the other Hand, particular Men have Convenience of furnishing others with many Things, which they themselves do not want; and which therefore would turn to no Use or Account, unless they were thus bestow'd and dispensed ^e. And as Men appear thus to be so vast a Support and Help to each other, so may they likewise, in as eminent a manner, prove a mutual Plague and Mischiefe; and they do often actually prove so, either upon the Instigation of their brutish Passions, or being compell'd by the Necessity of defending themselves from the Injuries and the Assaults of others. The Truth of all which is clear to us from daily Experience, and hath been insisted on more largely by us in the first Chapter of this Book ^f. But we desire it should be well observed, that in seeking out the true Condition of Men, we have assign'd the first Place and Influence to Self-love, not as if each particular Man ought in every Respect to prefer himself to all others, or to measure all Things by his own private Advantage, establishing his separate Interest for his chief End and Design; but because a Man is by Nature sooner sensible of the Love he bears towards himself, than of that which he bears towards others, in as much as it is natural for him sooner to perceive his own Existence, than the Existence of others. And farther, because the Care of me and my Affairs belongs to no body so properly as to my self: For altho' I propose the common Good for the Mark of Acting, yet since I likewise am a Part of Mankind, to the Preservation of which some Care is due, this Care must needs lie more especially and more forcibly on me my self, than on any Person else in the World.

XV. Thus much being granted, it is an easy Matter to discover the Foundation of Natural Law. Man is an Animal extremely desirous of his own Preservation, of himself expos'd to many Warts, unable to secure his own Safety and Maintenance without the Assistance of his Fellows, and capable of returning the Kindness by the Furtherance of mutual Good: But then he is often malicious, insolent, and easily provok'd, and ^g as

On the other Side, it was a gallant Saying of Epaminondas, that amongst all the good and fortunate Accidents of his Life, none struck him with so real a Pleasure, as that he won the famous Victory at Leuctra, before he had lost either of his Parents. Plutarch's Apophthegm. p. 193. ^g Cicero proves at large (De Offic. Lib. ii. Chap. iii. iv. v.) that there is nothing that a Man can receive more Good or Evil from, than from his Like. After which he thus concludes, Cum igitur hic locus nihil habeat Dubitationis, quin homines plurimum hominibus & prosini & obsint, primum hoc statuo esse virtutis, conciliare animos hominum, & ad usus suos adjungere, Chap. v. Just the same Consequence as our Author draws in §. following.

§. xv. ^h Mr. Titius affirms, that the Consequence is not good, but he is certainly mistaken; for our Author deduces Sociableness from all these Characters put together, and not from any single one. But in one Thing Mr. Titius seems to speak with Reason, when he says, That our Author in settling Sociableness in that Manner, gives us Cause to believe, that every one's private Advantage is the Foundation of Natural Right; because, according to him, if a Man becomes sociable, 'tis because he can't preserve himself without it, nor enjoy such Conveniences of Life, as are necessary in this World. I own, that our own Interests will engage us to be sociable; but 'tis not therefore a Consequent, that we must raise the Obligation of practising the Laws of Nature directly upon it; for there are Cases in which we must sacrifice our own Interest to others Advantage, and the Good of Society. I may add, that our Author himself, in his Element. Jurisprud. Univers. p. 431, &c. makes Self-love and Sociableness two distinct Principles of Duty; and I do not know for what Reason he should change his Sentiments. See what is said Note 5. of this Paragraph, and what the Author says in the Beginning of §. 16.

powerful in effecting Mischief, as he is ready in designing it. Now that such a Creature may be preserv'd and supported, and may enjoy the good Things attending his Condition of Life, it is necessary that he be social, that is, that he unite himself to those of his own Species, and in such a Manner regulate his Behaviour towards them, as that they may have no fair Reason to do him Harm, but rather incline to promote his Interests, and to secure his Rights and Concerns ². This then will appear a fundamental Law of Nature, Every Man ought, as far as in him lies, to promote and preserve a peaceful Sociableness with others, agreeable to the main End and Disposition of human Race in general ³. For by Sociableness we do not here mean a bare Readiness or Propension to join in particular Societies, which may possibly be form'd on ill Designs, and in an ill Manner; as the Confederacies of Thieves and Robbers; as if it were sufficient only to join ourselves with others, let our Intentions be what they will. But by this Term of Sociableness, we would imply ⁴ such a Disposition of one Man towards all others, as shall suppose him united to them by Benevolence, by Peace, by Charity, and so, as it were, by a silent and a secret Obligation. It would therefore be a Charge most notoriously false, should any insinuate, that the Sociableness which we establish is perfectly indifferent, and hath an equal Regard to good Society and to bad. We said it was the Duty of every Man to promote and to practise Sociableness as far as in him lies; because, for as much as it is not in our Power to oblige all other Men to behave themselves towards us as they ought, we have done our Duty when we have omitted nothing which we were able to perform, in moving and engaging them to exercise the like Sociableness towards us. From all which it follows, that since he who obliges us to any End, cannot but at the same Time be suppos'd to oblige us to those Means which are necessary to the Attainment of that End, all Actions which necessarily conduce to this mutual Sociableness, are commanded by the Law of Nature, and all those, on the contrary, are forbidden, which tend to its Disturbance, or Dissolution.

This ⁵ Method of Discovering the Law of Nature

² Nihil est profecto praestabilius, quam planè intelligi nos ad justitiam esse natos, neque opinione, sed naturâ constitutum esse jus. Id jam patebit, si hominum inter ipsos societatem, conjunctionemque perstexeris. Cicero De Leg. Lib. i. Ch. x. "You will see clearly that Right doth not depend on Opinion, but on the Establishment of Nature; if you consider the necessary Union and Alliance of Mankind." Σὺ ἀλλήλους ἔχειν ἀνθρώπους, καὶ ἀνομιὰ διατάξῃ ἐξ ἑοῦ τοῦ νόμου ἢ ἀν' αὐτοῖς ἑνωσίαν ἔστω γίνεσθαι ἐκείνης ἢ κατὰ ἑαυτὸν διέστην. Jamlich. Protrep. Chap. xx. "That Men should live together, and yet without Law, is absurd and impossible; for at this rate, Society would be more dangerous and prejudicial to them, than if they dwelt separately and singly without any Communication."

⁴ Whenever a Thing appears advantageous or noxious to Society in general, in what State soever Men are, in every Place, and at all Times, we must look upon it as either absolutely commanded or forbidden by the Law of Nature. So altho' Theft or Adultery may in certain Circumstances, and through the Corruption of Manners in certain Countries, have caus'd little or no Trouble in some particular Societies, as some affirm, that Experience hath prov'd in the Kingdoms of the Massagets and Lacedaemonians, yet these two Crimes are not a whit the less contrary to the Law of Nature: For if they were allow'd always and in all States, there would result from them, without doubt, monstrous Inconveniences and terrible Disorders; and, on the contrary, every Society whatsoever, must be more quiet and happy, where the Members of it religiously abstain from Robbery and debauching their Neighbour's Wife, than where such Attempts are frequently made. Our Author explains himself well enough upon this Subject in several Places of this Book, and in his other Works, viz. his Spicilegium Controversarum circa Jus Naturae, Chap. iii. §. 13. So that I am amaz'd that certain Men, who labour to confute him, and pretend to take a new Method in explaining the Law of Nature, make continual Alterations in a Thing so clear.

⁵ Our Author (in the Beginning of the following §. of this Chapter, and in his Specimen Controversarum, Chap. v. §. 25. as also in his Spicilegium Controversarum, &c. Chap. i. §. 14.) declares, that he designs to explain here the Duties of Men only which properly refer one to another: For, according to him, our Duties toward God belong to natural Theology, and Religion is no other way concern'd in a Treatise of natural Right, than as it is a more strong Cement of human Society. As for the Duties of Man to himself, they are deriv'd partly from Religion, and partly from Society. So that were Man independent on God's Authority, and no way concern'd in Society, we could not conceive how he could be subject to any Obligation from himself. If some had attend'd to this System of our Author, they would not have spent so much Paper in delivering Objections so ill grounded. Nevertheless I own, that he did well to prevent these Cavils by putting out a Treatise containing all the Duties of Man, of which we may know the Necessity by the Strength of Reason only, and which, if we rightly understand the Thing, are contained in the Idea of the Law of Nature, otherwise we must agree, that his Method to prove the Principle of Sociableness is subject to some Inconveniences, as we have observ'd above in Note 1. But all this may be rectified in some measure, by keeping close to the Notions of the Author above quoted. We must consider the Nature of Man, whose Constitution we have originally discover'd to be the Foundation of natural Right, either as it came out of the Hands of the Creator, or as fram'd afterward diversly by some human Acts. 1. From this Principle only, That Men are God's Workmanship, it evidently follows, that they ought to shew towards that supreme Being, all the Sentiments which are comprehended in the Notion of Religion, and of which we shall treat in Ch. iv. §. 3. Note 2. following. Moreover, God having consult'd the Preservation and Happiness of Mankind (as it appears plainly) both by the Faculties he has endow'd him withal, and by that strong Inclination which carries us irresistibly to search after Good, and avoid Evil: He also requires, doubtless, that every one should not only preserve and make himself happy, but also contribute his utmost Endeavours to the Preservation and Happiness of others. There are also two other Fundamentals of the natural Law in general, taken in its full Extent, and they are, 1. Love of ourselves, in a true Sense; and, 2. Sociableness. Inasmuch that as Religion contains all the Duties of a Man towards God, so Love of ourselves (for so it may be best express'd to avoid all Equivocation) comprehends all that we are directly oblig'd to do in Relation to ourselves; and Sociableness all that is due to others. See §. 24. Note 3. So that Sociableness is oppos'd to Self-love, and Self-love is no farther a Foundation of Sociableness, than as we are bound to others, because we love ourselves. But these are two distinct Principles, which though they have one great Relation, and equally concur in the Sight of the Creator, do yet differ in the Main, and ought wisely to be managed, so that we must keep an equal Balance, as much as is possible, between them: I say, as much as is possible, for it sometimes happens that we can't at the same time perform all the Duties which flow from these three great Principles of the natural Law; and in such Cases we ought to regulate ourselves by these general Maxims: 1. That our Duties toward God should always be preferred before all others. 2. That when there is a kind of Opposition between two Duties of Self-love, and two of Sociableness, we ought to prefer that which is attend'd with the greatest Advantage, i. e. we must consider whether the Good which shall be procur'd to ourselves or to others in performing either of these Duties is more considerable, than the Good that shall redound to ourselves or to others by the Omission of that Duty, which we can't at present discharge without neglecting some other. 3. If, all Things else being equal, there is an Opposition between Self-love and the Duties

Nature, doth not only appear, upon Examination, to be the most plain and easy, but it is likewise own'd for the most proper and genuine Way, by full Consent of the greatest Part of Learned Men. There's no Need of heaping up Testimonies and Authorities, but we may let Seneca speak for all the rest. ⁶ By what other Means, says he, are we prefer'd, but by the mutual Assistance of good Turns? This Commerce and Intercourse of Kindnesses adds Strength and Power to Life; and, in Case of sudden Assaults, puts it into a better Condition of Defence. Take us all asunder, and what are we, but an easy and an unequal Prey to wild Beasts? Man by Nature is weak on every Side: Society fortifies his Infirmity, and arms his Nakedness. Those two Excellencies, of Reason and of Society, render him the most potent of all Creatures, who would otherwise be obnoxious to Injuries from every Thing about him. Thus, by the Help of Union, he commands the World, who, if divided, would scarce be a Match for any living Rival. And it is Society alone which gives him his sovereign Sway over the inferior Creation. This was the Thing which first restrain'd the Violence of Diseases, which lent Crutches and Supports to Old Age, and administred Consolation to Grief. Take away this, and you cut asunder the Band of Union, the vital String of Mankind.^a

There are other less principal Causes, or rather Arguments of a sociable Nature in Men. For Example, because nothing is more sad and disagreeable than perpetual Solitude^b: Because otherwise we should have no Use of our Tongue, that most noble Instrument, by the Help of which Mankind have this Advantage above all other living Things, that they are able to express their inward Sentiments in articulate Sounds^c: Because every good and excellent Person is desirous of shewing his worthy Deeds amongst others. Amongst these secondary Reasons of Sociality, is that which Tully takes Notice of in his first Book of Offices, Chap. xlv. *There are some People, says he 7, that fancy all Leagues and Associations amongst Men, to arise from the Need that one Man hath for another, toward the supplying of our natural and common Necessities: Because (say they) if Providence had deliver'd us from this Care of looking after Food and Cloathing, by appointing some extraordinary Way for the Procurement of it; no Man of either Brains, or Virtue, would ever trouble his Head about Business, but wholly deliver himself up to the attaining of Wisdom. But this is a Mistake; for even in that Condition a Man would fly Solitude, and wish for a Companion in his very Studies: He would be willing to teach and to learn, to hear and to speak. He talks to the same Purpose in the Third Book of that Work, *Chap. v.*⁸ *It is more according to Nature, for a Man to undergo all Sorts of Labours and Troubles for the Service and the Conservation (if it were possible) of the whole World, after the Example of Hercules, whom the Gods; than to live in Solitude, and not only free from Cares, but even wallowing in Pleasures and Plenty, with all the Advantages of Strength and Beauty over and above. This it is that makes all great and glorious Spirits prefer the former Kind of Life to the latter. What the same Author observes in his Laelius, is rather applicable to particular Friendship, than to common Society: Friendship first arose rather from Nature than from Weakness; rather from the Bent and Inclination of Mens Minds, than from the Consideration of the Profit it would produce.

We would have it observ'd, that the fundamental Law of Nature establish'd by us, doth not disagree⁹ with that which Dr. Cumberland hath laid down in his Work on that Subject^d, concerning the Study and Endeavour after the com-

of Society, whether it happens through the Fact of another, or not, then Self-love ought to prevail; but if there be an Inequality, then Preference ought to be given to that of the two Sorts of Duties, which is accompanied with the greatest Profit. See what is said upon Chap. v. and vi. of this Book. II. But it often happens, that Men, without lessening the general Obligations, which result directly and immediately from their original Constitution, and the Appointment of the Creator, add thereto by their own Will, or by some Contract and positive Law, divers private Engagements, which are united with the Object of the Law of Nature, as it is a Rule of Action which requires such Engagements. In short, all Men ought to state they are in, as all the Parts of a Clock concur to fulfil the Contrivance of the Artist, although every Wheel move in a Way agreeable to its particular Form. See §. 22, and 24. following.

mon Good, and the demonstrating all possible Benevolence towards all Men. For we, when we maintain that a Man ought to be sociable, do at the same time intimate, that he ought not to make his own separate Good the Mark of his Proceedings, but the Benefit of Mankind in common; that no Person should pursue his private Advantage, by oppressing or by neglecting other Men; and that none hath Reason to hope for Happiness and Success, who either injures or despises his Neighbours.

From this social Nature of Man, and from the Consideration that every one is born not for himself alone, but for all human Kind, the Lord Bacon, in his Work of the Advancement of Learning, Book vii. Ch. i. deduces several excellent Corollaries; as, that an active Life is preferable to a contemplative one; that the Happiness of Man is to be sought for in Virtue¹⁰, not in Pleasure; that the Fear of sudden and unexpected Accidents ought not to deter us either from managing publick Affairs, or from maintaining Society and Commerce with other Men: Lastly, that we ought not to withdraw ourselves from civil Business, out of a tender and scrupulous kind of Humour, or out of an Aversion to the usual Methods of Complaisance. In which place the same noble Author farther observes, that there never was any Philosophy, Religion, Law, or Discipline found out in the World, which so far exalts the publick Good, and debases private Interest, as the Christian Institution appears to have done.

XVI. Let us consider now whether or no the Doctrine asserted by Hobbes, in his Book De Cive, Chap. i. §. 2. clashes with what we have been delivering on this Head. Certainly he hath been interpreted with very great Rigour, and with very little Reason by some learned Men, when they censure him for teaching, that Nature did not institute Society, but Discord, amongst Men, and, as they hence infer, *that all Kind of human Society is against the Design of Nature*². Which is much the same Thing, as if I should talk thus, Speech is by Nature actually born with no Man; therefore all Speech which is afterwards learnt, runs against Nature's Intention. Or thus, All Men by Nature come into the World little; therefore it is against Nature that they should grow up to larger Dimensions. Or, Men are by Nature subject to Diseases; therefore it is against Nature, to make use of Diet, or Physick to prevent or to cure them. We must confess, that this Notion of Hobbes, looks at first View extremely paradoxical; especially if a Man doth not consider diligently the Ambiguity of the Word Nature. But for fear any one should hereafter be cheated by the same doubtful Philosophy, and led fatally into Error; let us first observe, that Self-love and Sociableness ought by no Means to be made Opposites; but those different Inclinations are in such a Manner to be temper'd, that the former do not overthrow or disturb the latter^b. When by the Enormity of wild Lusts this Temperament is broken, and so all take up a Resolution of seeking each his own Advantage to the Injury of others; then arise those Heats and Contentions which divide and confound Mankind. For the avoiding which, the bare Care of our private Safety commands the Observation of social Laws, since we cannot ensure our own Persons without their Assistance and Protection. As for Hobbes's Demonstration, in which he ingeniously enough deduces those Laws which we call natural, from the Principle of Self-preservation, the first Remark that we shall offer concerning it is this; that such a Way of Proof doth indeed clearly enough make out, how conducive 'tis to the Safety of Men, that they act according to these Dictates of Reason: But it is not an immediate and direct Conclusion to say, a Man hath a Right of using those Means for his Preservation, therefore he is oblig'd, as it were by a Law, to observe and to pursue them: For to give those Dictates of Reason the Force and Authority of Laws, there is need of proceeding on some other Principle, than what he lays down.

In the next Place, great Care is to be taken lest any should conclude from such Arguments and Positions, that when he hath once ensur'd his own Safety, and set himself out of Danger, he need not trouble himself about the Security of other Men; or that he may insult how he please, over such a Person as doth not contribute to his Quiet and Happiness, or hath not Strength enough to disturb it. For we therefore give Men the Name of social Creatures, because they, of all living Things, are the fittest and the most able to promote the Advantage of each other: Neither is any inferior Creature capable of receiving so great Benefit¹ from Man, as Man himself. Again, the Excellency and Perfection of any particular Person rise the higher, the more he deserves of the Community by his publick Benefactions; and Works of this Kind are reckon'd the most noble, being suppos'd to proceed from the greatest Wisdom: Whereas any worthless Wretch, or a meer Fool, may be able to trouble or to hurt his Fellows. Besides, supposing every Man's private Advantage were establish'd for the Mark of his Actions, if many Persons should happen to fix that private Advantage on the very same Thing², there will either be a Necessity of saying that these many Desires, including a plain Contradiction, are consistent with Reason, which is the highest Absurdity: Or, since none can pretend that his Desire would have the Preference of the rest, we shall be forc'd to admit it for a Truth, that no Man ought so to make his own Profit the Aim of his Proceedings, as not to consider and to regard the Good of others. Farther, whoever attempts to draw every Thing to himself and to his own Interest, without looking towards his Neighbour, will not only labour in vain (it being impossible that all Persons and all Things should be dispos'd according to the contradictory Desires and Wills of particular Men) but he will likewise invite others to plunder and to destroy him. Moreover, if that only can be said to be good to a particular Person, which conduces to his separate Interest, it follows, that in respect of all other Persons it must be evil, inasmuch as their Interest or Profit is not furthered by it: And so what one covets and pursues, all the rest will oppose and keep off, which cannot but raise perpetual Clashing and contending amongst Men^a. Lastly, although another Person hath done me neither Good nor Hurt, and though he hath nothing in him to raise either my Fear or my Love, yet Nature obliges me to esteem even such a one as my Kinsman and my Equal; which Reason alone (had we no others) were sufficient to enforce the Practice of a friendly Society and Correspondence amongst Men. And upon this Consideration, supposing there was a Nation in the World maintaining Peace and Justice amongst themselves, and of such mighty Strength as to be formidable to all others, and so not restrain'd from hurting them by the Fear of a like Return; yet should this Nation or People assault, drive, kill, or drag into Slavery their weaker Neighbours, as often as they thought convenient, we should pronounce them actually guilty of a Breach of the Law of Nature. And yet (as we suppose) these People might preserve themselves, whether they allow'd any Rights to others, or not^b. In the same Manner, none will commend the Life and Profession of Robbers, because they exercise some little Justice towards those of their Gang, because their Captains divide the Prizes equally amongst them, and because he who either openly or secretly robs one of the Crew, is (even by Thieves) adjudg'd unworthy of farther Partnership and Society with them^c. This Rule of extending our Care beyond our own Persons, is so much the more diligently to be attended to, the more evident it is, that a Man of more Strength and Power than ordinary, is likely to be tempted to the Violation of natural Law, by the Thoughts of his own Self-sufficiency; that since his private Safety is abundantly provided for, he need not give himself the trouble of maintaining Peace and Friendship with his Neighbours.

² Again, our Author is guilty of an Inadvertency, for instead of saying, on the very same Thing, he doubtless meant to say, on Things very different from one another; as appears from his Reasoning afterwards, and from Dr. Cumberland, Ch. v. §. 16. whose Notions our Author follows: If right Reason, says that English Writer, dictates to Peter, that all his Happiness, and the End that he aims at, consists in the Enjoyment of the full Right of the Lands which John and James possess, as also of their Persons, and of the Goods of all others in general, right Reason cannot inspire James and John to place their Happiness in the Enjoyment of a full Right in the Lands and Person of Peter, and of all others, for that would imply a plain Contradiction, &c.

But to conclude this Point, as the Care of our own particular Preservation doth not exclude a Concern for Society, so neither doth a kind Regard for Society suppress our Affection to our Persons, but they are both extremely agreeable and consistent, as appears sufficiently from the Rule propos'd by our Saviour, Matth. xxii. 39. when he commands us to love our Neighbours as our selves^d. Indeed Reason plainly informs us, that whosoever hath a hearty Desire for his own Security must not, cannot neglect the Care of his Fellows. For, since our Safety and Happiness depend for the most Part on the Benevolence and on the Assistance of others, and since the Nature of Men is such, that for Benefits conferr'd they expect a Return of Kindness, and when no such Return is made, refrain from farther Favours: No Person in his Wits can stick so close to the Pursuit of his separate Advantage, as to divest himself of all Regard to the rest of the World: But rather the more rationally he loves himself, the more earnest he will be in endeavouring by good Turns to procure the Love of other Men. For no one hath any Reason at all to hope, that Men will voluntarily contribute towards advancing his Happiness, whom they know to be malicious, perfidious, ingrateful, and inhuman, and that these wicked Practices are the Requitals which he will make for their Bounty; on the contrary, it should be expected, that they will all join together in ridding the Earth of such a Monster, or, at least, in restraining him from doing farther Mischief.

XVII. Neither is the following Argument which the Hobbits make use of at all conclusive; "Particular Men when they join Society or Company with certain others, have Regard to some peculiar Good or Benefit, which is likely to redound to themselves: Therefore human Nature in general is not determin'd to Society, or, I am not oblig'd to behave my self in a social Manner towards him, from whom I do not expect some particular Advantage." For thus much indeed is evident, that the Reason why certain Men join in any certain Species of Society, is either because they have a peculiar Resemblance and Agreement in Disposition of Mind, or in other Qualities; or else because they think they shall better obtain some End which they drive at, amongst these Persons than amongst others. But (besides that, regularly speaking, no Man hath the Property of belonging to no particular Society) even amongst Men who are united only by the common Tie of Humanity, that general Sociableness and Peace are to be observ'd and cultivated; which implies little more than this, that they abstain from hurting one another unjustly, and that as far as their stricter and particular Obligations leave Room, they mutually promote and communicate their Interests and their Goods.

XVIII. Hence it is clear what Answer should be made to that Objection, if one Man lov'd another naturally, that is, upon account of his being a Man,

^a Self-Interest is a poor Centre of a Man's Actions, says my Lord Bacon, Ess. xxiii.

^b Vide Ciceron. Off. ii. Ch. xi.

^c Nec magis vituperandus est proditor patriæ, quam communis utilitatis aut salutis defensor, propter suam utilitatem, aut salutem. Cicero De Fin. Lib. iii. Ch. xix. "A Betrayer of his Country is not more foully scandalous, than he who deserts the common Benefit or Safety for the Procurement of his own."

^d Qui stadium currit, eniti contendere debet, quam maxime possit, ut vincat; supplantare eum, quicum certet, aut manu detellere, nullo modo debet. Sic in vita sibi quemque petere, quod pertineat ad usum, non iniquum est, alteri deripere jus non est. Chrysippus apud Ciceron. De Offic. Lib. iii. Chap. x. In running of a Course a Man may be allow'd, nay, he ought to stretch and contend his Utmost for the Victory: But he must not, on any Account, trip up his Antagonist's Heels, or thrust him out of the Lists by main Force. So in Life, it is very fair and allowable, for every Man to get, by honest Means, whatever makes for Use and Advantage; but 'tis by no Means lawful that he should take it away from others.

then there can be no Reason given, why every one should not love every one equally, all being equally Men: Or why a Man should choose to frequent their Company most, from whom he receives either greater Honour or greater Profit.

In this Fallacy, common Society is confounded with particular and stricter Confederacies, common Love, with such as arises from peculiar and singular Causes. For to deserve that common Affection, no Property is requir'd but barely the being a Man. Nature having, for the Reasons above assign'd, really constituted a general Friendship amongst Men, from which no Person is excluded, unless he hath rendred himself unworthy of it by his monstrous Villanies. Now, altho' by the good Disposal of the All-wise Creator, our Natural Laws are so fitted to human Condition, that the Observation of them is join'd with the Interest and Advantage of the Observers; so that even this common Love is exceedingly profitable to Mankind: Yet in assigning the Cause and Reason of it, we are wont to have Recourse, not to the Benefit proceeding from it, but to the general Nature in which it is founded. For Example, If we are to give a Reason why one Man ought not to hurt another, we do not usually say, because an abstaining from mutual Violence is profitable (altho it is so indeed in the highest Degree) but, because the Person being another Man, that is, another Animal related to us by Nature ¹, it would be a Crime to offer him any Harm ².

Yet besides this common and universal Affection, some Circumstances may make a Man love one Person in a higher Degree than another: Suppose, because their Inclinations particularly agree, and their Heads lie the same Way; or, because this Person is more able, or more willing to promote his Advantage; or, because their Race, or Original, makes them allied to each other. As to that Observation about Mens being more willing to frequent such Company, where they find themselves prefer'd to others in Honour and in Profit; the Reason of the Thing is this, because every one must naturally love his own Interest, if he have Wit enough to understand it. But this Love is by no Means repugnant to the sociable Nature of Mankind, if it doth not rise to such a guilty Height, as to disturb the Harmony and Agreement which is universally to be maintain'd amongst Men. For Providence did not for this Reason give us a sociable Nature, that we should therefore ³ neglect ourselves and our own Affairs. But rather we are studious of Society on this very Account, that by a mutual Communication of Assistance and of Goods, our own Concerns may be manag'd with more Conveniency, and with more Success. And altho' when a Man unites himself to any particular Society, he hath a prime Regard to his own Interest, and but a secondary one to the Interest of his Companions; not being able to carry on his own Matters without such a Conjunction; yet this doth not hinder him from being oblig'd so to pursue his own private Ends and Advantage, as not to injure either the Corporation in general, or any single Member of it, and sometimes to postpone his separate Good, for the Advancement of the common Benefit.

What is urged about the Original of great and lasting Societies, or States (it being said that they are not deriv'd from mutual Benevolence, but from mutual Fear; by which Word they mean any Kind of Precaution and Foresight) is entirely beside the Purpose. For as the Question doth not at present proceed about the Rise of Civil Society in general; so farther, it is highly agreeable to our natural Condition, that whereas single Persons, or a few join'd in Confederacy, might lie perpetually expos'd to the Insults of such Wretches as pursue their private Ends, without Regard to their Neighbours; many should unite in a Body, and so strengthen their Guard against farther Assaults and Mischiefs. Neither is it indeed absolutely necessary, to the proving any Society agreeable to Nature, to say that it arose entirely from mutual Benevolence. And yet even this Principle must be allowed some little Share at least, in the forming of States, since the Persons who first begin them are commonly join'd on the Account of Kindness and Good-liking, though many others may afterwards engage in the same Union, by the Inducement of Fear. But as for this Fear, which is look'd on as the Cement of States, as likewise for that Dispute, whether or no Man by Nature be ζῶον πολιτικόν, we shall examine them more at large when we come to enquire into the Rise and the Original of Commonwealths.

XIX. This Principle which we have establish'd for deducing the Law of Nature, as it is the most genuine and the most clear, so we take it to be in such a high Degree ⁴ adequate and sufficient, that there is no natural Obligation bearing a Regard to other Men, the Reason of which is not terminated here, as in the chief Head and Fountain of Duty. Yet, as we shall hereafter shew, to give these Dictates of Reason the Force and Authority of Laws, there is a Necessity of supposing that there is a GOD, and that his wise Providence oversees and governs the whole World, and in a particular Manner the Lives and the Affairs of ¹ Lucian in Amoribus, Tom. i. p. 893. Ed. Amst. We do not, like brute Creatures, affect solitary Meditations, but joining together in a friendly society, we make our Joys to be the greater, and our Afflictions the less, by being mutually communicated: And our Pleasures having many sharers in them, fill us with the truer Satisfaction and Delight. Dio Chrysostom, Orat. xii. tells us, that the Reason why Jupiter hath often the Title of φιλῶν and ἰκανῶν, The Kind and The Friendly, is, because he gathers, as it were, all Mankind into Unity and Society, and would have them prove Friends to each other, without the least Mixture of Hatred or Opposition. In like manner, says he, he is call'd ἡμιῶν, or hospitable, because we ought really to think no Man a Stranger to us.

Mankind. For we cannot by any Means subscribe to the Conjecture which ² Grotius starts, in his Prolegomena, or Introduction, N. XI. That the Laws of Nature would take Place, should we (as we cannot without the most horrid Impiety) deny either the Being of GOD, or his Concern in human Business. For, should any Wretch be so horribly senseless as to maintain that wicked and absurd Hypothesis in the rankest Way, and so hold Men to have deriv'd their Being wholly from themselves; according to them, the Edicts of Reason could not rise so high as to pass into a Condition of Laws; in as much as all Law supposes a superior Power. ³ 'Tis a good Observation of Tully, De Naturâ Deorum, Lib. ii. Chap. ii. I know not, says he, but that upon taking away Religion, and Piety towards the Gods, all Faith and Society of human Kind, and even the most excellent Virtue of Justice, must be banish'd the World ². Unless the Rules would be observ'd out of a bare Regard to Interest, as those are which the Physicians prescribe in the Regimen of Health. Grotius seems to have taken the Hint of that Notion from a Passage in Marcus Antoninus ^b; If, says the Emperor, the Gods do not consult about any of our Affairs, which the vilest Impiety can scarce believe; why then 'tis fit that I should consult or deliberate about my own Concerns: And all my Deliberation must be concerning what is most profitable for me. Now that is most profitable to every one, which best agrees with his Nature and Constitution. And my Nature is to be rational, and to be a sociable Member of some City or State. My City and Country, as I am Antoninus, is Rome, as I am a Man, is all the World: Those Things therefore which are profitable to these Communities, are the only Things which are good and expedient for me.

As to what a certain Learned Man objects, that

² Mr. De Courtin, the Translator of Grotius, explains these Words, but something obscurely, and seems also to mistake him; telling us, that he maintains, That Man's natural Light, without any Star of GOD, would carry a Man in a most efficacious Manner to seek Good and avoid Evil, by all Means possible, in Obedience to that Law only which Reason prescribes, and with the Execution of which Conscience is charged. I suspect that Grotius never designed to express himself with so much philosophical Exactness, and that there is little Rhetorick in that Passage, if the Sense being rightly understood, has that Meaning; That the Maxims of the Law of Nature are founded upon the Constitution of Mankind, and necessarily contributing to the Advantage of every one, will not cease to take Place, and be practis'd outwardly in some measure, although no Deity be acknowledged; but then they can't be looked upon as Duties, nor can be put in Practice, but upon the Account of some Interest or Vain-glory. Mr. Bayle goes much farther, and maintains, in his Considerations upon a Comet, pag. 554. That Reason, without any Knowledge of GOD, may sometimes persuade a Man, that a Thing is honest, and good, and commendable to be done, not for the Advantage coming by it, but because it is suitable to Reason. The famous Chancellor Bacon (whose Authority, no more than Grotius's, Mr. Bayle doth not take notice of) has delivered much the same Thing, in his Serm. Fidel. 117. where, making a Parallel between Superstition and Atheism, he reasons much after the same manner in his Consideration on a Comet, though more largely. My Design is not to examine Things thoroughly, and therefore I shall only make some short Reflexions. I own, that Religion is neither the only, nor principal Basis of Society; but then, in my Opinion, we must allow, 1. That the Notions of Honesty being stript of all Relation to the Will of GOD, the supreme Lawgiver, the Author of our Being, the Protector of Mankind, and of Society, are meer Chimera's, or meer barren Principles, pure Speculations, incapable of laying a Foundation for good Morality, or to produce solid Virtue. If we look upon the Atheist (says Mr. Bayle himself) in the Disposition of his Mind, we shall find that he, not being aw'd by any Fears of Punishment, nor encouraged with the Hopes of GOD's Blessing, must resign himself to the Government of his Passions. 2. That, so far as we can judge by Conjecture, a Society of Atheists, all Things else being equal, would be more corrupt, and subject to more Disorders, than any of those who retain some Principles of Religion, although imperfect and incoherent. I say, All Things else being equal. For it would be ridiculous, to compare, for Example, a polite and well-instructed People with a savage Nation, who have not Sense enough to do any Evil. We must besides, if we will exactly distinguish the Effects proper to Atheism, and a good or bad Religion, suppose the Persons so compared together, to be very near furnished with the same Notions, and to be in the same Situation, and under the same Circumstances in general, otherwise we shall be in Danger of attributing to Religion, what really proceeds from Nature, Education, Custom, or the like; which Religion is very little or nothing conducing to; or we may accuse Religion of Impotency, by reason of some invincible Obstacles in them, upon whom it would not fail to produce its Effect, were it not that they are ignorant of the most necessary Point. Upon this Foot I maintain, that Religion, tho' corrupted, would produce better Effects than Atheism, that it would disturb Society less, and that the Good it would do, would be much greater than the Evil it would cause. I will not deny, but there may be amongst these Atheists, Men of Sense and Philosophers, who, reflecting that it is better for Men to subject themselves to certain Rules of Life, than for every Man to follow his Humours only, may observe them outwardly, so far as they are exempt from such Circumstances, as some great Interest present, or some violent Passion forces them upon, such Counsels as are reasonable, calm and aware of the Consequences. But the common Sort of ignorant People, and Idiots, which make up the greatest Part of Society, are not able to make such Reflections. To curb in therefore the Violence of their Passions, and to outweigh Mens private Interests, which often clash with the publick Good, some more obvious Principle, which all the World may be sensible of, and which may make the deepest Impressions upon them, must be found out, and that, in a Word, can be no other than the Fear of a Deity. Experience sufficiently confirms this, that in all Times this Motive has had great Influences upon the Mind of Man; for who knows not, that in the darkest Times of Paganism, it was the Cause of Honesty in many Nations? Mr. Bayle proves at large, That Men did not always act according to their Principles, and so it might well happen, that many Pagans did not perceive nor draw the Consequences which followed from the false Notions which they had of the Deity. 'Tis certain, that not only the Philosophers, but the Vulgar looked upon the Gods as the Revengers of the Violation of the Laws of Nature. See what is said in the next Chap. §. 3. Note 4. Since then there are among Atheists the same Principles of Disorder, as among Pagans, from which no Man can be restrained but by Religion, it seems plain that Vice must reign with much less Controul and Extent in the Society of Atheists, than in a religious one, altho' their Worship be false and croneous. It may be, perhaps, pretended, that the want of this Restraint is made up by the Disorders created in religious Societies, by Superstition and false Zeal; and I own, that these Inconveniences, which arise from the Abuse of Religion, are great; but the Disbelief of a Deity would produce much greater. As much as the Notions of Religion are perverted, and though they are made use of as an Occasion or Pretence of confirming or engaging many Persons in the Commission of Crimes, yet they fail not to discourage and deter others, and those of a much greater Number. The Notion of a GOD, and of an invisible Judge, who will punish Vice and reward Virtue, are naturally so fast linked together, that the most simple have a Sense of it, notwithstanding their other false superstitious Ideas, as appears from the Example of the Pagans. But, as much as Atheism pleases some Men, as the more pure State, nothing but pernicious Consequences can be drawn from it, tending directly to the greatest Looseness and Debauchery; Consequences which are clear to the Sight of all the World, and can't but bring Destruction to a Society, which is composed of Men endowed with such irreligious Principles. If the Nations which are so barbarous as to have no Religion, be objected, besides that the Histories which give an Account of them are contradicted by more modern and faithful Relations, these People are either not formed into any Society, or are so illiterate and stupid, as there is little Difference between them and the Beasts, as the ingenious Writer of the Rights of the Christian Church, has very well observed in his Preface, §. 18. See also Lib. i. Chap. vi. §. 13. Note 7. foregoing, and Chap. iv. §. 3. Note 4. of this Book following.

³ Tully's Words are these, Atque haud scio, an Pietate adversus Deos sublata, fides etiam & societatis humani generis, & una excellentissima virtus, justitia tollatur. See also Libanius, Declam. iii. p. 250 particularly the Virtue of Fortitude, cannot be demonstrated from our Principle, unless we farther suppose the Immortality of the Soul; since otherwise there would be no Reward to a Man who should throw away his Life on a good Cause: This will require no great Pains to answer. For altho' really to deny, or so much as to call in Question so certain a Truth be extremely impious; yet without bringing this high Point into the Argument, it is possible to demonstrate, that a Soldier may fairly be commanded to fight to Death, in the Behalf of his Country. For, besides that, there appears yet no clear Reason why we must sacrifice, as it were, every good Action to some external Reward; thus much is univ'rsally agreed on, that 'tis in the Power of the Sovereign to arm the Subjects, and to lead them out against the Enemy, in Defence of the State; and farther, when they find it requisite to forbid every one under Pain of capital Punishment, to quit his Station by Flight. Now of two Evils the lesser is most certainly to be chose. But it is a less Evil to fight with extraordinary Danger, and even to the last Breath, than to suffer unavoidable Death for running away. And therefore that Soldier must be the greatest Fool, as well as the greatest Coward, who would not choose rather to fall honourably by the Enemy's Hand, having first anticipated his own Revenge, than to deliver up himself to be ignominiously dispatch'd by the Executioner ⁴. It seems sufficient that a Man fight with all his Force and Ability, let his Inducement to this Behaviour be what it will. Nor is it requisite to the Preservation of States, or of Society amongst Men in general, that every particular Person should be induc'd with such a Firmness of Mind, as the Terrors of Death cannot shake or overcome; all Souls not being capable of this noble Pitch of Valour. Besides, the Use of Fortitude doth not only discover itself in bearing Death undauntedly upon extreme Occasion; but is chiefly employ'd in vigorously withstanding, and in driving off the Danger of Death, as it presses on us. Many Difficulties are not otherwise to be avoided, than by undergoing others of almost equal Hazard ⁵: And Fate sooner overtakes the Coward, than it masters the Valiant. It is farther observable, that setting aside the Supposition of the ⁶ Soul's Immortality, it doth by no Means appear that the chief End and Happiness of Man ⁷ consists in Pleasure. For besides that in the Doctrine of natural Law, treated of in this Manner, the Immortality of the Soul is by no Means denied, but only abstracted from; it's plain that the Pleasure of the Body, in which Epicurus is vulgarly thought to have plac'd his Summum Bonum, is so far from promoting, that it rather contradicts and hinders the Preservation, the Sociableness, the Peace, and the Tranquillity of Mankind. But the Genius and the Scope of Christianity differs vastly from these meer natural Schemes; and the holy Apostle had good Reason to affirm ⁸, that if in this Life only we had Hope in Christ, we should be of all Men the most miserable. 1 Cor. xv. 19.

XX. But to make these Dictates of Reason obtain the Power and the Dignity of Laws, it is necessary to call in a much higher Principle to our Assistance. For altho' the Usefulness and Expediency of them be clearly apparent, yet this bare Consideration could never bring so strong a Tie on Mens Minds, but that they would recede from these Rules, whenever a Man was pleas'd either to neglect his own Advantage, or to pursue it by some different Means, which he judg'd more proper, and more likely to succeed. Neither can the Will of any Person be so strongly bound by his own bare Resolution, as to hinder him from acting quite contrary, whenever the Humour takes him. And altho' we should suppose many Persons standing in a natural Liberty, and combining to keep these Precepts, yet the Force of them could then last no longer, than the Agreement from whence they deriv'd it. Nor would the Obligation then only cease, when all the consenting Parties should please to alter their Minds (as is now the Manner of receding from mutual Covenants by common Consent) but even during the general Agreement, the Power of obliging would be wanting to the Compact: Inasmuch as we suppose, that Dictate of Reason which commands us to stand to our Bargains and Promises, not yet to have obtain'd the Authority of a Law; and therefore 'tis at every one's Pleasure to renounce the Covenant, whether the other Persons concern'd are willing, or not. Lastly, the meer Force of human Command seems insufficient to invest these Dictates with the Power of Obligation. For since no such Command could take Place otherwise than by the Intervention of Covenants, and since Covenants owe all their Strength to some Law, it doth not appear how there could arise any human Sovereignty capable of Obligations, unless the Dictates of Reason were before-hand receiv'd for Laws. Or should we grant the Fantasy of some, that human Government depends only on human Consent, and then make these rational Duties be enjoin'd the Subjects like other Laws; yet even thus they would obtain no more Power than positive Constitutions, which depend on the Will of the Legislator, both as to their Original and their Duration ². It is therefore on all Accounts to be concluded and to be maintain'd, that the Obliga-

⁵ All that the Author says here is true; but we must also declare, that the most effectual Motive to lessen the Fears of Death, and make us out-face, as I may say, the Dangers, which the Defence of a good Cause engages us in, is the Hopes of another Life, and the Prospect of the Reward which shall be given to good Men; the Courage produced by any other Principle is but a false Bravery, in Comparison of the Undauntedness which naturally follows that Persuasion, when it is strong, and the Idea of it is vigorously impress'd on the Mind. tion of natural Law proceeds from GOD himself, the great Creator and supreme Governor of Mankind; who by Virtue of his Sovereignty hath bound Men to the Observation of it. And thus much may be demonstrat'd by the sole Light of natural Reason. Here then we lay it down as a granted Truth, that GOD Almighty is the Creator and Governor of the World, since it hath been shewn with so much Evidence by wise and learned Men, and since no Person of Sense and Understanding ever call'd it in Question ^r. Now this supreme Being having so form'd and dispos'd the Nature of Things and of Mankind, as to make a sociable Life necessary to our Subsistence and Preservation; and having on this Account indued us with a Mind capable of entertaining such Notions as conduce to this End, and having insinuated these Notions into our Understandings by the Movement of natural Things, deriv'd from him the first Mover; and likewise most clearly represented to us their necessary Connexion and their Truth: Hence it follows, that it is the Will of GOD, Man should frame his Life according to that Disposition and Method which he seems peculiarly to have assign'd him above the Life of Brutes. And since this cannot otherwise be achiev'd and compass'd, than by the Observance of natural Law, it must be suppos'd that GOD hath laid an Obligation on Man to obey this Law, as a Means not arising from human Invention, or changeable at human Pleasure, but expressly ordain'd by GOD himself for the Accomplishment of this Design. For when any Sovereign enjoins his Subject the Pursuit of such an End, he is at the same Time suppos'd to oblige him to make use of those Means, without which the End cannot be attain'd ². Nor is this the only Proof of Man's being oblig'd to a social Life by the Command of GOD, that, as the Condition of Mankind stands at present, we could not support and secure ourselves, unless this Persuasion were firmly rooted in our Minds; and that by Order of the divine Providence it so falls out, that by a natural Consequence our Happiness flows from such Actions as are agreeable to the Law of Nature, and our Misery from such as are repugnant to it: But it is farther confirm'd by this Consideration, that in no other Animal there is discoverable any Sense of Religion, or any Fear of a Deity ^b ^r. To which may be added, that tender Sense of Conscience inherent in the Minds of Men that are not corrupted and debauched with Vice; by which they are convinc'd, that to sin against Nature's Law, is to offend him, who hath a sovereign Power over Mens Souls, and who is to be fear'd, even when we do not apprehend any Danger from human Punishment ^c.

The Laws of Nature would have a full and perfect Power of binding Men, altho' GOD Almighty had never propos'd them anew in his reveal'd Word. For Man was under Obligation to obey his Creator, by what Means soever he was pleas'd to convey to him the Knowledge of his Will. Nor was there any absolute Necessity of a particular Revelation to make a rational Creature sensible of his Subjection to the supreme Author and Governor of Things. No one will deny but that those Persons who were not acquainted with the holy Scriptures, did yet sin against the Law of Nature: Which we could not affirm, did this Law derive its Force from the Promulgation made of it in the sacred Writings. On this Account we can by no Means admit of that Notion started by Hobbes ^d, Since those Laws, says he, which we call natural, are nothing else but certain Conclusions apprehended by Reason, concerning Things to be done and Things to be omitted; and since Law, in a proper Sense, is only the Speech of him, who by Virtue of his Right commands Men to execute or to abstain from some Performances; therefore they are not Laws as they proceed from Nature, but only as they are enacted by GOD in Scripture. For we do not take it to be essential to a Law, that it be conveyed to the Subjects Notice in the Form and Manner of a Proposition; but we reckon it sufficient that the Will of the Sovereign be gather'd and understood any way, whether by internal Suggestion of the Mind, or from the Contemplation of our State and Condition, and of the Nature of those Affairs and Transactions which are to engage our Life. And indeed he himself acknowledges as much, in another Part of the same Work ^e, where he observes, that the Laws of GOD are declar'd three ways; first by the tacit Dictates of right Reason, &c. Besides, the Laws of Nature, as they are deduc'd by Ratiocination, cannot be apprehended otherwise than in the Manner of Propositions, and therefore in this Respect they may be allow'd to bear that Name. But as in Civil Laws it matters not, whether they be promulgated in Writing, or

² *Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἄνθρωπος θείας μετέχει μοίρας, πρῶτον μὲν δια τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ συγγενείας. ζῶν μόνον θεῶς ἐόντα σὲ, καὶ ἐπιχειροῦσθαι βαρῆς τε ἰσχυροῦσθαι. καὶ ἀγαλλόμενα θεῶν. i. e. "Man is the only one of all the Creatures, who by reason of the Relation which he has to the divine Being, thinks that there are Gods, and erecteth Altars and Images to them. viva voce 3, so the divine Law is of equal Obligation, whether it is discover'd to Men either by GOD himself in a visible Shape, and with the Resemblance of a human Voice, or by holy Men, peculiarly inspir'd from Heaven; or whether, lastly, it be work'd out by natural Reason, from the Contemplation of human Condition. For Reason, properly speaking, is not the Law of Nature itself, but the Means, upon a right Application of which that Law is to be discover'd. Nor doth the Manner and the Method of promulgating a Law belong to its inward Essence and Constitution. Farther, altho' it seem a more clear and a more compendious Way of revealing one's Will to another, to force it upon his Senses by express Words and Speeches; yet that is likewise reckon'd to be sufficiently reveal'd, which we must unavoidably discover, if we make use of the Occasion offer'd, and keep the Way that we are put into. And thus Man, who, by the Bounty of his Creator, enjoys the Faculty of comprehending both his own and other Mens Actions, and of judging whether or no they are agreeable to human Nature, cannot but take Occasion (supposing there are more Men in the World besides himself) to observe and consider how some of those Actions do really thus agree to the Inclination and to the Condition of Mankind 3.

Although to render a Law obligatory there is a Necessity of making it known to the Subject; and altho' to deduce the Law of Nature from the Suggestions of Reason, and to apprehend its Foundation, and its necessary Connexion with the State of Humanity, be not the Gift of every Person; yet hence it can neither be pretended, that this Law doth not oblige all Men, or that it may not be said to be known by the Light of Reason. For to give a Law a binding Force, a popular and simple Knowledge is sufficient; nor is an artificial Demonstration and Deduction absolutely requisite to this Purpose. And altho' 'tis 4 very probable that the chief Heads of natural Law were expressly deliver'd by GOD Almighty to the first Mortals, and were from them communicated to others by Custom and Institution; yet the Knowledge of that Law may nevertheless be stil'd natural, inasmuch as the necessary Truth and Certainty of it may be drawn from the Use of natural Reason. At the same Time, because those Propositions which represent to us the Law of Nature, are insinuated into Mens Minds from the Contemplation of the Nature of Things; on that Account they are justly attributed and referr'd to GOD, the Author of Nature 5.

The wisest of the old Heathens acknowledg'd the Authority of natural Law, and deriv'd it rightly from GOD. Thus Plutarch 6 Γαυρῶν ἐξ τὸ ἐπειθεῖν θεῶν, καὶ τὸ πείθεσθαι λόγῳ: To follow GOD and to obey Reason is the same Thing. But Tully hath left the most noble Testimony for our Purpose, as it is cited out of his Books De Republica by Laſtantius 7: 8 There is indeed, says he, a Law agreeable to Nature, and no other than right Reason, made known to all Men, constant and perpetual; which calls us to Duty by Commands, and deters us from Sin by Threats; and whose Commands and Threats are neither of them in vain to the Good, though they may seem of little Force to the Wicked. This Law we are neither allow'd to disannul, nor to diminish; nor is it possible it should be totally revers'd; the Senate or the People cannot free us from its Authority. Nor do we need any other Explainer or Interpreter of it besides ourselves. Nor will it be different at Rome and at Athens, now and hereafter; but will eternally and unchangably affect all Persons in all Places: GOD himself appearing the universal Master, the universal King. 'Tis he who is the Inventor; the Expounder, the Enacter of this Law; which whosoever shall refuse to obey, shall fly and loath his own Person, and renounce his Title to Humanity; and shall thus undergo the severest Penalties, though he escape every thing else which falls under our common Name and Notion of Punishment. Sophocles speaks very honourably on the same Subject in his first Oedipus, Act 3d, p. 187. Ed. H. Steph.

————— The lofty Laws

Mr. Selden, in his Discussion of this Point, hath shewn 9, that although the Gentiles did acknowledge the chief Heads of natural Law to be sometimes violated through the corrupt Manners of Men, and to be (as it were) oppress'd and stifled by wicked Ordinances and Constitutions; yet they were at the same Time fully persuad'd that their τὸ ἀυτοδικαιοῖν, or what was really just and fit to be done, did by Order of the Gods perpetually remain the same, and hold the same Force of Obligation. Whence arose that common Opinion amongst them of the Punishment of wicked Men in another State; when they had been guilty of any monstrous Offences against the Law of Nature. And since they thus believ'd the Gods to be the Avengers of its Violation, we may take it for granted, that they thought them too the Authors and Founders of its Authority. On the other Hand, such of them as had any Sense of any Virtue, did as fairly suppose, that good Men exercising Piety, never fail'd of the peculiar Countenance and Consideration of Heaven. ⁷ Thus Jamblichus ^a, We must take this therefore for a certain Truth, that nothing properly evil shall happen to a good Man, either in this Life, or after it. Nor are the Affairs and Concerns of such a Person neglected by the immortal Deities. And Euripides ^b says, Good Men do at last obtain what their Virtue hath deserv'd: But evil Men shall never arrive at any tolerable Degree of Happiness. But Mr. Selden farther shews ^c it to have been a constant Opinion amongst the Primitive Christians, that in the Interval betwixt the Creation and the Publication of the Decalogue, those natural and universal Laws were given to Mankind, which were afterwards inserted in the Mosaical Constitutions. Hence was drawn that most excellent Observation of St. Chrysostom ^d, that to the Commandments about the honouring of Parents, about Murder, about Adultery, and about Theft, GOD was therefore pleas'd to add no Reason, because those Duties were already well known and understood, as being main Points of the natural Law; whereas to the Ordinance concerning the Sabbath-day, a Reason of the Precept was designedly affix'd, upon account of its being positive and arbitrary ^e. To conclude, all Legislators have believ'd that their Laws, of what kind soever, would derive the greatest Strength and Authority from the Succours of Religion: As appears from their solemn Custom of ushering in all their Constitutions with the Worship of the Gods ^f.

10 Cicero's Words are, Est quidem vera lex, recta ratio, natura congruens, diffusa in omnes, constans, sempiterna, quæ vocet ad officium jubendo, vetando a fraude deterreat: quæ tamen neque probos frustra jubet, aut vetat; nec improbos jubendo aut vetando movet. Huic legi nec obrogari fas est; nec derogari ex hac aliquid licet; neque tota abrogari potest. Nec vero aut per senatum, aut per populum solvi hæc lege possumus: neque est quaerendus explanator, aut interpret ejus alius. Nec enim alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac; sed & omnes gentes, & omni tempore, una lex, & sempiterna, & immutabilis continebit; unusque erit communis quasi magister & imperator omnium Deus, ille legis hujus inventor, disceptator, lator: cui qui non parebit, ipse se fugiet, ac naturam hominis aspernabitur; atque hoc ipso luet maximas pœnas, etiamsi cetera supplicia, quæ putantur, effugerit.

XXI. It is well worth our while to treat more distinctly and more carefully concerning the Sanction of the Law of Nature. And to this Purpose, besides what we have formerly deliver'd about the Sanction of Laws in general, we will first of all observe, that the Goods and Evils which happen to Man, may be both divided into three Ranks or Classes. And as for the Goods, some of them proceed, either from the free and liberal Donation of the Creator, or from the voluntary Benevolence of other Men, or from the Industry of the Acquirers, to which Industry they determin'd themselves by their own free Choice. And it is plain, that this first Sort are not owing to the Observation of the Laws. Other Goods there are, which flow, by a natural Consequence, from some Actions which the Laws command: The Creator having been pleas'd to assign to such and such Performances of the Laws such perpetual and natural Effects, productive of the Good and Profit of Mankind. And these are those which Dr. Cumberland calls natural Rewards. A third Kind of Goods proceed from some certain Actions, either by the Pleasure of the Legislator, or by the Covenant and Agreement of Men; of which the former are call'd, κατ' ἔξοχην, Rewards, or arbitrary Returns, the latter more properly Wages. In the same Manner may Evils be divided. Some of them follow the very Nature and Condition of Men (if we abstract the first Cause and Original of that Condition) or they happen without the particular Default of him who suffers them. Which we may, in a sound Sense, call fatal Evils, opposing the Word Fate, not to the divine Disposal, but to the peculiar Faultiness of the Person on whom these Evils light. Others do, by natural Consequence and Connexion, proceed from Sins; which are by some Authors term'd natural Punishments. Lastly, others there are which arise from Sins, by the peculiar Determination and Disposal of the Legislator beyond the Manner of natural Effects: In which the Quality, the Manner, the Place and Time of the Evil depend on the Legislator's free Pleasure. And these are what we would properly call Punishments, or (in a looser Sense of the Word) arbitrary Punishments.

Thus much being premis'd, we proceed to remark, that altho' the omnipotent Creator might by Virtue of his Sovereign Right have requir'd our Obedience, without making any good Fruit proceed thence to our own Advantage; yet it hath pleas'd his infinite Goodness, so to order and constitute the Nature of Things and of Mankind, that by a kind of natural Connexion some Goods should attend the Observance, and some Evils the Transgression of Nature's Laws. Thus a constant Obedience is follow'd by ¹ Serenity and Security of Conscience, join'd with a good and certain Assurance; by a good Frame and a settled Tranquillity of Mind ²; by the Preservation of the Body from many Evils, not fatal: Besides an infinite Number of Advantages, which may be obtain'd by the mutual Benevolence and good Offices of other Men * 2. On the other hand, from the Violation of the same Laws arise, by a natural Connexion, Disquiet of Conscience, Disturbance and Degeneracy of Mind, Destruction of the Body, and numberless Evils, which may be occasion'd by the withdrawing of other Mens Assistance, or by the Violence of their provok'd Revenge 3 b.

⁷ Jamblichus's Greek is, "Εν τῷ ἐν τῷ τῷ Διόδοτῳ δὲ ἀληθές, ὅτι ἐκ ἕσται ἀνδρὶ ἀγαθῷ κακὸν εἶναι, ἢ το ζῶντι, ἢ το τελευτήσαντι, ἢ δὲ ἀπολλύμεναι ὑπο θείων τὰ τετα πράγματι. These very Words Plato also makes Socrates to speak, at the End of his Apology, p. 41. and Cicero has translated them, Tusc. Quest. Lib. i. Chap. xli. Euripides's Words also are,

§. XXI. ¹ "It is certain (says Montagne) I know not how to express the Satisfaction that we enjoy in ourselves by well-doing, nor the generous Bravery that accompanies a good Conscience. A Soul courageously vicious may provide for its Security at all Adventures, but it can't have the Pleasure and Satisfaction. 'Tis none of the least Comforts, that it finds itself free from the Intention of a corrupt Age, and can say in itself, If any Man could look into my Breast, he should not find me guilty of troubling or ruining any Man, neither of Revenge, nor Envy, nor Breach of the publick Laws, nor of Disselsin, nor Disturbance, nor ill Language; and tho' the Licentiousness of the Time allows and instructs, yet I have not put my Hands to the Goods or Purse of any Man, nor eat of any Man's Bread but my own, either in War or Peace, nor made use of any Man's Labour without Wages. These Testimonies of Conscience are pleasing, and 'tis our Benefit that this Comfort is natural, and the Reward which we can never want. To expect the Reward of virtuous Actions from the Commendation of Men, is an uncertain and troublesome Foundation." Essays, Lib. iii. Chap. ii. p. 596.

Now altho' these Rewards, and these Punishments, are by some imagin'd not to proceed with Certainty enough from good and evil Actions; because many Persons in Return for Benefits receive only Hatred, Envy, or Injury; whilst others on the contrary do securely enjoy the Fruits of their Wickedness, without Molestation or Punishment; whence we cannot be infallibly assur'd before-hand that our good Deeds will be equally repaid by other Men (tho the Fruit which arises in ourselves from such honest Practices is not capable of Hindrance or of Interruption) yet thus much is beyond Dispute, that more Advantages most surely and certainly follow from good and just Proceedings, than we can in Reason expect from the opposite Vices c. And altho' the whole Train of those Goods do not attend on such a conscientious Behaviour, as in the Nature of Things they were dispos'd to do 4, yet we have a fair Probability that many of them will not disappoint us; at least, that we shall obtain a greater Share than we could have hop'd for from a Course of Dishonesty and Wickedness. And so by this Means we provide much better for our own Security, and have much fairer Grounds to hope that others will, in their Turn, be alike ready to promote our Interests and Concerns, than if, laying aside all Regard to our Neighbours, we directed every Thing towards our own private Advantage; and therefore infinitely better than if, by the Exercise of Violence or of Deceit, we endeavour'd to make our own Gains and Profits out of

* Seneca De Ira Lib. ii. Ch. xiii. calls the unmov'd Tranquillity of a happy Mind, A great Reward. Idem Ibid. The Way to Happiness is plain and easy. For what can be more comfortable to the Mind than Calmness? What more troublesome than Passion? What more at rest than Clemency? What so full of Business as Cruelty? Modesty and Chastity enjoy a perfect Leisure, whilst Lust is ever tir'd with laborious Pursuits. * Seneca's Words are, Quos tantum premium expectat felicitis animi immota tranquillitas. Nec, ut quibusdam dictum est, arduum in virtutes & asperum iter est; plano adestur. Non vane vobis auctor rei venio. Facilis est ad beatam vitam via, inire modo bonis auspiciis, ipsisque diis bene juvantibus. Multo difficilius est, facere ista quæ factis. Quid enim quiete otiosius est animi, quid ira laboriosius? quid clementiæ remissius, quid crudelitate negotiosius? Vacat pudicitia, libido occupatissima est; omnium denique virtutum tutela facilior est, vitia magno coluntur. We may add to this Montague's Meditation, Essay, Lib. i. Chap. xxv. "Virtue is not, as the Schools speak, placed on the Top of a two-headed Mountain, rough, and not to be ascended. They that pursue it may attain it. On the Reverse, she has her Abode in a fine fertile and pleasant Plain, from whence she beholds all Things below her; and if we labour to find her, our Way lies through shady and green Roads, sweet, flourishing, and pleasant; of an easy and smooth Ascent, like that of the Celestial Vaults. The Price and Excellency of Virtue consists in the Ease, Pleasure, and Profit of the Practice. The Difficulty is so little, that an Infant may exercise it as well as a Man, and the Simple as well as the Wise. The Rule is its chief Instrument, and not Force. Socrates her first Favourite, willingly left his Business to glide along in Ease and Activity in her Paths. She is the nursing Mother of all Pleasures, she makes them suitable, and renders them sure and safe, and moderating them keeps us in Breath and Appetite. Abridging us of what she refuses, she makes us more eager of what she allows us, and she allows us all Things that are suitable to our Nature plentifully, to Satiety, at least, if not to Weariness, like an indulgent Mother, unless we will say that a Regimen of Sobriety and Temperance is an Enemy to Pleasure. If a common Fortune befalls it, she can make her Escape, or pass through it, and make another, not more fleeting and transitory. She knows how to be rich and powerful, and lie in Beds of Roses. She loves Life, Beauty, Fame, and Health, but her peculiar Office is to teach us to use our Goods regularly, and to spend them freely; an Office more noble than severe, without which the whole Course of our Lives is churlish, turbulent, and detormed, and can we do less than confine these Rocks, Thickets, and Monsters?" See also Mar. Antonin. Lib. v. §. 9.

* That is not Vice, really Vice, which offends not, and in a true Judgment does not accuse. For there is such an apparent Deformity and Inconvenience in it, that they speak with Reason who say, that it is principally produced by Bestiality and Ignorance, so hard is it to know it, and not hate it. Malice sucks up the greatest Part of the Venom, and poisons it. Vice leaves an Ulcer in the Flesh, and Repentance in the Soul, which always tears and wounds itself; for tho' Reason extinguishes almost all other Grievs and Sorrows, yet it begets Repentance, which is so much the more grievous, because it is bred within, as the Cold and Heat that affects the Sinews is always more sharp than that which outwardly affects. Montague, Lib. iii. Chap. ii. I could not forbear copying out these fine Thoughts, of which Seneca also hath one, Epist. lxxxi. Quemadmodum Attalus noster dicere solebat, Malitia ipsa maximam partem veneni sui bibit.

* A Passage of Isocrates in Orat. De Permutat. is worth our Notice here, where he says, Θαυμάζω δ' εἰ τις αἰετὸς τῶν ἐπιπέδων καὶ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἀσκησάτω, καὶ κατὰ τὴν καὶ μὴ ἐν ταῖς ἐπιπέδων, ἐλαττον ἔξω τῆς πομπῆς ἀλλ' ἐξ ἡγεμονίας [for so it should be read, and not ἡγεμονίας] καὶ παραθεσῶν, καὶ παρα ἀνθρώποις πλεονεκτήσῃ ἄλλαν, ἐν δὲ ἡδ' εἶναι, τῶν μόνων, ἃν δὲ πλεονεκτήσῃ, τῶν ἄλλων εἰς ἡγεμονίαν ἐδὲν ἂν βέλτερον εἴη. ὅσα ἢ τῶν μὴ τὴν ἀδικίαν προτιμάσας, καὶ τὸ λαοῦ τι τῶν ἀποστρίων μεγαλοῦ ἀγαθὸν νομιζόντας, ἔμοιρα πάσχοντας τοῖς ἀδικησασίαις τῶν ζῶων, καὶ καταστρέφας ἢ ἀπολαύσοντας ἂν ἂν λάσασιν ἐλπίω δ' ὕστερον ἐν ταῖς μεγάλοις κακοῖς ὄντα. τῶν ἢ μὲν εὐσεβείας, καὶ δικαιοσύνης ζῶντας, εἰ τε ταῖς παρθεῖ χρόνοις ἀσφαλῶς διαγοῦντας, καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν συμπατοῦν αἰῶν ἡδὲ τῶν ἐλπίδων ἔχοντας, καὶ ταῦτ' εἰ μὴ κατὰ πάντων ἔσται εὐδαιμονία, ἀλλὰ τὸ γ' ἄς ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺν τῶτο γίγῃ τ' ἄριστον, καὶ ἢ τῶν ἐν φρονήσας, ἐπιπέδον τὸ μέγαν αἰετὸν ἀσκησάτω καὶ κατὰ τὴν, το πολλαῖς ἀφελῶν τῶτο φαίνοσθαι προαιεμονίας. Πάντων δ' ἀλογάταστον πεποιθασιν, ὅσα κίχλιον ἢ ἐπιπέδον μὴ νομιζόντων εἶναι, καὶ θεοφιλέστερον, τὴν δικαιοσύνην τῶν ἀδικίας; καὶ ἢ δ' εἶον τῶν βίωσας τῶν ταυτῆ ἡγεμονίας, τῶν τὴν πομπῆν προτιμάσας. Which is thus Englished, "I wonder that any one can be persuaded, that they who apply themselves constantly to Piety and Justice should think themselves more unhappy than Sinners, and don't promise themselves more Advantages both from GOD and Man. As for me, I believe that only good Men enjoy most plentifully what is worth seeking, and Sinners, on the contrary, know not their own true Interests. For whoever prefers Injustice before Justice, and supposes his chief Happiness to consist in extorting other Mens Goods from them, is, in my Judgment, like the Beasts that bite at an Hook, who are pleas'd at first with the Sweetness of the Bait, but soon after find themselves embroiled in very great Troubles. But, on the other Hand, they that apply themselves to Piety and Justice, are not only in Safety for the present, but meet with agreeable Hopes, that all their Life shall be happy. I own, this does not always happen, but Experience verifies it to be true for the most part. Now in all Things wherein we can't infallibly foresee the Success, a wise Man will choofe that Side which commonly proves most advantageous. But nothing is more unreasonable than their Opinion, who believe that Justice is something fine and more agreeable to the Nature of the Gods than Injustice, and yet imagine, that they who apply themselves to the first, shall be more unhappy than those who give themselves up to the latter."

the Losses of other Men. By this way of reckoning therefore it appears, that the Value of that Reward which will follow upon a good Action, doth, all Things rightly consider'd, exceed the Gain of the opposite illegal Practice.

We desire it should be well observ'd, that whilst we are here treating about the natural Effects of good and of evil Actions, we do not by any Means reckon amongst these Effects those kind of Goods which we but now rank'd in the first Class, and which our own Prudence and Industry either cannot obtain, or cannot avoid. Such Things both may, and generally do happen alike to virtuous and to vicious Men. Thus a wicked Person may, by the Gift of Nature, possess a vigorous and a healthy Body, while perhaps a Man of Honesty and Piety labours under a weak and crazy Constitution. And thus Death lays hold promiscuously on the Just and on the Vile. But the only Goods we here allude to, are such as it is in the Power of human Reason to provide for us; and which do therefore, in some measure, depend upon our own Act. Now altho' some Part of those Goods which we intend by the Observance of the Law of Nature to obtain from other Men, has a Dependence on their Kindness and on their Probity, and so is not absolutely in our own Power; yet, for as much as in all Probability, they have the same End and Design with our selves, we have at least fair Reason to hope for and to expect such good Usage and Retribution from them, tho' we cannot give ourselves an infallible Assurance of it, before it comes. Scarce any Man hath met with so many Enemies in the World, as not to own himself indebted to some Benefactors. And we see that the Evils which Men procure to one another, have never been able to prevail to the utter Ruin and Destruction of human Race: Which is a plain Evidence, that good Actions have oftner attain'd their just End and Reward, than they have fail'd and been disappointed of it. On the other side, altho' a Person who neglects or disobeys the Law of Nature, may sometimes, by an unaccountable Concourse of external Causes, receive a whole Flood of Goods and Benefits from other Men; yet because in this Case those Effects are, with regard to him, meerly contingent, and do very seldom fall out in such a Manner, we may conclude, that Nature and Reason did not prescribe, much less command the Means by which he attain'd, only casually, to such an End. Reason, on the contrary, most clearly shews us, that we take a much more probable Way to Happiness, by acting on a settled Design, and by applying the best Means we can to the gaining of our Purpose, than if we should throw aside all Counsel and Forecast, and permit ourselves to be driven at random by the blind Guidance of Chance. But this Point is indeed as clear as any Thing in Nature, and hath been made out to full Advantage by Dr. Cumberland.

There remains therefore this only Question farther, whether or no besides the natural Effects of evil Actions, and besides those which arise from the Sanction of Civil Laws, there are still others in reserve appointed by GOD's free Pleasure, and to be inflicted by Virtue of his Sovereign Prerogative; or whether GOD hath not added to the Sanction of the Laws of Nature some arbitrary Punishment: Especially since it is apparent, that the natural Consequences and Effects of evil Actions are frequently interrupted, and that the Wickedness of many Men seems to turn to their Gain and Advantage. Now what the Scripture hath declar'd in this Matter, is plain, and beyond all Dispute. But waving that Authority, the affirmative Side of the Question may be defended from several Considerations: As from that most antient and most universal Tradition, concerning a certain revenging Divinity⁶, and the Pains after Death. Of which Opinion we have two fair Instances in the Cases of Jonas and of St. Paul (Jonas i. 7. Acts xxviii. 1. &c.) for there being no natural Connexion and Consequence, either between Jonas's Crime and the Tempest, or between the Fact of Murder and the biting of the Viper, the People who were present at both Accidents, immediately suppos'd that GOD Almighty did thus extraordinarily interpose his Hand to punish some heinous Wickedness⁷. Moreover, it being most certain, that it is the divine Pleasure those Laws should be obey'd, and not less manifest, that the natural Effects of them may be (partly at least) eluded; it is highly probable, that GOD will find some other Way of punishing such Offenders; especially since the Gnawings of Conscience, and the Want of Quiet and Security, which constantly attend evil Men, do not always rise to such an afflicting Degree, as to seem a sufficient Plague and Penalty for their Crimes⁸. But because whatever Arguments we can alledge à priori, will not amount to a Demonstration, but only to a high Probability; and because this arbitrary Punishment presupposes some positive Determination of the divine Will, which we can hardly come to a Knowledge of without a particular Revelation; and since our Induction and our Experience are at present imperfect, we can scarce avoid confessing, that to those who see only⁹ by the Light of natural Reason, this Controversy must still appear in some measure dark and obscure.

⁶ Which was call'd Nemesis [or Δίκη] and was thought to have the Care of punishing the Crimes which were unpunish'd upon Earth; either thro' Negligence, or thro' want of Power; of this there is a fine Description in Ammian. Marcellin. B. xiv. Ch. ii.

⁷ This is true; but not to lessen the Efficacy of the Laws of Nature, so far as they are known by the Light of Reason alone, let us add some Reflexions; and to this End, I think I can't do better, than to make use of the Words of a great Philosopher of this Age, whom I have already quoted in several Places, who thus speaks; "The Rewards and Punishments of another Life, which God has established to give greater Force to his Laws, are of Importance sufficient to determine our Choice concerning all the good or evil Things of this Life, when we consider the Happiness or Misery to come as possible, of which none can doubt. Whoever, I say, agrees that an excellent and infinite Felicity is a possible Consequence of a good Life which he hath

XXII. As to the Matter of the Law of Nature, Grotius observes ^a, that many Things are refer'd to this Law not properly, but reductively, inasmuch as the Law doth not oppose or forbid them. As those Things are term'd Just, not only which are in strict Justice due, but which Justice doth not contradict (tho' it would be better to call such Things permitted, than plainly just.) But perhaps this Distinction of Grotius might be more conveniently applied to those Constitutions which, according to the particular State of Men, the Desire of Peace and Tranquillity hath at any time introduc'd; as likewise to the Actions undertaken in Conformity to such Constitutions. For we shall often hear the Lawyers debating such Cases as these, whether the Possession of Things, whether Prescription, whether the making Wills, and whether buying or selling, do belong to the Law of Nature, or not. Which Doubts cannot easily be resolv'd, unless we distinguish between those Things which the Law of Nature determines, by commanding or forbidding them; and those things which Men have been induc'd to ordain for the necessary Promotion of Society ¹, the Liberty of doing which flows immediately from this human Ordinance and Institution: and then we say of these last Things, that they belong to the Law of Nature by way of Reduction. Thus the Dominion or the Possession of Things, doth not immediately spring from Nature, nor can we alledge any direct and express Precept for its Introduction: yet it may be said in some measure to be enjoin'd by natural Law, in as much as when Mankind began to multiply in the World, it was requisite to their peaceable Condition, that the primitive Communion of Goods should be laid aside. Thus Prescription is not plainly commanded by the Law of Nature; yet upon Supposition of Things being divided into distinct Proprieties, the Peace of Mankind seems to favour it; lest otherwise the Titles to Things should remain always in doubt. Thus, lastly, Nature doth not positively enjoin us to make Wills, or to buy and sell; yet Proprieties being suppos'd, as in the former Case, it naturally follows, that a Person at his Death shall have the Power of disposing of his own Goods; and that Men, by the Intervention of Bargains and Contracts, shall be at Liberty to alienate such Things as belong to themselves, for the Procurement of those which are in the Possession of others.

Grotius farther observes on this Subject ², that sometimes by Abuse those Things are refer'd to the Law of Nature, which Reason indeed shews us to be honest, and better than their Opposites, tho' they are not properly matter of Debt and strict Obligation. Of which kind are many high and uncommon Acts of Liberality, of Mercy and Clemency; as likewise whenever a Man recedes from any Part of his Right, not being compell'd by Necessity. These Matters St. Paul illustrates in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, Ch. vi. ver. 12. Ch. vii. ver. 38. Ch. x. ver. 23. ^b

Socrates ^c, when a rascally Fellow had offer'd him an Injury, would not complain of it to the Judge, but reckon'd it (as he said) no more than if an Ass had kick'd him. And Cato, as Seneca tells us, when he receiv'd a Blow in the Face, was so far from resenting the Affront, and from desiring Satisfaction, that he would not venture so far as to forgive it, but denied that any such thing had been done: Thinking it better not to acknowledge the Fact, than to prosecute it.

XXIII. There is still one Question behind, which requires our Determination: Whether or no there be any such thing as a particular and positive Law of Nations, contradistinct to the Law of Nature? Learned Men are not come to any good Agreement in this Point: Many assert the Law of Nature and of Nations to be the very same Thing, differing no otherwise than in external Denomination. Thus Mr. Hobbes ^e divides natural Law, into the natural Law of Men, and the natural Law of States, commonly called the Law of Nations. He observes, That the Precepts of both are the same:

“ lived here upon Earth, and an opposite State a possible Recompense of an irregular Life, such a Man must necessarily own that he judges amiss, if he concludes from thence, that a good Life, joined with a certain Assurance of eternal Felicity which he may attain, is not preferable to a wicked Life, accompanied with the Fear of such horrible Misery, into which it is possible the wicked Man shall one Day fall, and where nothing can be his Comfort but the terrible and uncertain Hopes of being annihilated. All this is very evident, seeing good Men have nothing to receive in this World but Evil, and Sinners are in a perpetual Felicity; which yet often happens otherwise, inasmuch as Sinners have no great Reason to boast of their Estate, in relation to the good Things that they actually enjoy; or rather, if we consider all Things well, they have, I believe, the worst Part, even in this Life; but when we put infinite Happiness into the Balance with infinite Misery, if the worst happen to a good Man, which is that he is mistaken, it is the greatest Advantage that the Sinner can have; but if the contrary happen, what Man would run the hazard, if he be a Person of any Thought? Who, I say, will be so much a Fool, as to expose himself to the danger of being possibly infinitely miserable, whereas he can get nothing by it but a pure Negative, if he escapes the Danger? But, on the contrary, the good Man hazards a Negative only against an infinite Happiness, which he shall attain, if his Expectations succeed. If his Hope be well grounded, he is eternally happy; and if he be mistaken he is not unhappy, because he'll be sensible of nothing. But on the other side, if the Sinner judges rightly, he is not happy; but if he be mistaken, he is eternally miserable. Is not this one of the most visible Irregularities of Thought that any Man can fall into, not to see at the first Sight, which Side ought to be preferred in this Controversy? Mr. Locke's Philos. Essay upon Man's Understanding, Lib. ii. Ch. xxi. §. 70. This is the Result of almost all Mr. Pascal's Reasonings in his Meditations, Ch. vii. The Reader also would do well to read Mr. Clerc's Pneumatology, Ch. ix. §. 2, 9. to the end of the Chapter; and Mr. Bruyere's Characters, or Manners of the Age, in his Chapter of Brave Spirits, Page 560, &c. §. xxxi. ¹ There are two sorts of Duties prescribed by the Law of Nature, taken in its full Extent; the one flowing from the natural and primitive Constitution of Man immediately, and the other supposes human Establishment. These last are but the Consequence of the former, or a suitable Application of the general Rules of the Law of Nature to the private Condition, and diverse Circumstances of every one. See §. 15. above, Note 5. and the last Paragraph of this Chapter. We may observe the same in all the Duties, of which this Author treats.

But that forasmuch as States, when they are once instituted, assume the personal Proprieties of Men, hence it comes to pass, that what, speaking of the Duty of particular Men, we call the Law of Nature, the same we term the Law of Nations, when we apply it to whole States, Nations, or People¹. This Opinion we, for our Part, readily subscribe to: Nor do we conceive, that there is any other voluntary or positive Law of Nations, properly invested with a true and legal Force, and obliging as the Ordinance² of a superior Power³. And thus we do not really differ in Judgment from those who are more inclin'd to call that the Law of Nature, which consists in a Conformity to rational Nature, and that the Law of Nations, which flows from the Consideration of human Indigence, the Relief of which seems to be the main End and Design of Society. For we, as well as they, deny that there is any positive Law of Nations proceeding from a Superior. And whatever is deducible from Reflections on the Indigence of human Nature, we refer immediately to natural Law; only we were unwilling to define and explain this natural Law by a Conformity to rational Nature; because by this means we should establish Reason for the Rule and Measure of itself; and so this way of demonstrating Nature's Laws would run round in a Circle.

Most of those Matters which by the Civilians and others are refer'd to the Law of Nations; as the Ways of acquiring things, the Business of Contracts, &c. do indeed belong either to the Law of Nature, or to the civil Laws of those Countries where they are observ'd: Many People and States agreeing in such Points, which otherwise do not depend on the universal Reason of Mankind. Now it is not proper or fair to constitute these as a peculiar and distinct Species of Law; inasmuch as the Reason why such Constitutions are common to many Nations doth not arise from any mutual Covenant or Obligation, but is wholly to be attributed to the particular Pleasure of the several Legislators, who by Accident agreed in these Ordinances, without the least Regard to one another. And therefore this kind of Customs and Decrees may be, and frequently are, alter'd by one People, or Kingdom, without advising with their Neighbours.

Nor is Feldenius's Distinction to be despis'd, who in his Observations on Grotius^b tells us, that the Roman Lawyers, by the Law of Nations^c, understood the Power and Liberty which Strangers and Foreigners were allow'd in transacting Matters in the Roman State; and by the Civil Law, that which was proper to the Citizens only, all Foreigners being excluded from its Benefit. That on this Account^d Wills and Marriages were said to be of the Civil Law, and Contracts or Bargains, of the

¹ Add. Boecler, in Grot. Lib. i. Ch. i. §. 14. and in Lib. ii. Ch. iv. §. 9. ² Lib. ii. Ch. ii. §. 20. and Ch. viii. §. 1. ³ §. xxiii. It is possibly from this Distinction of the Law of Nations from the natural Law, that we are accustomed to judge otherwise of the Actions of Princes, or Commonwealths, than of private Persons, as Mr. Bernard has observed in relating Mr. Budden's Words, as a good and smart Notion, in his Elemen. Philosoph. Pract. Page 236. I shall give you them in the Extract made of them in the News of the Republ. of Letters, March 1704. "If one private Person offends another without Cause, we call that Action Injuste; but if one Prince encroaches upon another without Cause, by invading his Dominions, by robbing his Subjects, and plundering his Towns and Provinces, it is called War, and 'twere too much boldness to call it unjust. To break Bargains made and agreed on, is a Crime between one Man and another: but among Princes, to break the most solemn Alliance, is Prudence, i. e. the Art of Governing. 'Tis true, they always alledge some plausible Pretences, but they matter not whether they are believed just or unjust. Be they called Cheats, Frauds, Lies, Double-dealings, Rapine, Theft, or the like Crimes, which are abhorred in the common Sort, all the World will commend, or at least excuse them, if a Prince or a whole Nation commits them."

² There is neither a Superior nor Inferior. All People are naturally equal, and consequently no one People can impose Laws upon another, much less can they altogether impose Laws upon themselves. But if we ground this pretended Law of Nations upon the Consent or Agreement of the People, we run from our Subject; for besides that there is a Difference between an Agreement and a Law, this would not produce a particular Law distinct from the natural, but it must be referred to that general Law of Nature which obliges us to keep all Covenants. Further, neither all People, nor the greatest and more civilized Part, did ever yet agree together to observe those sort of Customs which are said to belong to the Law of Nations; nay, there is not so much as One, in which they exactly agree in the Practice of it. How they become Obligatory, See Mr. Titius's Observat. on Pufendorf, xci. Num. 14. Mr. Budden's Elemen. Phil. pract. Page 206, 207. as also a Discourse de Lytro, §. 1, 2, &c. in Tom. I. of the Comment. & Opusc. of Mr. Hertius. The second of these Authors had Occasion to observe, after he had treated of the Law of Nature, the Application that People might make of it one to another, so far at least as the thing would permit and require him.

³ 'Tis not exactly the Notion of the Roman Lawyers, for they understand by the Law of Nations, properly so called, that which the Light of natural Reason has established among all Men, and so is common to all Nations, i. e. as the Definition supposes, to all those that follow the Light of Reason. It chiefly consists of such Things as the Necessities and Business of Life oblige us to establish, for we refer to it civil Government, Propriety of Goods, all Contracts almost, Slavery, and the Freedom of Slaves, the Rights of Wars, &c. Quod vero naturalis ratio inter omnes homines constituit, id apud omnes populos per aequam custoditur, vocaturque Jus Gentium, quasi quo jure omnes gentes utantur — Nam usu exigente, & Humanis necessitatibus, gentes humanae jura quaedam sibi constituerunt. Bella etenim orta sunt, & captivitates secuta & servitutes. — Et ex hoc jure gentium omnes pene contractus introducti sunt — Instit. Lib. i. Tit. 2. §. 1, 2. Manumissiones quoque juris gentium sunt — Ex hoc Jure Gentium introducta bella: disces & gentes: regna condita: domina distincta: agris termini positi: aedificia collocata: commercium, emptiones, venditiones, locutiones, conductiones, obligationes instituta; exceptis quibusdam, quae [a] jure civili introducta sunt. Digest. Lib. i. Tit. 1. Leg. 4, 5. So that the Law of Nations is near a-kin to those Laws of natural Right which our Author calls Conditional, §. 24. and the Roman Lawyers sometimes confound it with the Laws of Nature, because the Rules of both are founded on natural Reason. See Grotius upon that Passage of Cicero, where by the Law of Nature, i. e. the Law of Nations, one Man can't promote his own Interest at the Loss of another: Neque verò hoc solum Natura, i. e. Jure Gentium constitutum est, ut non liceat sui commodi causa nocere alteri. De Offic. Lib. iii. Ch. v. p. 296, &c. See also Mr. Hertius, de Lytro §. 1, 7.

⁴ The Roman Lawyers do not refer Marriage to the Civil Law, because, according to them, it belongs not only to the Law of Nations, but Law of Nature; Hinc [ex Jure Naturali] descendit maris atque fœminæ conjunctio, quam nos matrimonium appellamus. Digest. Lib. i. Tit. 1. Leg. 1. §. 3. They only say, that to make a Marriage-contract valid, which is the Effect of the Civil Law, both the Persons who are to be married must be Citizens of Rome. See Ulpian, Tit. 5. §. 3, 4. Seneca, de Beneficiis, Lib. iv. 35. Boeth. in Top. Cicer. Ch. iv. Likewise, altho' a Will, to make it valid, requires certain Formalities, and Strangers can neither make a valid Will, nor inherit by a Will (See Cod. Lib. vi. Tit. 24. and Dion. Gothofred. upon it) nevertheless, Wills were reputed to be from the Law of Nations, as appears from this, That a Soldier might make a Person condemned to Banishment, or condemn'd for all his Life to the Mines or Quarries, his Heir, because they still had a Right by the Law of Nations. Ut sunt in opus publicum perpetuo damnati, & in insulam deportati, ut ea quidem, quae jure civilis sunt, non habeant, quae vero juris gentium, habeant. Digest. Lib. lxxviii. Tit. 9. De Pœnis, Leg. 17. §. 1. See Lib. xxix. Tit. 1. De Testamento Militis, Leg. 13. §. 2. See also the Law of the Code quoted, Lib. iv. Ch. x. §. 4. Note 1.

Law of Nations, because the former were restrain'd to the Citizens, whereas Strangers were admitted to a Share and Right in the latter.

Many Authors do farther rank under the Title of the Law of Nations, several Customs mutually observ'd by tacit Consent, amongst most People pretending to Civility; especially in the Affairs and Transactions of War. For after that the most polish'd Parts of the World came to esteem Martial Glory as the greatest of human Honours, and to think that a Man had no such fair way of shewing his Excellency beyond others, as by being able by his Boldness and his Sagacity to destroy many of his Fellows; upon which Account there perpetually arose either unnecessary or unjust Contentions; for fear great Captains, if they us'd the full Liberty of a just War, should bring too much Envy on their Power, and expose themselves to general Hatred: Many Nations found it convenient to temper the vigorous Fierceness of hostile Proceedings, by a Shew of Clemency and of Magnanimity. Hence arose the Customs of exempting certain Things and Persons from Martial Violence; the particular Manners of hurting Enemies to such Degrees, of treating Captives, and the like. Machiavel in his Prince, Chap. xii. relates one Practice of this Nature, which I question whether it were worthy of the Name and the Profession of Soldiers; he says, it was first introduc'd by Alberigo de Como of Romagna, and kept up in the Italian Wars of the last Age, chiefly by the foreign and mercenary Troops; the opposite Generals endeavour'd with all possible Industry, to rid themselves and their Soldiers of all Trouble and Fear: And their Way was, by killing no one in Fight; only taking one another Prisoners, whom they afterwards dismiss'd without Ransom. When they were in Leaguer before a Town, they shot not rudely amongst them in the Night; nor did the Besieg'd disturb their Camp with the like Incivilities. They made no Intrenchments for their Security whilst encamped; and when Winter came on, never lay at all in the Field. And to behave themselves in this manner was Part of their Discipline and Institution. An Agreement something like this Strabo tells us of, Lib. x. between the Eretrians and the Chalcidians, forbidding the Use of missile Weapons against each other. To which we may add the Custom observ'd by the ancient Indians, of letting the Husbandman remain safe from all Injury and Molestation, even in civil Wars ².

But altho' these Customs seem to include some kind of Obligation arising from tacit Consent; yet if one who is engag'd in a lawful War, shall neglect them, and profess that he will not be bound by such Restraints; provided what is contrary to them may be rightly done according to the Law of Nature; he is guilty of no other Sin, but a sort of Unskilfulness, in not adjusting his Proceedings to the nice Models of those who reckon War in the Number of the liberal Studies. As a Gladiator is accus'd of Inexpertness, when he wounds his Antagonist otherwise than by the Rules of Art. Whoever therefore wages War in a just Cause, may slight these Formalities at Pleasure, and govern himself purely by the Law of Nature: Unless he thinks it more for his Interest to observe them, as a Means to render the Enemies less severe towards himself and his Men. On the other hand, he who prosecutes an unjust Quarrel, if he punctually fulfils these Niceties, is so far in the Right, as to appear wicked with some kind of Temper and Moderation. However, these Reasons not being general, cannot constitute any Law of an universal Obligation. Especially since as to any Restraints which depend on tacit Agreement, it seems reasonable that either Party should have the Liberty of absolving themselves from them, by making express Declaration that they will be holden by them no longer, and that they do not expect or require the Observance of them from others. Hence we find many such Practices to be worn out by Time, or overcome by the Prevalence of contrary Custom. Neither have those Men any good Reason of Complaint, who censure this Doctrine as a Notion by which the Security, the Interest, and the Safety of Nations are robb'd of their surest Guards and Defence. For the Ensurance of these Advantages and Blessings doth not consist in the Practice of such mutual Favours, but in the due Observance of the Law of Nature, a much more sacred Support; and which whilst they enjoy, they have little need of inferior Methods of Protection. And sure it shews much more Excellency and Worth in any Custom, to derive it from the Law of Nature, than to establish it only on the Consent of different People.

Amongst the chief Heads of that voluntary Law of Nations which Grotius maintains, he reckons the Law ³ of Embassies. Now as to this Point it is our Opinion, that the Persons of Embassadors are sacred and inviolable, even amongst Enemies, by the meer Law of Nature; provided they do not come purely as Spies, nor enter into any hostile Design against the Person to whom they are sent; altho' in the ordinary Course of Business, and of Treaties, they prefer their Master's Interest to all others. For inasmuch as such Persons are necessary for the procuring, the preserving, or the strengthening of Peace by Leagues and Covenants; and since the Law of Nature enjoins us to embrace Peace by all honest Ways, it must at the same time be suppos'd to have provided for the Security of those Men, without whose Intervention this good End

² Arrian, in Indicis, Chap. xi.

³ Custom never obtains the Force of a Law in any State, but by the tacit Consent of the Sovereign, which may easily be presumed: But when one People treats with another, how must it be determined what repeated Acts, and what Space of Time shall render a Custom obligatory? Moreover, great Revolutions often happen, insomuch that not only the Sovereign, but also the Government itself is wholly changed; and in this Case, why should a new State, or a new Prince, be oblig'd exactly to observe a Thing which they never consented to? This is what Mr. Hertius has well observ'd. See his Discourse, De Lytro, before quoted, §. 2.

⁴ Samuel Rachelius is plainly meant here, as appears to me by what Mr. Hertius says in the same Discourse, §. 11. where he mentions a Discourse, De Jure Gentium, of that Lawyer, who was Professor at Kiel in the Province of Holstern.

⁵ See what is said Note 1. §. 12. Ch. 9. Lib. viii.

cannot be obtain'd^a. To this Right of personal Safety, is join'd another of being exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Sovereign to whom they are sent; at least in all Matters relating to their Office. Since otherwise they would not have full Power and Liberty to promote their Master's Interest, with due Application and Vigour, were they oblig'd to give an Account of their Management to any Authority, besides that which they represent. Other Privileges commonly attributed to Embassadors, especially to those who reside in Courts, not for the settling or the securing of Peace, but chiefly for the diving into the Secrets and Policies of a State, these depend absolutely on the Indulgence of the Prince who entertains them; and therefore, if he sees convenient, he may deprive them of these Favours without the Breach of any Law, provided he will suffer his own Ministers abroad to be treated in the same Manner.

The² Right of Burial, which, according to Grotius, seems likewise to make a particular Head of the Law of Nations, may be well referr'd to the common Duties of Kindness and Humanity^b. Nor are the other Instances which he offers of Consequence enough to establish a new Species of Law, since they may with Convenience enough be allow'd a Place in the System of the Law of Nature. As for those Persons who¹⁰ rank under the Law of Nations, the particular Compacts of two or more States, concluded by Leagues and Treaties of Peace, to us their Notion appears very incongruous. For although the Law of Nature, in that Part of it concerning the keeping of Faith, doth oblige us to stand to such Agreements; yet the Agreements themselves cannot be call'd Laws, in any Propriety of Speech or of Sense. Besides, they are almost infinite in Number, and commonly are settled only for a Time. Nor do they any more constitute a Part of Law in general, than the Covenants and Bargains of particular Subjects with each other, do belong to the Body of the Civil Law of the Kingdom: But they are rather to be esteem'd the Subject and the Concern of History c.

XXIV. Of all the Divisions of natural Law, that seems to us most accurate and most convenient, which considers, in the first Place, a Man's Behaviour towards himself, and then towards other Men.¹ Those Precepts of the Law of Nature which bear a Regard to other Men, may be again divided into absolute and hypothetical, or conditional. The former are such as oblige all Men in all States and Conditions, independent from any human Settlement or Institution. The latter presuppose some publick Forms and civil Methods of Living to have been already constituted and received in the World. Which Distinction Grotius hath thus express'd in other Words; The Law of Nature is concern'd, not only about such Things as exist antecedent to human Will, but likewise about many Things which follow upon some Acts of that Will. "Whence altho' the Dominion or "the Propriety of Things, as it now stands, is establish'd by the Pleasure of Men; yet such a Settlement being once suppos'd, natural Law informs us "that 'tis a Sin to take the Goods of another Man, ⁹ Altho' after Death whatever Treatment the Corpse of the Dead meets with, is all one to it, the Right of Burial is not a whit the less founded on the Law of Humanity; inasmuch that it is a kind of Punishment to be deprived of Burial, as the Practice of Civil Judicatures shews, and the Uneasiness of such as in their Life-time are troubled at the Thoughts that their Bodies, when dead, shall be cast into the Highway. To this we may add, that, according to the Customs and ordinary Opinions of Men, Burial is a Mark of Honour. Now to deny a Man the Honour that he may lawfully claim, although but by an imperfect Right, is without Contradiction, a Breach of the Law of Nature. It is to no Purpose to object, that a dead Man is not sensible of what is done to his Carcase, yet he may be really wronged for all that, for 'tis not necessary that an injured Person should know or feel the hurt done him, or be in a Condition to obtain his Right. (See Lib. i. Chap. i. §. 7. Note 4.) All the World agree, that an Infant in the Cradle may be wronged, and so may an Idiot, although the first knows not what it suffers, and the other does not understand the Hurt done him. Lastly, the Relations and Friends of the Dead, do in some Manner represent his Person, and have a Right to require the Honour of Burial for him. But, by Burial we are to observe, that all the last Duties to be paid to the Dead are understood, whether it be by burning of the Body, or interring it; for this depends upon Custom, which alone determines how the Memory of the Dead is to be honoured. Moreover, as we have intimated, a certain kind of Punishment is sometimes inflicted upon the Bodies of such as have committed enormous Crimes; and this is chiefly practis'd upon such as have killed themselves, and consequently the Magistrate cannot punish them any other way, to affright others and discourage them from the like Attempts. But the Rights of War do not extend so far, as to deny Burial to slain Enemies; this Refusal answers not to the lawful Ends of War, and can have no other Principle than barbarous Cruelty. I have taken this almost all out of Buddens's Element. Philosoph. Pract. We may add upon this last Article what Plato says, viz. That it is a great Piece of Cowardice to treat the Body of him with whom we are at War, as an Enemy; in so doing we act like Dogs, who bite the Stones cast at them when they can't come at him that throws them. Καὶ γυναικίαις, καὶ σκυμίας θάνατος ἐστὶν, πολεμίων νομίζον τὸ σῶμα τῷ τεθνηκότι, ὅτι παρὰ τὸ ἐχθρῶν, λευκίτιον ἢ ὀϊστολέμιον, ἢ οἷά τι ἀφ' ὀφρον ἔρῃν τὸ τῶ το ποισίνας τ' κινῶν, ἀι ταῖς λίθοις, εἰς ἀν βλητῶσι χαλιπαύουσι τὸ βαλλομένον ἐκ ἀποιδρῆναι. De Rep. Lib. v. Tom. ii. Mr. Thomasius nevertheless maintains, that there is no Evil in refusing Burial to Enemies, and he affirms it a Thing altogether indifferent; but I leave it to others to examine whether what he says about it in his Institut. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. iii. Chap. x. destroys the Principles I have laid down. He also says, That supposing there be some Obligation to grant a Burial, the Refusal of that Duty of Humanity is no just Cause of War. I own it, but it ought to be considered, that this Refusal in some Cases shews a bloody Disposition, and may be more justly made a Cause of War, than many other Things that are.

¹⁰ 'Tis the same Mr. Rachelius, beforementioned, in his Book De Jure gentium, in which he follows Herman Conringius's Discourse, De Jure, as I understand from Mr. Hertius.

§. xxiv. ¹ We must add, towards God. See what is said above, §. 15. Note 5. and in the next Chapter, §. 3. Note 2. This Division is very natural and ancient. We find it in Iusc. Quæst. Lib. i. Chap. xxvi. Hac philosophia nos primum ad illorum [Deorum] cultum, deinde ad jus hominum, quod situm est in generis humani societate, tum ad modestiam, magnitudinemque animi eruditum, i. e. "Philosophy teaches us first of all the Worship of a God, then the Duties of Men one to another, which are "founded upon the Society of Mankind, and then on a Moderation and Greatness of Mind." Every one knows that the Gospel obliges us to respect God, our Neighbour, and ourselves, as the three principal Objects, and greatest Originals of our Duty. This Division is clearly deduced from St. Paul's Words, Tit. ii. 12. The Grace of God, which bringeth Salvation — — — teacheth us to deny Ungodliness and worldly Lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present World. We may also here take Notice of that Passage of the Philosophick Emperor, Τρις χρεός, ἢ μὲ πρὸς το αἰτιον ἀδικημάτων, ἢ πρὸς τῶν θείων αἰτιων, ἢ πρὸς ἡς συμπάντι πᾶσι πάντα, ἢ πρὸς τῶν συμποισινας i. e. "We have three Obligations, the one to the Cause "which is surrounding us, i. e. our Body; the other ties us to the supreme Cause from whom all Things come, which happen in this World, i. e. God, who is the universal Reason; the third and last obliges us to all Men, i. e. as joined in Society." M. Antonin. Lib. viii. §. 27.

“without the Owner’s Consent ².” That is, there are many Things which as to the Exercise of the Act are arbitrary, or where it is left to the free Pleasure of Men, whether they will perform such an Act, or no: But the Act being once perform’d, there follows upon it, by Virtue of some Precept of the Law of Nature, a moral Necessity or Obligation; or else the Manner and Circumstances of the Act are by the same Law adjust’d and determin’d. Thus, for Example, altho’ the Law of Nature doth not command me to buy of another, yet supposing me to buy at my own Pleasure, it commands me not to seek my own Gain to the Damage of the other Party, nor to cheat him in the Bargain. And many such Precepts of the Law of Nature there are, which cannot take Place, or indeed be understood, unless upon Supposition of distinct Proprieties of Things, and of the Establishment of civil Authority. Yet it cannot hence be prov’d, that even all positive Laws are Part of the Law of Nature, because Nature obliges us to obey the Commands of the supreme Magistrate, tho’ our own Consent gave him his Sovereignty over us. Thus much indeed is certain, that the Violaters of civil Laws do, by breaking their intervening Covenant, mediately sin against the Law of Nature. And yet there still remains a prodigious Difference between these natural Laws which we call hypothetical, and the positive Laws of civil Governments; inasmuch as the Reason of the former is drawn from the Condition of Mankind consider’d in general; but the Reason of the latter is taken from the particular Interest of any Nation or State, or from the bare Pleasure of the Legislator. Therefore our civil positive Laws are not so many Precepts of the natural hypothetical Law, but do only borrow their Force of obliging ³ in human Regard, from the Virtue of some such hypothetical Precept of Nature. Now of those human Institutions which serve for Foundations of these hypothetical Precepts, the three chief are ⁴ Speech, the Dominion and the Price of Things, and ⁵ human Sovereignty, or Command. And by this Division we shall hereafter guide our Proceedings, when we arrive at that Part of our Design.

⁴ See Note on §. 8. Lib. iii. Chap. ix.

⁵ All that our Author says in this Chapter respects only the Obligations of the natural Law, which obliges us to act or not act indispensably, and which hath for its Object such Actions as contain in them an Agreeableness or Disagreeableness to the human Nature; but, as I have already said above, Lib. i. Ch. vi. §. 16. N. 1. we must acknowledge a natural Law of simple Permission, by Virtue of which we may do, or not do, according as we judge fit, every Thing which has not a necessary Agreeableness or Disagreeableness with the Nature of Man, unless it be expressly ordered or forbidden by some positive Law, either divine or human. ’Tis upon this natural Law of simple Permission, that all Rights, as well natural as accessory and acquired, are founded, as Liberty, the Right of suffering no Evil from others, Empire or Authority over Persons, and other such like Things, which ordinarily receive divers Changes, according to the Will of Man. For Actions permitted by the Law of Nature may become obligatory, and afterwards return to their natural Indifference. Mr. Selden (as is before observed) acknowledgeth this Right of simple Permission. See his Treatise De Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum Hebræos, Lib. i. Chap. viii. And if we examine what our Author says hereupon in the Beginning of §. 22, we shall find, that he can’t forbear owning a Right of simple Permission. See Lib. i. Chap. vi. §. 15. Note 2.

ALTHO’ this be a Quality common to ¹ Man, with other Animals, that he is concern’d for his own Preservation, and is naturally glad to be in as good a Condition as possible; yet that Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. iv.

§. 1. ¹ This Objection ought first to have been answered, before our Author had entred upon this Subject, viz. How a Man can be under any Obligation to himself? Our Author meddles not with it till he comes to §. 16, where see Note 2. This Neglect proceeded from hence, that the fifteen first Paragraphs were not in the first Edition, but being added in the second, the Objection became so far postponed.

his Care of himself ought to be of a much more refin'd, and of a much nobler Strain, than what we can suppose in brute Creatures, there is good Reason to conclude: Not only because he hath receiv'd more Endowments than they, and such as are more capable of fruitful Culture and of useful Improvement; but farther, because he cannot perform the Duties to which he stands oblig'd, unless he brighten and quicken his Faculties by good Exercise, and make them more vigorous and more ready, in the Production of worthy Actions. Besides, the Labour which a Man spends on his own Improvement, is not terminated in himself; but spreads abroad its Fruit to the Benefit of all Mankind; and the better any Person approves himself in the Management of his own Gifts and Abilities, he is justly esteem'd the more excellent Citizen of the World, and the more generous Benefactor to his Fellows. Wherefore Man, in his Endeavours to fulfil the Laws of Society, to which he is by his Creator directed and designed, hath good Reason to imploy his first Pains and Study on himself; since he will be able to discharge his Duty towards others with so much more Ease and Success, the more diligent he hath been in advancing his own Perfection. Whereas he who is unuseful to himself, and idle in his proper Concerns, can give other Men but little Reason to expect Advantage from his Pains.

There is scarce more Necessity for our engaging in this Care, than there is Solitude and Difficulty in the Prosecution of it. For, in the first Place, Men are born in an entire Ignorance of Things, and their Minds whilst yet tender, may be easily so far defiled and tainted with vile Opinions, that it will afterwards be no easy Labour to wash off the Stains. Besides, we bring hereditary and inbred Corruptions with us into the World, which draw us all, more or less, out of the straight Path of Reason; and unless we bridle and restrain them, pour out a Flood of foul and unworthy Actions, thro' the Course of our whole Lives. And it may, perhaps, quicken our Industry, to consider that we have but one Time allow'd us to act our Part in, and cannot hope for a second Entrance on the Stage, to amend the Faults of our first Performance. For that old Complaint in Euripides will ever be as vain and ineffectual as when it was first made³:

Me miserable! that Men should be deny'd
The Gift of springing to a second Youth,
A double Age! The Structures which we raise
If found defective, later Cares reform,
New modell'd: But our own unhappy Frame
Stands without Change, and falls without Repair!

O! might we turn our Steps, and tread again
The Path of Life, what Slips we once had made
We would correct, and every cheating Maze
Avoid, where Folly lost our Way before.

* Now since Man consists of two Parts, a⁴ Soul and a Body, whereof the former is the great Principle and Spring of human Actions, the latter supplying the Place of a subordinate Instrument, the Care and Improvement of the first and noblest Part, may justly challenge the Precedence in our Endeavours⁵.

II. The Culture of the Mind, which all Men are oblig'd to undertake, and which is absolutely necessary for the Performance of human Duty, consists chiefly in these Particulars; that we obtain true Opinions concerning all such Things as our Duty bears any Reference to, that we set a right Judgment and Price on those Objects which

² Our Author here puts the Care of preserving a Man's self, before that of perfecting himself, which is indeed the more natural Order; for besides that the Idea of Preservation is a Thing more single than that of Perfection, our Being certainly pre-exists our Well-being; and in vain a Man thinks of perfecting himself, if he has not before taken all the Care he can of preserving himself. But if the Author expresses himself well in this first Period, 'tis by meer Chance, for he forgets himself the next Moment, and takes a clear contrary Method in this Chapter; for all he says in this, and the thirteen following Paragraphs, concerns only, the Care of perfecting a Man's self; and he begins not till the fifteenth to speak of his Life and the Preservation of it. Further, we must observe, that according to the Principles I have above laid down to rectify our Author's Notions (Chap. iii. §. 15. Note 5.) the Duties of Man to himself directly and immediately flow from Self-love, which obliges him both to preserve himself, and put himself into as good a Condition as possible to attain all the Happiness that he is capable of. Montagne's Words may be pertinent here. "The principal Office (says he) which we have here, is for every one to govern himself. 'Tis the chief End of our Being here. He that forgets to live well and piously, and thinks to discharge his Duty by ordering and managing others, is a Fool. He that is careless of his own Health and cheerful Conversation, to serve others, takes, in my Opinion, an ill and unnatural Course." Essays, Lib. iii. Chap. x. p. 748. But we must always suppose, that Self-love must be managed according to every one's Condition, and without any Prejudice to Religion or Society. See the general Rules which I have laid down in the Note above quoted.

commonly excite our Appetites, and that we temper and regulate our Passions by the Direction of sound Reason ².

III. Amongst the Opinions then which it highly concerns all Men to settle and to embrace, the Chief are those which relate to Almighty GOD, as the great Creator and Governor of the Universe. That there is really existing a supreme Being, from whom all other Things derive their Original, and the Principle of their Motion; not as from a dull and senseless Power (as the Weight, for Example, in a Clock) but as from a Cause endu'd with Understanding and with Freedom of Choice. That this eternal Being exercises a Sovereignty not only over the whole World, or over Mankind in general, but over every individual human Person: Whose Knowledge nothing can escape: Who, by Virtue of his imperial Right, hath enjoin'd Men such certain Duties by natural Law, the Observance of which will meet with his Approbation, the Breach or the Neglect, with his Displeasure: And that he will for this Purpose require an exact Account from every Man, of his Proceedings, without Corruption and without Partiality ¹.

Now as the main Parts ² of human Duty turn on ² Seneca hath a fine Passage to this Purpose, which begins thus, Epist. lxxvi. Edit. Gronov. Animus intuens vera, peritus fugiendorum ac petendorum, non ex opinione, sed ex natura pretia rebus imponens — — — pu. cherrimus, ordinatissimus, cum decore, cum viribus sanus & siccus, imperturbatus, &c. i. e. "The Mind looks into the Truth, is skilful in knowing what is to be avoided and desired; sets a Price on Things, not according to the common Opinion, but according to its Nature — — — is most beautiful, orderly, graceful, and tho' of great Force, yet is found, uncorrupted, and undisturb'd, &c.

§. III. ² Primus est Deorum cultus (says Seneca) Deos credere, deinde reddere illis majestatem suam, reddere bonitatem, sine qua nulla majestas est. Scire illos esse, qui president mundo, qui universa vi sua temperant, qui humani generis tutelam gerant, interdum curiosi singularum. Hinc dant malum, nec habent; ceterum castigant quosdam, & coercent, & irrogant penas, & aliquando specie boni puniunt. Vis Deos propitiare? bonus esto. Satis illos coluit, quisquis imitatus est. Epist. xcv. i. e. "The Worship of God consists, first of all in believing that they are, and then in acknowledging their Sovereignty and Goodness, without which there can be no real Greatness. We must also be thoroughly persuaded, that they govern the World, and by their Power order and dispose all Things, who take Care of Mankind in general, and sometimes concern themselves in private Affairs. They neither are evil, nor do any, yet they correct some Persons to restrain their Malice, yea, and sometimes punish them whom they seem to favour. Would you have them propitious and kind to you? Be good. They honour them most, who imitate them." See Cicero De Legibus, Lib. ii. Chap. vii. and Epictet. Enchirid. Chap. xxxvii.

² Our Author, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Chap. iv. hath given us a System of natural Religion; i. e. the Duties of Man to GOD; which, because I have said, Chap. iii. §. 15. Note 5. ought not to be excluded our Knowledge of the Law of Nature, I shall here give an Extract of what he there says, which is, These Duties, so far as they can be discovered by the Light of Reason only, may be referred in general, to such as concern, 1. The Knowledge, and, 2. The Worship of GOD. So that the System of natural Religion comprizes Propositions, 1. Speculative, and, 2. Practical. The speculative Propositions are, I. That we must believe, 1. That there is a GOD. See §. 20. of the foregoing Chapter. 2. That this GOD created the World. See his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. i. Chap. 4. §. 3. 3. That he governs all Things by his wise Providence, which takes particular Care of all Mankind. And indeed it is the same in respect to Morality, to deny the Existence of GOD, as his Providence, as the Pagans themselves did acknowledge. See the Passages quoted Chap. vi. Lib. i. §. 11. Note 3. 4. That nothing can be attributed to GOD that implies the least Imperfection. For, since he is the first Cause of all Things, he can't be supposed, without a manifest Absurdity, to have any Imperfection, nor want any of those Perfections, of which we, who are his Creatures, can form to ourselves any Notion. See the Abridgment above mentioned, §. 5. and what is said in the next Paragraph of this Chapter. The practical Propositions of natural Religion contain all the Parts of, II. Divine Worship; which is either outward or inward. The inward consists in the Honour that is given to GOD. Now Honour being nothing else but the Opinion which we have of the Power or Goodness of any Thing, we honour GOD, when with regard to his infinite Power and Goodness, we conceive of him all the Sentiments of Respect and Reverence we are capable of. From whence it follows, that we must love him, as the Fountain and Author of all good Things, hope in him, as the Being upon whom all our Happiness depends, both now and for ever; submit entirely to his Will, having a Persuasion that he will do all Things for our Good, and that he knows better than ourselves what is convenient for us; to fear him, as a Being of infinite Power, by which he is able to inflict the most terrible Evils upon those that offend him; lastly, to obey him in all Things with the most profound Submission, as our Creator, and Lord, Almighty, and of all Goodness. Outward Worship consists principally in the following Duties. 1. We must give GOD Thanks for all the good Things we receive from him. 2. We must, as far as in us lies, regulate our Actions according to his Will, i. e. actually obey him, so far as Ignorance and human Frailty will permit. 3. We must admire and celebrate his Greatness. 4. We must address ourselves to him by Prayer, to obtain all the Blessings we stand in need of, and to deliver us from all the Evils which threaten us. Indeed, Prayer is a Sign of our Hope and Confidence, and Hope implies a special, though tacit Dependence upon the Goodness and Power of him in whom we trust. 5. When we are obliged to take an Oath, we ought to swear by the Name of GOD, and afterwards observe religiously what we have engaged ourselves to, by taking GOD to Witnesses, as his infinite Knowledge and Power does require. 6. We should never speak of GOD, but with the greatest Care and Circumspection, for it is a Sign of Fear, and that is a tacit Regard to the Power of him whom we fear. From hence it follows, that we must not use the Name of GOD lightly and without Necessity in our common Discourse, for this shews want of Circumspection; that we should never take an Oath, but upon Necessity; that we should never curiously and nicely search into the Nature of GOD, and the Acts of his Providence; for that were to confine the divine Nature within the narrow Bounds of our own feeble Reason. 7. Whatever we do in relation to GOD, ought to be most excellent in its Kind, and proper to shew our most profound Respect to him. 8. That we must honour him, and serve him, not only in private, but publick, and in the Sight of Men. For what a Man does only in private, looks as if he were ashamed to do it. Whereas publick Worship is a Testimony, not only of our Zeal, but is also an Example to others, and often induces them to join in the same Actions. 9. And lastly, We must apply ourselves as close as possible to the Practice of such Duties as the natural Law prescribes, both in respect to ourselves and others; which some call an indirect Worship. Indeed, as the Contempt of GOD's Commands is the greatest Affront we can offer to him, so, on the contrary, there is no Sacrifice so agreeable to him as Obedience to his Laws. Now the Law of Nature is a divine Law, as we have before proved. This is what our Author has delivered in short. I might alledge several Passages of Heathen Authors to this Purpose, but this Note is already too long: Nevertheless we will add what Mr. Thomajus (Instit. Jurisp. Divin. Lib. ii. Chap. i. §. 11, &c.) has said, viz. That the Law of Nature indispensibly requires a direct outward Worship, so far as is necessary to shew that we do not condemn the Deity, and not so far as it consists in giving a positive Honour to the Deity, by some exterior Acts, the Omission of which is no Sign of Contempt to him. This able Lawyer grounds this Assertion upon this, That GOD has no need of our Service, and that as he is the Searcher of Hearts, the inward Worship, without which all outward Acts of Piety are of no Worth, is sufficient to discharge us of the Obligation we owe to the supreme Being, on whom we depend. As to what concerns other Men, Mr. Thomajus says, That the Omission of the outward Worship does not hurt either human Society in general, nor civil Society in particular, provided there be an inward Worship paid. But it does not from thence follow, in my Opinion, that there is no Necessity of worshipping GOD outwardly, and that this Necessity is not sufficiently known by the Light of Reason; for how can we conceive that there is a true Piety contain'd in the Heart, unless it shew itself by some outward Acts of Religion? Men are made in such a Manner, that they do not think that they shew a sufficient Respect one to another, if they do not give some on this Belief, so is it the only Foundation of that sweet Tranquillity and Acquiescence of Mind, which Men inwardly enjoy, and the very Fence and Bulwark of all that Probity which we are to exercise towards our Neighbours; without which no Man can seriously and heartily do a good Action himself, or give sufficient Caution and Security of his honest Intentions to others^a. And although it appears from the Ordinances of the Christian Religion, that GOD is not so far pleas'd with every Kind of Worship which Men pay him, as to embrace them with peculiar Favour, and to give them a Title to eternal Life, which good Effects do follow only that Institution and Way of Service which he hath reveal'd in a singular Manner to the World: Yet a serious Persuasion concerning the divine Existence and Providence, under whatever particular Apprehensions, or particular Worship, hath however thus much of Force and Efficacy, as to render Men more observant^d of their Duty. To prove this Assertion we need only consider, that there have been of old,

Proofs of it by Word of Mouth, or some significant Action, seeing they can no ways be assur'd of the Sincerity of each others Intention. But if the inward Worship of GOD is necessary for the Welfare of Society, as Mr. Thomasius supposes it, I can't see how such a purely spiritual Religion can be of any great Use; unless we will suppose that all Men are equally capable of knowing their Duty to GOD, and as careful to practise it, so that none need to be instructed or exhorted by others. Meer Talk is not sufficient for the ignorant and common People, which are the greatest Part of Mankind; there must be something that will affect their Senses, and rouse their Attention, without which they'll forget the Being of a GOD. So that though I might enlarge upon the Obligation to outward Worship, of which we shall speak more afterward, Chap. vi. §. 2. we must grant, 'tis absolutely necessary. And though Mr. Thomasius declares that he was always of that Opinion, yet I see him ordering, in his Fundament. Jur. Nat. & p. 150. that outward Worship is necessary for the Regulation of Honesty and good Order, which, as he explains these Terms in the general Reformation of his System, lay an Obligation, if not so binding, yet at least as true and indispensable, in my Judgment, as that he calls just.

^a Grotius in Lib. Sapientie, Chap. xiii. §. 1. How high soever some People talk about Honesty's being desirable merely on its own Account; yet so great is the Force of these outward visible Things upon our Mind, that without a full Persuasion of the divine Providence and Retribution, and without some System of Law to guide Men in the true Way of Acting, it is impossible but that they should wander into most grievous and fatal Dangers. For, as human Reason is loose and giddy, when the Passions have overcome the Judgment, and the Manners are suited to the Passions, it easily finds out a Colour and Disguise for Sin, and so long obstinately refuseth to hear, till it grows quite deaf. Therefore the wise Man pronounceth those to be miserably vain, who are so far from having a careful Regard to the Knowledge of GOD and of his Providence, as to let those great Points depend on every Man's Fancy and Choice: Than which nothing can be contriv'd more destructive, I do not say to good Manners, but to Government and Society.

^b Beethius de Consolat. Philosoph. in fin. Magna vobis est, si dissimulare non vultis, necessitas indicta probitatis, cum ante oculos agitis iudicis cuncta cernentis, i. e. "Your living under the Eyes of an All-seeing Judge, lays a kind of a Necessity upon you to be good and virtuous."

^c Lucian De Imaginib. "Ὅς ὅσοι το θεῶν μὴ ἐν παρεργῇ σέβουσιν, ἔσται καὶ τὰ πρὸς ἀνθρώπων ἄριστοι ἀν τῶν, i. e. "Those who are most strict and conscientious in their Duty to GOD, are the most honest and regular in their Dealings with Men." It is certain that religious Motives are of great Force to wean Men from Vice, and engage them to Virtue, however confused and imperfect Mens Notions of the Deity are. This may appear something difficult to conceive in respect of the Heathens, but we have some Proofs of Fact. I don't speak of Philosophers, who had more clear Notions of Religion than the Vulgar, although they dared not deliver them openly. Mr. Selden (in his Treatise De Jure Nat. & Gent. secundum Hebræos, Lib. i. Chap. viii.) has collected several Authorities to make it evident, that most of them looked upon the Laws of Nature as derived from GOD, who will punish the Transgression of them, and reward their Practice. And 'twould be no hard Thing to add to them many other Passages. Nay, the very People, notwithstanding the prodigious Superstition into which they were plunged, yet preserved some Tincture of this important Principle, either by reason of that natural Relation there is between the Ideas of GOD and Sanctity, which hindered such Men as had not wholly given themselves up to Vice, from attending to the Consequences of the received Opinions, or because there remained some Footsteps of the ancient Tradition of the only true GOD, the Creator of the World, and the Author and Protector of human Society. This seems plainly to arise from the common Opinion amongst most of the Heathens concerning the Rewards and Punishments of another Life. (See what our Author has said, Chap. iii. §. 20.) We may also find some express Words relating to this Matter in the Poets, who, as every one knows, accommodated themselves to the common Opinions. Selden has alledged many in the Place above quoted; we shall produce some others, viz. in the Oedipus of Sophocles, Act. iii. the Chorus saith,

Εἰ μοι ζυεῖται φέρωντι μοῖζα τὰν
 Εὐσεβῶν ἀργεῖαι λόγων
 Ἔργων τε πάντων, ἂν νόμοι πρόχρηται
 Ὑψιπέδες, ἐρασίην δὲ αἰδέεσθαι
 Τεκνώδιντες ἂν Ὀλυμπῶ
 Πατὴρ μόνου, ἃδὲ νῦν θνατῶ
 Φοβῆς ἀνέρον ἐπιβλεν, ἃδὲ
 Μὴν ποτε λάθρα κατακοιμάσθαι.
 Μίγας ἐν τέστοις Θεοῖς, Οὐδὲ γηράσθαι.

Let th' Gods be so propitious to me
 As I preserve my self in Sanctity
 In Words, and Deeds, by th' Laws unto us given Not by poor Mortals, but the GOD of Heaven, Which Laws no Mortal can abolish quite For GOD's in them, and by his Pow'r and Might Will triumph over all that is not right,
 For he can ne'er grow old

Note 3.* to which we may add §. 321, &c. in the Work of this last Poet. I will conclude with Cicero, who was not less superstitious (De Legib. Lib. ii. Chap. vii.) Utiles autem esse opiniones has, quis neget, cum intelligat, quam multa firmentur jurejurando, quantum salutis sint fœderum religiones? quam multos divini supplicii metus a scelere revocavit? quamque sancta sit societas civium inter ipsos, diis immortalibus interpositis tum iudiciis, tum testibus? i. e. "Who can deny the Usefulness of these Opinions [viz. of the Gods and Providence] when he considers, how many Things are confirmed by Oaths? How much the Security of Leagues and Alliances depend on Religion? How many the Fears of divine Vengeance keeps from Wickedness? And how careful Citizens are to discharge their Duties to each other, because they believe the immortal Gods are not only the Witnesses, but will be Judges of their Actions?" See what I have said, Lib. i. Chap. vi. §. 12. Note 7. and Lib. ii. Chap. iii. §. 19. Note 2.

I spoke in this last Note something touching a Comparison between a Society of Atheists, and another, of such as have some Notion of a God, though imperfect and incoherent; but since that Note was composed and printed, Mr. Bayle hath put out (in 1704) a Continuation of diverse Meditations upon Comets, where he speaks something that may serve to strengthen and explain my Assertion; but I shall first begin with what Mr. Le Clerc has said upon this Subject, in his Biblioth. Choisie, Tom. v. p. 302, 303. in Answer to this Question, Whether Atheism is to be preferred to Pagan Idolatry? To which he says, "We must, in my Opinion, distinguish first of the Societies, consider their Opinions abstractly, and then on the one Side describe Atheism, and on the other Idolatry. 'Tis possible we may find one sort of Idolatry better than Atheism, and another worse; and so I can neither say Yea nor Nay to Mr. Bayle's general Question. In the second Place, when we come to consider, not only the Opinions in general, but the Societies in themselves, which profess the Pagan Idolatry or Atheism, we must make also some curious Distinctions, and divide the Question into several Propositions, according to old, and still are, Men professing Religions which we must own to be destructive to Salvation, as suppose Mabometans, or Pagans; who nevertheless by Virtue of their Persuasion of GOD'S Providence, have shewn no inconsiderable Care and Concern for Honesty and Justice; so as not to be outdone by many Christians, at least as to external Performances. Nay, there are not wanting Persons, who from the Experience of long Travels, pretend to affirm, that Christianity hath not been able to alter the common Dispositions of some Nations towards particular Vices; and that 'tis not easy to discover the Truth of that holy Religion, from the Manners and the Practices of those who profess it. Though I should imagine the Reason of that Unhappiness to be chiefly this, because the Christian

“ the different Cases which are put, and to which we must answer negatively or affirmatively, according to their Nature.” Mr. Le Clerc gives us an Example in the same Volume, speaking of the History of the Incas, written by Garcilasso de la Vega, pag. 380, 381. These are his Words, “ If what Garcilasso de la Vega says of the Opinions, Laws, and Manners of the Subjects of the Incas, be true, there is no Idolatrous Nation in the World, not excepting the most polite and learned, where there are such good Laws, or so well observed. Their Religion, which chiefly consists in worshipping the Sun, whom they believe to be the Father of the Incas, not with human Sacrifices, as they do in the other Parts of America, but with Beasts and other Things, is the least corrupted of any among the Idolaters. Besides the Sun, they hold there is another Deity, which they call Pacha-carnic, a Word that signifies, in their Language, The Soul of the World. They speak of this God as a Being invisible, whose Nature is incomprehensible, and who created the Sun and the Stars. They believe the Immortality of the Soul, and have some confused Notion of a Resurrection. Supposing that all this that Gar. de la Vega says is true, we may say, that such an idolatrous Society as this, is incomparably better than a Society of Atheists, and, in some Respects, may be preferred to some Societies, that otherwise have better Principles.” Tho' this Question in itself be not very important, because a Society of iner Atheists is a Thing no where to be found, at least, not in any Country; yet I doubt not, but many Persons wished that Mr. Le Clerc had descended to more Particulars.

I supposed in my Note, to which this is only a Supplement, that I did not intend to speak of the Opinions of the Atheists or Idolaters, considered in themselves and abstractly, but only of the Effects they are able to produce in respect to Societies. I supposed also, that in the Parallel between a Society of Idolaters and Atheists, we might conceive an Idolatry which did not destroy the principal Fundamentals of Religion, i. e. the Essence and Providence of some Deity. For it is certain, that Faith in the Existence of a GOD, without Faith in his Providence, is at the Bottom indirect Atheism, as to Morality Upon which Foot I think, that all Things being otherwise equal, a Society of Atheists, i. e. a People composed of Men learned and unlearned, Persons of all Orders and Conditions, bearing that Character; such a Society, I say, will be more corrupt than another which preserves the fundamental Principles of Religion, though mixt with Errors, and Things inconsistent with the Truth. And since in this Question we have chiefly an Eye to the antient Heathens, let us suppose, for Example, that the Commonwealth of Greece, or some Roman Province, were on a sudden turned Atheists, and no Man had any Sense of Religion; I say, that after such a Change, that Commonwealth or Province could not keep up any tolerable Order in Civil Society, but there would be among them many more Disorders than were before. And my Reasons are these, Among the Heathen, the People were not ignorant of the Agreement there is between Religion and the Laws of Nature. The Poets, who principally dealt with the People, have delivered many Things (as Mr. Le Clerc, in his Bibliotheq. Choisie, Tom. iii. shews) that prove the true Notion of GOD was not quite blotted out of their Minds. For Example, the most antient of them, Homer and Hesiod, speak thus of the Gods, That they are Almighty, Immortal, Good, Omniscient, Wise, Happy, Lovers of Virtue, and Enemies of Vice, &c. Moreover, the Unity of the Godhead itself was not altogether unknown to the Poets, although Mr. Bayle seems to think that all the Heathens were ignorant of that Truth. Nothing can prove this better and more fully, than these Verses of Sophocles, in a Tragedy now lost, but preserved to us in Grotius's Excerpta, pag. 149.

Εἰς τοῖς ἀλλοδαίσιον, εἰς εἰς ἑθεῖς,
Ὅς ἄρανον τ' ἐτόξε, καὶ γαίαν μακρῶν,
Ποτῶ τε χάρσπον οἶδμα, κἀνέμων βίας·
Θητεῖ ἢ ποθοὶ καρδίαν πλανῶμενοι
Ἰδρυάμωδα πημάτων παρψυχίας,
Θιῶν ἀγάλημῶ ἐκ λίθων, ἢ χαλκίων,
Ἦ χρυσοτεύκτων, ἢ λιφαντίνων τυπῶς
Θυσίας τε τῶτοις, καὶ καλίας πανηγύρεῖς
Τεύχοντες, ἔτως εὐσεβῶν νομίζομεν.

In Truth there is no more Gods but one,
Who made the Heaven, far extended Earth,
The blue swelling Sea, and fierce Winds.
Yet many Men being grossly deceived,
Have erected, to comfort themselves in Trouble,
Images of the Gods, of Gold, and Stone, and Brass;
And offer Sacrifices to them in their Assemblies,
And think that they are religious.

Several other Passages, besides, what are alledged above, might be produced, to prove that the Practice of Virtue was well-pleasing to the Gods; on the contrary, Vice odious, notwithstanding the Crimes attributed to them in their Fables. Mr. Bayle, in the Continuation of diverse Meditations, pag. 654.) says, “ That single Theft, for Example, and Lying, were not contrary to the Ordinances which their Gods had expressly delivered, and so they believed that their Gods did not regard them.” I own, that Priests spake very little of Morality to the People, but this hinders not but that the principal Duties of the Law of Nature were known among the People, who looked upon them as Laws to which the Gods required their Observation, although their Notions of them were very obscure, and corrupted by ill Customs. This is what the Poets always supposed, who contributed more to their entertaining the Notions of Virtue and Vice, than the Priests, who, as wicked as they were, durst not openly contradict them. We find in Euripides this fine Sentence, which he makes a Woman to speak, and say, That the Gods abhorred all Oppression, Extortion, and every unjust Way of enriching ourselves. The same Poet also says, that every Crime is A GREAT IMPIETY, as well as a great Folly, in these Words,

Τὸ δ' αὖ κακροῦν ἀσεβῆα μεγάλην, Κακοφροῖον τ' ἀνδρῶν παράνοια. Orest. ὕ. 821, 822. Ed. Cant.

See Hesiod. Oper. & Dier. ὕ. 180, etc. 219, etc. and 238, 239. Ed. Cler. and Mr. Baron Spanhemius's Comment on Callimachus, Hymn. in Jovem. ὕ. 3. and in Cerer. ὕ. 19. Many more such Passages might be collected out of the Poets; but there is a remarkable Place in Plato that may not be passed over. That Philosopher, treating of Incest, says, That it was looked upon with such Horror, that Men of no Honesty, yea, and the common People, would not entertain such wicked Desires, for a Sister (for Example) though she were never so fair. And that which extinguished those impure Thoughts was this, That Incest PASSED FOR AN UNLAWFUL AND ABOMINABLE ACT WITH THE DEITY. No Body, says he, contradicts it, every one knows this from his Cradle, and all the World keeps to it in both jocular and serious Discourses. The Stage represents Thyestes's, Oedipus's and Macareus's, who slew themselves for the incestuous Commerce which they had with their Sisters. His Words are, Σμικρὸν ῥήμα κατασβένουσι πάσας τὰς τοιαύτας ἰδοῦσας — τὸ ταῦτα εἶΝΑΙ ΦΑΝΑΙ ΜΗΔΑΜΩΣ ΟΣΙΑ, ΘΕΟΜΙΣΗ ΔΕ, καὶ αἰσχρῶν αἰχίσια. τὸ δ' αἰτίον ἀρ' ἔ τῶτ' εἰσι, τὸ ΜΗΔΕΝΑ ΑΛΛΩΣ ΔΕΓΕΙΝ ΑΥΤΑ, ἀλλ' ἐνθὺς ἡνέμωρον ἡμιῶν ἕκασον, ἀκέρῃ τε λεγόντων αὐ καὶ πανταχῶ ταῦτα, ἐν ἡλίσις τε ἄμα, ἐν πάσῃ τε σπαδῇ πραγματῇ λεγόμενῃ ποδάκι, ὅταν ἢ Θυέστας, ἢ τῶσ' Ὀδιποδῶς εἰσαγάσωσιν, ἢ Μακαρίας τῶσ' ἀδελφῶν μυχθέντας λαβραίας, ἢ Φθελίας, ἢ ἰταίμωσ' ἴαντων ἑαυτοῖς ἐπιτιδύτας δίκην τ' ἁμαρτίας. De Legib. Lib. viii. p. 838. Ed. Steph. So that it was a common Opinion, that even in this Life Crimes do not go unpunished always, but whoever violates the Law of Nature, hath great Reason to fear the Effects of divine Vengeance. Plautus has a fine Passage to this Purpose, sufficient to shew how great Impression such a Persuasion makes upon the Minds of the common People. Arcturus, one of the Constellations, is introduced, saying, That Jupiter the King of Gods and Men, had sent him and other Constellations, i. e. inferior Deities which presided over the Stars, he sent them, I say, into all Parts, to be Witnesses of the Actions, Manners, Piety and Fidelity of Men, and to see how every Man enriched himself. "We wrote down distinctly (says Arcturus) the Names of those who made use of false Witnesses, to carry their unjust Causes, or who deny their Debts upon Oath before a Judge, and carried them to Jupiter, and by this he knows every Day who they are, that by their Crimes pull down his Judgments upon their Heads. He knows them that are ready to take an Oath to get their Cause, and such as get it unjustly by the Favour of the Judges. He reviews their Cause, and judges it anew, condemning the Offender to so great a Punishment, that the Gain they have made by it is inconsiderable. He hath the Names of good Men written in another Book. These wicked Men flatter themselves, that they can appease Jupiter with Offerings and Sacrifices, but they lose both their Labour and Cost, for he regards not any of the Prayers or Services of perjured Persons. A good Man will be easily heard, and obtain Favour of the Gods, but the Sinner cannot. This I advertise you of, O ye Virtuous, who live in Piety and Integrity: Continue in them, that ye may receive the Benefit of your good Conduct." The Poet thus expresses himself,

*Is nos per gentes aliam alia disparat,
Hominum qui facta, mores, pietatem & fidem
Noscamus, ut quemque adjuret opulentia:
Qui falsas lites falsis testimoniis
Petunt, quique in jure abjurant pecuniam:
Eorum referimus nomina exscripta ad Jovem.
Cotidie ille scit, quis heic querat malum,
Qui heic litem apisci postulant perjuræ,
Mali res falsas qui impetrant apud judicem:

Majore multa mulctat, quam litem auferunt.*

*Bonos in aliis tabulis exscriptos habet,
Atque hoc scelesti in animum in lucunt suum,
Jovem se placare posse donis, hostiis:
Et operam & sumptum perdunt: ideo fit, quia
Nihil ei acceptum est a perjuris supplicii.

Quam qui scelestus est, inveniet veniam sibi.
Itcirco moneo vos ego hæc, qui estis boni,
Quique aetatem agitis cum pietate & cum fide,

Rudent. Proleg. §. 10, &c.

I do not know what Mr. Bayle thought, when reciting exactly what the Constellation asserted upon the Roman Theatre, he added thereupon, (Resp. ad Provincial. Tom. iv. p. 320.) "This was not to teach Men, but only in this, that they should not offend the Deity personally in abusing Oaths, which they have taken to bear Witness with the greatest Formality, which if they do, they need not fear his Anger." But, on the contrary, it is very evident, that the Poet speaks of Honesty and good Manners in general, without which all outward Acts of Religion are no ways acceptable to God; and if he mentions other Crimes joined with Perjury, it is only to give an Example of the most enormous Wickedness, and such Circumstances as aggravate the Heinousness of it. Nor is Mr. Bayle more happy in Criticism than he is in Reasoning, "So that (adds he) common Lies, evil Speaking, Lewdness, Drunkenness, and an hundred other Disorders may promise themselves Impunity in Respect of the Gods." Be it so, yet it will be always true, that Religion will be of Force to keep Heathens from Fraud, Cheating, Double-dealing, &c. in which it has much the Advantage of Atheism; and we know that many Heathens were faithful in their Dealings, for fear of bringing down Vengeance upon them in this World, and, on the contrary, to obtain Success of the Gods in their Affairs. As to the Rewards and Punishments of another Life, we know that an ancient Tradition, which is much inculcated in the Writings of the Poets, made the Opinion common almost every where. But can we think that those Punishments were only designed for them who neglected the outward Worship of God, or directly offended his Majesty? Read the Description of Hell written by Virgil, and you'll see that not only the Titans, Giants, Salmeoneus, Tityus, Ixion, and Pirinthus, are punished, but Brethren that are Enemies, and they who bear their Father; those who deceive their Clients and Dependants, hoard up their Riches, and will neither impart them to their Fathers nor Friends; those who have been slain in the Act of Adultery; who have engaged in unjust Wars; such as make no Conscience of breaking their Promises made to their Masters. Another cries out, as loud as he can, "Learn by my Example, to do Justice, and not to slight the Gods." Another hath sold his Country, and betrayed it to a Tyrant. Another adds Sibyll, an hundred Tongues, and as many Mouths, with a Voice that would never fail, it were impossible for me to reckon up all the different Sorts of Crimes which are punished in that Place, or the Names of all the different Sorts of Punishments which the Wicked suffer." These are his Words,

*Hic, quibus invidi fratres, dum vita manebat,
Pulsatusve parens, & fraus innexa Clienti;
Aut qui divitiis soli incubuere repertis,
Nec partem posuere suis, quæ maxima turba est;
Quique ob adulterium casti, quique arma secuti
Impia, nec veriti dominorum fallere dexteras; Inclusi panam expectant _____ magna testatur voce per umbras:*

*Discite justitiam moniti, & non temnere divos.
Vendidit hic auro patriam, dominumque potentem
Imposuit, fixit leges pretio atque refixit.*

Hic thalamum invasit nata vetitosque hymeneos.

Non mihi si lingua centum sint, oraque centum, Færea vox, omnes scelerum comprehendere formas, Omnia panarum percurrere nomina possim. Æneid. Lib. vi. §. 603.

He, on the contrary, represents good Men in a Place by themselves, viz. in the Elysian Fields, enjoying the Happiness of another Life, and being, as it were, under the Conduct of a wise Cato:

Secretosque pios, his dantem jura Catonem. Æneid. viii. §. 670.

There are, I own, many ridiculous Fables mixed with these Descriptions of the Gods, and another Life, and the blockish Multitude did apparently depend more upon the Chimera's of the Poets than on the Truths which they had interspersed in their Works. But is it credible, that among the People themselves, which comprehends the illiterate Part of Mankind in general, there should be many who have acknowledged, at least, in part, the Abuse, and gave great Attention to the true Principles of natural Religion, tho' mixed with many Falsities? These Notions easily enter into the Mind of any Man that will make use of the Light of Nature; and Men without Study are sometimes better disposed to receive the Truth, and less prejudiced, than such as profess themselves learned (See Parrhasiana, Tom. ii. p. 103, &c.) The Poets might here also shew the People the Way, and give them Occasion to think that they did not themselves believe the Absurdities which they attributed to the Gods, as Hercules's Words in Euripides may prove:

*Ἐγὼ δὲ τὰς θεὰς ὅτε λεπτρὰ, ἀ μὴ δέμεις, στέρησιν νομίζω, δέσματ' ἑξάπλην χερσῶν.
οὐτ' ἠξίωσα πάποι, ὅτε πείσομαι, οὐδ' ἄλλων ἄλλῃ δεσπότῃ πεφυκέναι.
δαίται γὰρ ὁ θεός, εἴπερ ἐστὶν ὅπως θεός, οὐδένος ἀοιδῶν οἷός τις ὄνθηναι λόγῳ.*

I don't believe the Gods love unlawful Beds,
Or that they put one another in Fetters and Chains;
Nor can I persuade my self to believe That one of them is Master of the other.
God, who is really such, can stand in need Of nothing. These are the false Accounts of the Poets, reform their Mind by its Direction. For I doubt not, but that at least the external Acts even of national Vices, might be repress'd, would Men but apply themselves in earnest to the leading a Life

The same Poet, as Mr. Le Clerc observes (Biblioth. Choif. Tom. vi. p. 269.) shews a little higher that he was sensible of the Falshood of these Fables, saying, "Romantick Stories and Fables, set out with divers Fictions, do more easily gain Entertainment in Mens Minds, than true Histories. A flourishing Rhetorick which pleases Men, setting off a Thing makes a Thing almost incredible to be believed. But Length of Time certainly discovers the Truth. Men should always speak well of the Gods, for they run the least Hazard."

These Reflections may easily come into the Minds of the most simple Persons, that will but make Use of their natural Sense. For 'tis probable that the Poets did not hatch them in their own Brains, but here, as in other Things, followed the Dictates of Nature. We have always observed these Things to happen among Christians, and doubtless the same Things happened among the Heathens. Among the Papists, in some Countries especially, one Word from a Priest will raise the Mob against an Heretick, as they call them; but yet there are many honest Men, who abhor such a diabolical Madness, and do not believe that any Man may be persecuted for his Religion; though the Clergy inculcate that Doctrine with all the Earnestness possible, to satisfy their Ambition, Pride, and Avarice, and to engage the People in their Interests, who suffer themselves to be led blindly by their Harangues, especially when they suggest Things agreeable to their brutish and irregular Inclinations. We may also say the same of diverse Opinions, which are received by the several Parties of Christians. The Doctrines of Transubstantiation, Impanation, and the Ubiquity of Christ's Body, are such gross Contradictions, that none can believe them, and though some Men make a Profession of that Faith, they no more believe them than such as deny them. (See what I have said in my Preface to Tom. III. of Archbishop Tillotson's Sermons.) But there are other speculative Opinions and moral Maxims, either entirely or very unsound, which the Preachers deliver from the Pulpit, without convincing many Men, who by the Strength of meer natural Reason perceive the Absurdity of these Doctrines and Maxims, or explain them in a clear different Sense from the Preachers, as appears when they are question'd about them in familiar Terms. The Pagan Fables were in like Manner absurd, and why may we not also believe that many among the People looked upon them as false, and kept to the Fundamentals of natural Religion, though with some Mixtures of Error and Imperfection. Did not Men then make Use of their Reason? Or were those Truths so obscure that they could not be found out by long and profound Meditation? We may with much greater Reason suppose, that they, whose Education has been above the common Sort, in going to the Schools of the Philosophers, and carefully reading their Books, should be happily freed from the Superstitions and gross Notions of Heathenism. With what Liberty did the Philosophers insult the Religion of the Vulgar several Ways? "We may believe (says Mr. Fontenelle, in his History of Oracles, Dissert. i. Chap. viii.) "that among the Pagans Religion was a sort of Practice, whose Speculation was a Thing indifferent. Do as others do, and you may believe as you please." This is a wild Notion, but the People, who saw not the Weakness of it, were contented with it, and the Philosophers submitted readily to it, because they got by it. Mr. Bayle (also in his Diverse Meditations, p. 367.) owns, That there were, among the Heathen, Men of Ingenuity and good Sense, who, without Philosophy, had sometimes tolerable Notions of the Deity. It is true, that, according to him, they were not to be regarded, because when they had heard the Reasonings of the Philosophers about the Nature of the Gods, as soon as they were gone, they did as others did. But it is no ways necessary in the Question we are debating, to find such Men among the Pagans as had the Courage to oppose the common Errors or Worship establish'd by publick Authority. 'Tis sufficient that several did acknowledge the more gross Abuses of Superstition and Idolatry, and acquire such Notions in Religion as were able to produce such a Degree of Honesty, as they could not have had, if they had been Atheists. The Descriptions of the Pagan Corruptions, made by Mr. Bayle (in his Continuation of diverse Meditations, p. 702, &c.) do not prove the contrary. These sort of Descriptions ought not to be taken in a Metaphysical Generality, 'tis sufficient that, according to the Rules of good Criticism, they agree to the greatest Number. Farther, the Men of whom I am now speaking, not daring, for fear of incurring a general Odium, to openly oppose those strange Abuses of the Vulgar, deserve certainly to come under that Description as well as the Philosophers, as having suppressed the Truth which they knew, according to the Reproof given them by St. Paul, Rom. i. 18. But you'll say, we must not attribute the Honesty of these Men to the religious Notions they had received: It was caused by a Principle of Honour, Fear of Laws, the crossing of Passions, and several other Interests proceeding from Self-love. That this is all the Virtue which most Men have, as we see among Christians, can't be deny'd, but doth it thence follow, that no Heathen was inclin'd to Virtue by a religious Motive, or with a Respect to the Punishments and Rewards which are distributed by the Deity, either in this Life or the next? "I can't deny, saith Mr. Bayle (in his Diverse Meditations, p. 439, 440.) "but there have been some Heathens, who making a good Use of their Knowledge of the Nature of GOD, have by that Motive subdued the sudden Force of their Passions. But then (says he) 'tis most probable, that when this Motive was so prevalent, their Passions were so moderate, that they might have been reduced by Reason, without that "Help." So we may as well believe, that among Christians no Man is virtuous purely through his religious Principles, because there are Laws and Disgrace attending every Crime; nay, in a Word, all the other Motives which have Place in Heathenism. Moreover, what we may have said of the Laws may suggest a Reflexion not to be slighted. These wise Lawgivers of Antiquity so much esteemed and respected by all the World, at the same time that they appointed that the Gods should be worshipped in their several Countries, forbid, under the most rigorous Punishments, most of those Crimes which the Vulgar attributed to their Deities. And is it not natural to infer from thence, that they looked upon the Fables as absurd Relations of the Poets, which the People pleased themselves with? At least, this is the Reasoning of Lucian, in his Necromancy, Tom. i. p. 327. Ed. Amstel. Ουτε γὰρ τὸς θεοὺς ἂν ποτε κηρύξῃν μοιχεύσαι, κἢ φασάν-σαι πρὸς ἀλλήλους, εἴ μὴ ὡς πᾶσι καλῶν τῶν ἠγνοῶσιν, ἔτ' αὖ τὸς νομοθετὰς πάναντα τέτοις παρανοίᾳ, εἴ μὴ λυσίτελῆν ἑπελάττουσιν &c. "On the one Side I can't imagine that the Gods commit Adultery, or that there are among them Divisions,

Life suitable to their Profession^s.

IV. As this Persuasion, and whatever else we are able to learn concerning the Worship of GOD, either from Reason or from Revelation, is first of all to be implanted in a rightly cultivated Mind.

So are the Opinions contrary to these Truths most carefully to be barr'd off and excluded. And here we would not only be understood of Atheistical and Epicurean Principles, but of those numerous Notions which appear to be destructive of true “ or at least that they think these Things just and honest; and on the other side I see, that the Lawgivers have ordained the contrary, which they would not have done, had they thought them profitable.” But you'll say again, The very Notion of Honesty, considered without any respect to Religion, might incline the Heathens, for Example, to render Men their Dues, tho' they might keep them without any Apprehensions of Punishment from the Laws, or Disgrace otherwise. But I'll leave it to any considering Man, if the Reasonings which Mr. Bayle attributes to an Atheist, can come into any Man's Mind but some subtil Philosophers, who are exercised in deep and abstruse metaphysical Meditations. 'Tis not conceivable that any Philosophers, whether Atheists, or not, should be inclined to practise the Maxims of Virtue, by no other Motive, but its own Beauty, whether inward or outward.

It is very evident, that all that is said about these Notions of Honesty, is in the Mouth of most Men, especially Atheists and Epicureans, meer empty Talk and pure Declamation, of which the Mind is not persuaded. Nor are we more sure, that all those who say, That Honesty is natural to Virtue, and Dishonesty to Vice, that Virtue is worthy to be loved for itself, and is its own Reward (Continuation, &c. 61.) have by that means excluded all Relation between Honesty and the Will of GOD, as the Example alledged by Mr. Bayle out of Cicero, gives us Reason to believe. It is true, that he maintains, That unless we could escape the Eyes of GOD, as well as Men, we should not suffer ourselves to hearken to any Motions of Avarice, Intemperance, Debauchery, or Intemperance. But does not the same Author declare positively elsewhere, that GOD is the Author of the Law of Nature (Lib. iii. De Repub. apud Lanctantium, Lib. vi. Ch. viii.) in these Words, Unusque erit communis quasi magister, & imperator omnium Deus; ille LEGIS illius [viz. RECTÆ RATIONIS, NATURÆ CONGRUENTIS] INVENTOR, DISCEPTATOR, LATOR, &c. See the whole Passage quoted above, Ch. iii. §. 20. Note 5. What do I say? In the same Book of Offices from whence this Passage is taken, which Mr. Bayle quotes, do we not find, that the Law of Nature is both an human and divine Law? Atque hoc multo magis exigit ipsa nature ratio, quæ est lex divina & humana, Lib. iii. Ch. v. Edit. Græv. And a little lower, Ch. vi. he explains himself better, Qui autem civium rationem dicunt habendam, externorum negant, hi dirimunt communem humani generis societatem: quæ sublata, beneficentia, liberalitas, bonitas, justitia funditus tollitur: quæ qui tollunt, etiam adversus Deos immortales impii judicandi sunt, i. e. “ They that hold, that the Rights established among Citizens are to be regarded, yet will not allow them to “ Strangers, and these last destroy the general Society of all Mankind, with which Bounty, Liberality, Humanity, “ and Justice must fall. Now to attempt this is an Impiety against the Gods themselves, since it is the Destruction “ of that Society they have established among Men.” The same thing appears in many other Passages of that famous Roman. Whoever then will consider what I have said, will perhaps agree, that notwithstanding the Pagan Blindness, Religion hath won from Vice and inclined to Virtue many Men, who without that had never been virtuous, especially such of the People as were not able to make or understand all the Reflections which the Prospect of Interest, or Fame, and the Notion of Honesty might suggest to the Philosophers. As for others, they would not be less corrupted, supposing they were Atheists. Generally speaking, we may say, in my Opinion, that the false Notions of Religion abate the Evil of an Action rather than produce any; they serve for an Excuse or Pretence, but never invite into any Crimes of themselves, even those who are otherwise inclined to them. For the most part, those whom we think to be seduced by Superstition, or by false Consequences drawn from the true Principles of Religion, act altogether by another Motive, which is, if not the only, the chief Cause at least of their Conduct: These are ordinarily the downright Hypocrites, Men without any Religion, and false Devoto's, who (as Mr. de la Bruyere speaks, p. 478.) under a King that is an Atheist will be Atheists, or who, if they have not quite extinguished all Sense of a Deity, and a Providence, yet at least look upon these great Truths as some indifferent Problems. Montagne speaking of a great Number of Christians, says, That some fallily make the World believe, that they believe what they do not; others, and those a great Number, cheat themselves with a false Notion of Faith (Essays, p. 316. Edit. Paris.) And how much greater Reason have we to think, that Paganism affords Men that Character? I do not deny but there are some Men which engage themselves in evil Actions out of a Principle of Religion; but if Idolatry and Superstition seduceth them, in some Respects, 'tis because what is otherwise good and true in Paganism had no Influence upon them to keep them from Vice, and incline them to certain Virtues; insomuch, that the Evil that Religion produces on the one side, is compensated by the Good it doth on the other; for we must not imagine, that the greatest Bigots to Paganism did only draw, or observe all the Consequences which naturally followed those things, which they attributed to their Gods. What I have said above proves to the contrary, and no Man but must as readily agree to it, as Mr. Bayle, who has taken great Pains to prove it, That Men do not reason and act always according to their Principles; and perhaps has much deviated from his Subject. A Pagan may, for Example, prostitute his Daughter upon some Festival in Honour of the Gods, and for all that be honest in his Business, a religious Observer of his Promises, serviceable, charitable, &c. for Fear of the Gods. They are usually some special Notions of Religion which make Impressions upon Men, and which determine to do Good or Evil; but the general Notion of a Deity, that he punishes Vice and rewards Virtue, works more effectually upon them; a Notion to affecting Mens Minds, that it often hinders the Effects that bad Principles would have upon such as profess Religion. But I shall say little more in this Matter; yet tho' I have enlarged myself beyond the Bounds of a Note, I can't but add something more about it; Mr. Bayle who has quoted that Passage of Grævus, upon which our Author criticizes, explains it thus (Continuat. &c. p. 768.) We should be obliged to follow the Law of Nature, if we supposed that there were no GOD nor Providence; but his way of expressing himself, viz. Hæc locum aliquem habent, etiam si dæremus, &c. shews, that he means no more than what's expressed in my Note. I know not what Mr. Bayle means by these Words, Law and Obligation; but in the Language of the Philosophers, a Law supposes a Superior, and Jus comes from Jubeo, because Right and Law proceed from the Authority of a Superior. Our Author, as I think, has very well proved in the foregoing Chapter, §. 20. and Lib. i. Ch. vi. §. 7, 8. That Man's Will cannot impose any Obligation, properly so called, upon itself, and that Maxims of Reason are not sufficient of themselves to determine the Will necessarily this Way or that Way. All that Mr. Bayle says, proves only, 1. That an Atheist knows that Thankfulness and Ingratitude are two different Things, as are also Faithfulness and Deceitfulness, a Circle and a Triangle. 2. He can perceive that the Maxims of Virtue are not purely arbitrary, but that they have a Foundation in the Nature of Things, and imply a certain Convenience. But can that alone make him certainly follow those Maxims contrary to his private Interest, and the Bent of his Desire? I can't think it can ever come into an Atheist's Mind, much less, that he shall have Courage to sacrifice his earnest Passions to those fine Notions. He may think it becomes a reasonable Creature to conform to Reason; but from the Moment that these Maxims of Reason are opposed by the Enjoyment of any Pleasure, in which he promises himself more Satisfaction than he at present enjoys, he'll silence his Reason, and follow the Allurements of Sense. Let us speak the Truth, supposing the Impiety of the Atheist, he does not act unreasonably in following the Voice of Nature, those Words, according to Mr. Bayle, are (Continuat. &c. p. 31.) “ We must “ eat and drink well, enjoy all the Pleasures of Sense, prefer our own Interest before another's, accommodate ourselves to every Thing that is agreeable, to do a Wrong rather than suffer any, to revenge ourselves, &c.” See more against Mr. Bayle in Mr. Bernard's Extract of his Continuation, &c. in his Nævus from the Rep. of Letters, March 1705. and in his Dispute against Mr. Bayle, April 1707. Art. 3. May, Art. 4. June, Art. 3. August, Art. 3. and September, Art. 4.

5 We may add to this, That tho' the Christian Religion be not observed as it ought, insomuch that there is little or no Difference between the Manners of Christians and Pagans, yet Christianity has divers great Advantages above Paganism, as Mr. Le Clerc has made it appear, in his Treatise of Indelicity, Part ii. Ch. v. p. 222. To the Examples that he has produc'd, to shew the good Effects of the Christian Religion, we may add this very remarkable one, that by it the Custom of exposing Infants is utterly abolished, which was to much used by the Greeks and Romans, as Mr. Noël in his Julius Paulus shews.

Religion, of good Manners, and of human Society, which it is in an high manner the Interest of Mankind, to see absolutely rooted up, and banish'd out of the World. Such is that Fanfy of the Stoical Fate, or the unchangeable Courfe and Wheel of Things and Actions; by which Men are made only the Tools or Engines of their own Operations, it not being in their Power to manage them with any Freedom of Choice, or with any Direction of Counsel. For admitting this Hypothesis, it doth not appear, why the Actions of a Man should be morally imputed to him, rather than the Motion of a Clock to the Wheels by which it is perform'd, or what would be the use of Religion, what the Equity of Laws and of Punishments. Seneca Oedip. ver. 1028.

And the Night-wandering Hag's.—

Zeno (in Diog. Laert. l. vii.) retorted this Objection very pleasantly, tho' he did not refute it: As he was correcting his Slave who had been catch'd in a piece of Thievery, the Fellow in way of Excuse told him, Truly 'twas his Fate to steal: Yes, says Zeno, 'twas your Fate too to be beat for it. Marcus Antoninus gives a more serious Judgment on the Point ², The Gods (says he, l. ii. c. 11.) have put it into every Man's Power and Choice, to avoid whatever is truly Evil. There is an Opinion nearly allied to this, which supposes the Consequences of Causes and of Effects, or the great Chain of Things establish'd by the Creator, to stand by such an immovable Decree, that GOD hath left himself no liberty of interposing in particular Cases. Thus all Miracles, all extraordinary Assurances of Heaven, all Effects of Prayers, of Repentance, and of Amendment, seem to be entirely cut off at one Stroke. To this we may join that ancient and wildly receiv'd Persuasion, that the Positions of the Stars laid an indispenfable necessity on human Actions and Events; or that the Hour of Nativity determin'd the whole Proceedings of Life. Which Mamilius, one of the Assertors of it, thus delivers, l. iv. c. 79, &c.

Mr. Creech.

And this Superstition still bewitcheth a great part of the Eastern World, where no Business of Moment is undertaken without consulting the Astrologers, that they may read, as the Phrase is, what is written in Heaven. ³ To which purpose Father Bernier tells a pleasant Story of a Gardiner of Abas King of Persia, who rooting up some Trees which the King, by Direction of his Astrologer, had planted in a fortunate Hour, and being thereupon rebuked, turning to the Astrologer, Sure, says he, you was out in your Calculation: For these Trees could never have the benefit of lucky Stars, which were set at Noon, and unfortunately pull'd up at Night.

Another Relation like this, he gives us of a certain Slave, a Run-away from Goa, who set up in the City Dehli for an expounder of the Stars, and foretold many strange Events with good Confidence to the People: Every now and then looking upon his Mariner's Compass and his Hour Book, as the noble Instruments of his Art. When some who had formerly a Knowledge of him, declar'd their Wonder at his new Profession and Equipment, his Reply was, A tal Bestias, tal Astrologer, For such Beasts, such an Astrologer. But all this kind of Astrology is really nothing else, but a specious way of cheating ignorant People of their Money, undertaken by some confident Knaves, who in their talk of future Occurrences are not so much supported by their own Arts, as by the Credulity of their Hearers: If Things fall out as they boldly guess'd, they presently rise in Honour and Credit with the Multitude; if Matters go otherwife, their Predictions are easily forgot, and so their Mistakes make no noise. Tacitus, Hist. l. i. c. 22. calls the Pretenders to Astrology, Gentes hominum potentibus infidum, sperantibus fallax: "A Pack of Men unfaithful to the great, and disappointing to all of eager Hopes and Desires. Add, Hobbes de Homine, c. 14. f. 12. Agathias, l. i. c. 1. I cannot believe that the Cause of Evil is fix'd in the Course of the Stars, and in the fatal Appointment of unconceivable Necessity. For if the power of Fate every where prevails, all free election of Man's Will is destroy'd; and with it, all Precepts, all Arts, all Discipline must come to nothing; and those who have led pious and virtuous Lives, will be depriv'd of their future Expectation. Nor do I think it allowable to ascribe mutual Wounds and Slaughter to the Deities. Vid. Grot. de Veritate Rel. Christianæ, l. iv. f. 11. Now besides the other numerous ill Consequences of such a Superstition, this Mischieff follows of Course, that whilst Men are continually gaping at the Stars, they have neither Leisure nor Inclination to guide their Lives by the Rules of sound Reason. Helen says wisely in Euripides, Hel. ver. 763.

³ Our Author might have spared himself the Pains of reciting these two Stories.

Statius, Theb. iii. 562. 4.

Quid crastina volveret etas
Scire nefas homini. Nos pravum ac debile vulgus Scrutamur penitus superos: hinc pallor & iræ, Hinc metus, infidæque, & nulla modestia voti.

What future Years shall bring to pass
'Tis Sin to know. We a weak, puny Race, Examine Heav'n, and ransack Jove's Decrees, Wisely to antedate our Miseries.
Hence all our Mischiefs spring, our Rage, our Fears,
Our treach'rous Wiles, and our immodest Prayers.

Most pernicious likewise is that Conceit, which makes GOD to allow a kind of Market of Sins, so as to let them be bought off with Money or other Presents, or perhaps with some vain Ceremonies and set Forms of Speech, without Amendment of Life. No less absurd is it to imagine, that GOD Almighty is delighted with such Inventions of Men, such Institutions and Ways of Living, as are disagreeable to human and civil Society, as it is temper'd by the Dictates of Reason and the Laws of Nature. Such may we reckon the greatest part of the Monastical Orders, which we find in vast Numbers, not only in Christendom, but amongst the Turks and the Heathens. We should also carefully avoid all such unworthy and superstitious Notions, as debase and dishonour the Divine Nature or Worship. Every sensible Man ought to be as ^s Antoninus says his Father was, Θεοσεβής χωρίς δεισιδαιμονίας ^a, Devout without Superstition ^b.

'Tis another wicked Opinion, that the bare Exercise of Piety towards GOD is sufficient, without any regard had to Honesty, and to those other Duties which are to be practis'd towards our Neighbours: As if the External of Divine Worship, when exactly perform'd, were able to make amends for a Course of Injustice toward other Men: Or, as if it were lawful to scrape up Money in our Life-time, by all Means and Methods, good or bad, provided at our Death we leave somewhat to be spent in pious Uses ^c. Nor less unreasonable is the Fausy, that a single Man should be able not only to fulfil his own Duty to GOD, but to transfer some of his Merits on others; as if one Person's Negligence in his Duty was to be supplied by the over Righteousness of another. Of the same Stamp is that vain Conjecture, that upon account of the Satisfaction and the Merit of CHRIST, we have a less Obligation lying on us to Probity and Sanctity of Manners; and that the Hope of those Blessings furnishes us with a Security of sinning. He who believes that his own Offences shall be forgiven him for the sake of another's Deserts, can scarce be hinder'd from sinking into the basest Dissoluteness, unless he be at the same time fully persuaded, that there is still an Obligation incumbent on him, to apply all his Endeavours to the Practice of a most holy Life.

Farther, It is no less a pestilent than brutal Opinion, to pretend that the Wickedness of some Actions is excus'd with GOD, upon account of their Dexterity or Humour; and that some Sins pass only for Jest in the Cognizance of Heaven. As the old Poets feign'd their Deities to take no notice of the Perjury of Lovers, and to forgive their Thefts and treacherous Intrigues ^d. Nay, their Madnes proceeded so far, that they were not afraid to introduce their heavenly Powers as the Actors of detestable Villanies; assigning so many Tutelar Gods to have the Care, as it were, and the Guidance of so many particular kinds of Wickedness. Now the Argument which Fulgentius ^e draws hence is right and conclusive: If there were any Deities (says he, meaning Mercury and Laverna) presiding over Robberies, how could those Actions be criminal before human Judges, which had Divine Authors and Patrons to defend them? Euripides disputes as well on the same Point, Ione, ver. 449, &c.

Οὐκ ἔστ' ἀνθρώπων κακῶς
Λέγειν δίκαιον, εἰ παρ' ἑὸν Θεῶν κακῶς Μιμέμεθ', ἀλλὰ τὸς δεισιπνοῦτας ταυτε.

If Human Vices are but Transcripts drawn From Deeds Divine, and Copies set in Heaven, Should Men be blam'd who act what they are taught, Or those immortal Guides who teach 'em wrong?

Nor was the poor Indian much out in his Inference, who when a Spaniard boasted to him, that he was a Christian, a Son of the great Creator of Heaven and Earth, whose Laws he came there to publish and proclaim, answer'd him to this effect: If 'tis by Command of your God, that you thus invade other Mens Dominions, and there spoil, burn, kill, and commit all other Wickedness at pleasure; you may rest assur'd, that we will not on any account believe in such a God, or receive his Ordinances amongst us.

It is wicked likewise to believe, that those Prayers can please GOD, by which a Man desires that others may suffer an undeserv'd Evil, for the promoting or the occasioning of an Advantage to himself. As suppose, if the Inhabitants of a Sea-coast should pray, that many Shipwrecks might happen on their Shore. Nor do I take those solemn Sup-plications to contain much more Holiness, which are perform'd, either upon the engaging in an unjust War, or upon any Success obtain'd in it. Those Persons too must needs lie under a great Mistake, who fancy the Breach of some Precept of Natural Law to be a part of Divine Worship. As they who are for treating in a hostile Manner, all such as differ from them in Persuasion; who assert that Religion is to be propagated by the Sword; that no Faith is to be kept with Men of a contrary Profession, no political Friendship (as they call it) and no Offices of Humanity to be exercis'd towards them, but that they are to be avoided even in common Conversation, as unholy and unclean; that Violence, Wickedness, Treason, Perfidiousness, Sedition and Rebellion, are not only lawful, but commendable, if undertaken on a religious Account⁷. To conclude, the following Opinions are not of less fatal Effect, than those which we have already mention'd: That it imports nothing to solid Felicity, whether a Man apply himself to a virtuous or to a vicious Life, and that good Men are⁸ entitled to no better State or Condition than the Wicked. That the highest Pleasure a Man can expect or obtain, is the present Gratification of his Senses; and that the Soul perishes with the Body. Lastly, that all Law, even that which we call natural, is a meer human Device, not referable to GOD as the Author of it, nor deriving from him its Force and Sanctity. These therefore, and such like Notions, are entirely to be rooted up out of human Minds, in as much as they destroy our Duty to Almighty GOD, and prevent or intercept all Endeavours of conforming our Life and Manners to the Guidance of good Reason.

V. When this principal Care is over, the main Concern behind is for a Man accurately to examine his own Nature, and to study to know himself. An Enquiry which Antiquity so much valued as the Forerunner of true Wisdom, that Γινώσι σεαυτόν was thought an Inscription worthy to be set in Letters of Gold, and consecrated in the Delphian Temple.² On which Tully hath given us this Comment, The Precept of Apollo, says he, in *which he enjoins us to know our selves, doth not mean, that we should be careful in knowing our Limbs, our Stature, or our Figure; for our Bodies indeed are not our selves. But when the Oracle says, Know your Self, it says in Effect, Know your own Mind and Soul. For the Body is no more than the Soul's Vessel or Receptacle. And no Action is properly done by your self, but what proceeds from your better and nobler Part³. Now from this Knowledge of himself rightly pursu'd, a Man is brought to understand his Condition, and the Office he is to bear in the World: Whilst he apprehends, that he did not exist of himself, but ow'd his Original and Being to a much Sublimier Principle; that he is endow'd with far more noble Faculties, than he sees enjoy'd by the Beasts about him; lastly, that he was not born by himself, nor purely for his own Service, but that he is a part of human Kind, and is oblig'd to behave himself sociably towards other Men. And from these Fountains may easily be drawn the compleat Knowledge of human Duty. Vid. Marc. Antonin. l. x. s. 6. ³ *Perf. Sat. iii. 71.

It belongs likewise to our understanding our selves⁴, to know our own Power, and how far it extends, either in exerting our Actions, or informing our Designs^b. And farther, what is the true Effect and Consequence of every Practice; and what Respect and Use the Things without us have to our selves and to our Happiness.

VI. From this Knowledge it follows, that a Man must apprehend his Subjection to Almighty GOD, and the Obligation which lies upon him, according to the Measure of the Gifts he hath receiv'd, both to celebrate the Divine Majesty, and to shew himself a sociable Creature in his Transactions with his Fellows. And in as much as GOD hath bestow'd on him the Light of Understanding, he

⁴ “ This great Precept is often alludg'd in Plato, Mind thy own Business, and know thy Self. Each of these Sentences contains in general our whole Duty, and seems to include the other. He that will do his own Business, must learn this Lesson first, to know himself, and he that knows himself, will not undertake any Business as his own, that he is not acquainted with; for if he loves and takes care of himself, he'll refuse needless Employments and unprofitable Thoughts and Proposals ” ought certainly to conclude, that he is not to do every thing at Random, and ¹ without End or Design, but that whatever he undertakes, he should first weigh the Matter in hand, and regulate his Method of proceeding about it ^a. And consequently, that he propose an End ² agreeable to his Nature, and rightly moderate and direct both his own Actions, and all other due Means towards the Attainment of that End. And this in such a Manner, that he neither proceed in the Application of the Means, before the End is fix'd and determin'd; nor settle such an End as he must afterwards want Means to arrive at. Another Inference closely ally'd to this is, that since Truth and Right are always uniform and without Alteration, so he ought always to form the same Judgments of the same Things, and when he hath once judg'd truly, to be always constant in his Mind and Resolution. Farther, that his Will and his Appetite do not get the Start of ³ Good Judgment, but follow and obey it; never making Resistance to its Decrees ⁴. For he who observes this Course of Proceeding, will be sure to act with Prudence, with Constancy, and with Moderation. He will make it his chief Aim and Rule, as Lucan describes Cato, ii. 381.

But Wisdom is incomparably much more advantageous and valuable than Happiness or Prosperity: So that this Sentence makes nothing to our Author's Purpose, who is proving, That Wisdom is the Means to arrive at Happiness. Nevertheless I thought fit to observe, that this Passage of Sophocles is explained, as I have understood it, in the Greek Comment of Triclinius; for others follow an Explication which to me seems not true, and which they embraced, without being aware that πρωτων has sometimes a comparative Signification.

VII. If a Man thus rightly apprehend and consider his own Strength and Power, he will discover that it is of a finite Nature, having certain Limits, beyond which it can never extend itself; and therefore, that there are many Things in the World which we cannot manage or compass, as many that he cannot hinder or resist. Other Matters there are which do not absolutely exceed human Power, but which may be intercepted and prevented by the Opposition of other Causes. And a third Kind of Things we cannot compass by our bare Strength, nor assisted by Dexterity and Address. Applicable to these Reflections is the famous old Distinction of the Stoicks, dividing Things into τὰ ἐφ' ἡμῖν, and τὰ ἔκ ἐφ' ἡμῖν, those in our Power, and those without or beyond it. What seems to be most under our Command, is our own Will, and the Power of that Faculty in exerting Actions proper to our Species of Being. For although the Will hath some cross and stubborn Principles adherent to it, which bend and ply it continually from its due Equilibrium, yet hath a Man nothing in his whole Nature more nearly and closely tied to him, nothing which is less capable of being hindred by external Powers, and therefore nothing, the Motions of which do more properly belong to his Person, and may accordingly be imputed. Hence it follows, that every Man ought to make it his main Care and Concern, rightly to employ his Force and Abilities, in conformity to the Rules of Reason: At least to settle a constant Resolution of discharging, as far as in him lies, every thing which seems agreeable to his Duty, and to the Design of his Being. For this is the Test by which we are to rate the Worth of every Person, and to measure his intrinſical Goodneſs and Excellency. ¹ Arrian. Epiſt. l. i. c. 1. What therefore, on the whole Matter, are we to do? To improve, and to put to the beſt uſe thoſe Things which are in our Power, and to deal with other Things as their Natures ² require.

VIII. As to the other Matters which lie without us, we are ſo far to employ ourſelves about them, as they do not ſurpaſs our Strength, as they tend to a lawful End, and are worth the Labour which we ſpend in the Purſuit. For Things above us, a wiſe Man will not loſe his Hopes and his Pains upon them; he will reckon it folly to endeavour with vaſt Toil the Attainment of ſuch an End, which he knows his own Force, together with the Aſſiſtances he expects, unable to compaſs: Or unleſs he be at leaſt certain that the very Probability of obtaining the End is of more Conſequence than any other Effect, which he could without queſtion have produced at the ſame Time, and with the ſame Labour. ¹ Other Things he will leave to the Direction of Providence, and will compoſe his Mind as well as he is able, ² for a peaceful Acquieſcence in every Event. He will not ³ vainly diſquiet himſelf on the Account of Evils which either have already happen'd, or may hereafter fall out without his Fault: And ſo he will cut off the greateſt Part of human Troubles which are wont to be produced either by vain Hope driving us on ill Deſigns, or by the more violent Motions of Grief, Anger, or Fear ⁴.

From theſe Conſiderations this farther Conſequence may be drawn; that Man, as he is guided only by the Light of Reaſon, ought not to frame to himſelf, or to aſpire after any other Happineſs in this World, than ſuch as ariſes from the prudent Government of his Faculties, and from thoſe Aſſiſtances and Supports, which we are ſure the Divine Providence will afford us in the univerſal Adminiſtration of Things. From the ſame Principles we may infer, that as we are not to leave Things to meer Hazard and Chance, whiſt there is any room for human Caution and Foreſight; ſo when we have done all that lies in our Power, we cannot enſure an Event which doth not depend on our Direction, and of which ⁵ we have no certain Knowledge till it actually happen. As Iphierates us'd to ſay, 'twas unworthy of a General to ſay, I did not think it; ſo 'tis below a wiſe Man to make the like ſorry Reflection. It was a good Wiſh of the Poet, Ov. Ep. ii. 85.

————— Careat ſucceſſibus opto Quisquis ab eventu facta notanda putat.

————— Ne'er may Succesſes bleſs
The Man who meaſures Actions by Succesſ.

Yet this abſurd Opinion is ſo ſtrong and ſo univerſal among the Mahometans, that they take good Succesſ to be an infallible Argument of the Juſtice of a Cauſe, and an open Sign of the Approbation of Heaven. Whereas ſuch a Notion is indeed to be rank'd amongſt the ridiculous Follies of the loweſt and moſt ignorant Vulgar. For 'tis evident to any Perſon of common Senſe ⁶, that as Juvenal ſays, Sat. xiii. 103.

Ille crucem pretium ſceleris tulit, hic diadema.*

That Sins alike unlike Rewards have found,
And whiſt this Villain's hang'd, the other's crown'd.

Hence likewise we learn, that as it is the Part of a wiſe Man, not to bound his Sight at the Things before him, but to extend his Conſideration and his View to Things to come, and to drive on his well-form'd Reſolution with his whole Strength, without ſuffering either the Threats of Fear, or the Flatteries of Pleaſure to turn him aſide: So is it as ſure a Mark of a Fool to drive directly againſt the Stream, and not rather

We may enlarge and prolong them by our Thoughts, yea, ſo incorporate them beforehand in ourſelves, and entertain them, tho' we have not truly any Senſe of them. They diſturb us enough whenever they come (ſays one of the Leaders, not of the tendereſt, but hardeſt Sects) therefore favour thyſelf. Believe what thou loveſt beſt. to accommodate his Inclinations to the Events, when they will not conform themselves to his Inclinations^a. Lastly, since human Foresight is so weak in discovering future Things, and since they are very far from being under our Guidance, though they frequently fall out well beyond our Hopes and Expectations^b; hence it is plain, that we ought neither too securely to trust our present Condition, nor to spend too much Care and Anxiety on what is to come. And for the same reason Insolence in Prosperity, and Despair in Adversity, are to be both avoided as equally dangerous and equally absurd. 'Twould be easy to illustrate this Doctrine with endless Testimonies of Authors. Take the following for a Specimen. Arrian. Epist. l. ii. c. 1. In Things which do not depend upon our Election, let us be bold and venturous, but in Things which are capable of Choice and Counsel, let us be timorous and cautious^c. Juvenal, Sat. x. 365.

IX. Another necessary Part of human Improvement, is to be able to set a just Price on those Things which are the chief in moving our Appetites. Because from the exact Worth and Value of them we are to judge how far we may justly labour to be concern'd about them. Amongst these, that which appears with most Figure and Splendor, and which is most capable of soliciting elevated and noble Souls, is the Opinion of Worth and Excellency, the Foundation of Glory and of Praise. Now as to this Concern, we are in such a manner to form and dispose our Mind, as to endeavour as far as possible the procuring and the preserving that kind of Esteem which is ² simply so call'd, being the bare good Opinion of good Men: Inasmuch as this regularly flows from the Observance of the Law of Nature, and of our Duty: And because the Want of it may lay open an Occasion to a thousand Mischiefs and Inconveniences³. And if this good Reputation be assaulted by the Lies and Calumnies of wicked Men, we are to spare no Labour in restoring it to its Primitive Purity. But when it is not in our Power to overcome Slander, or to stifle the false Conceptions that the World may entertain about us, we are to comfort ourselves³ with the Testimony of a good Conscience, and with the Assurance that our Integrity is still known to God^b.

As for that Esteem, which we usually term Intensive, as Honour and Glory, we are so far to pursue it, as it redounds from worthy Actions, agreeable to Reason, and promoting the Good of human Society; and as far as it opens a wider Field for such generous Undertakings. But how large a Share soever we obtain of these Favours, and even by honest Means, good heed is to be taken that our Mind doth not swell with Arrogance and Vain-glory⁴. Much more foolish and ridiculous is it to boast of, and to value ourselves upon, what is empty and vain, and gives no solid Proof of our Worth. Therefore *Demonax*es in Lucian, when he saw a Fellow priding himself in the Wideness of his Purple, Hark you, Friend (says he) a Sheep us'd to carry this fine Burthen before you, and yet was still but a Sheep. But when we want Occasions and Opportunities of shewing our Worth, and are not able to procure them, we must bear this ill Fortune with Patience, since there is nothing in it that can be charg'd upon our Default⁵. On the other hand, it appears to be at the same time wicked and foolish, to affect and usurp the external Ensigns of Honour, when the inward Foundations of it are wanting: As it is detestable Madness to aspire to Fame and to Honours by evil Arts, and by Deeds repugnant to Reason; and to desire the shining above others, only to be able to insult over them, and to make them obnoxious to our Pleasure. Lastly, Since we are not always allow'd the Liberty of building our Fortune as we please, since it must sometimes depend on external Causes; our Mind is to be put into such a Temper, as when we have once done our best, to rest satisfied with the Lot that falls to our Share; and to look on those Things which we are not able to compass and to obtain, as Matters which do not concern us, and which therefore are not worthy our Grief or our Anger⁶.

Nemo mihi videtur pluris aestimare virtutem, nemo illi magis esse devotus, quam qui viri boni famam perdidit, ne conscientiam perderet, i. e.* "When I can't shew my Gratitude unless I expose myself to the Disgrace of being thought ungrateful, and I can't be thought to do a Kindness, but it will be taken for an Injury; I will still persist sincerely in my honest Design to execute it, though I wade through Disgrace. Virtue the Tribute scorns of vulgar Eyes,
And in herself her richest Portion lies.
With native Rays she shines, nor owes a Beam

But Temp'rance is the Health of Joys.
Happy the Man whose middle State,
Fearing to tempt the Tide of Fate,
Securely guides with wary Oar
His humble Bark along the Shore.

X. For the better maintaining and preserving himself in the World, a Man hath likewise need of external Goods and Possessions; as it is frequently a Part of our Duty to provide them for others. Concerning which, it is the Command of Reason and Nature, that we endeavour the Procurement of them, so far as is consistent with our Strength, our Opportunities, and our Honesty. The Ant which Virgil^a makes so prudent a Pro-vider for Old Age, is even in the Divine Writings propos'd amongst the Examples of harmless Industry^b. But because our Wants are not infinite, but lie in a very little Compass, therefore we must moderate our Desire and our Pursuit of these Things, according to the just Occasions of Nature, and the Measure of Sobriety. Socrates in Diogenes Laertius, when he us'd to see the prodigious Quantity of Goods expos'd to Sale in the publick Places, would cry out, Πόσων ἐγὼ χρείαν ἐν ἔργῳ; What a number of Things are there here which I do not want! *Juv. In stifling Chests your Wealth is not confin'd, Nor, lent on greedy Use, torments your Mind;
But nobly spreads, on decent Ends employ'd,
By Moderation, and with Art enjoy'd^b.

We are farther to consider, that Nature is not wanting in a plentiful Provision for the Necessities of her Sons^c. That the Riches which we hoard up for future use, are expos'd in the mean time to a thousand Dangers, and sometimes give us more trouble in keeping them, than they gave us Labour in getting them^d. Lastly, that whatever we leave heap'd together, at our Death, must fall to an Heir, who may not only be unworthy of the Gift, but may despise and deride the Giver^e. As therefore an honest Occasion of acquiring Riches is not to be neglected, so the Mind ought to be put into so even a Temper, as not to lose it self, if it should happen to lose them. Horace hath taught us the best way of dealing with Fortune: Od. iii. 29.

*Laudo manentem; si celeres quatit
Pennas, resigno que dedit, & meâ Virtute me involvo; probamq; Pauperiem sine dote quero.*

Which a great and noble Wit hath thus most happily paraphras'd:
Let her love whom she please, I scorn to woo her;
Whilst she stays with me, I'll be civil to her;

Stop then your swelling Riches as they grow;
And let base Want with its Retinue, show,
At greater Distance, a less dreadful Foe.
Cease your vain Care, let all your Labours cease,
When your large Wish is crown'd with full Success.

I would not labour to abound
In what I might with no less Care,
Like a base Miser or a Spendthrift Heir,
Squander above, or bury under Ground.

The wide Possessor vainly claims Amongst his Titles and his Names,
The Term of Happy, which should bless
The Man that wisely lives on less.

The Miser's ever poor: Thy Wish should fall
On some fix'd End: who has enough, has all.

I'll use my little Store, and freely take Without Concern, what fair Occasions lack.
And let my greedy disappointed Heir Rail when I'm gone, and curse my want of Care.

How vainly wretched do we spend our Years
In useless Labour and in idle Cares?
The Chase of Wealth unwearied we pursue,
And lose the present, for a future View.
But not one thinks how soon his mortal Line
Must sadly break, and end his wild Design.

But

But if she offers once to move her Wings,
I'll fling her back all her vain Gew-gaw Things,
And, arm'd with Virtue, will more glorious stand,
Than if the Bitch still bow'd at my Command.
I'll marry Honesty, though ne'er so poor,
Rather than follow such a dull blind Whore ^a.

As to Expences, we are to use such a Moderation about them, as most willingly to undertake such as our Duty requires of us, and yet not squander our Fortune at a venture, without Necessity and without Reason ^b. For 'tis equally foolish and absurd, not to apply our Riches to the Ends for which they are given us, and vainly to throw them away on inferior Uses and Designs. The former Vice including numerous Breaches of our Duty; the latter leading the direct way to Debt, Poverty, Rapine, Deceit, and a thousand other Enormities and Mischiefs ^c.

XI. In Reference to Pleasure and Pain, 'tis not only the Permission, but the Advice of Reason, that we avoid as much as possible all unnecessary Trouble and Disquiet; and not only endeavour to keep ourselves free from Grief and Disgust, but likewise to entertain our Senses with such Objects as are agreeable and delightful to them ^d. But to a singular and exquisite Gratification of Sense, the Mind is by no means to be accustomed; in as much as this Kind of Epicurism either weakens and enervates a Man, equally oppressing the Vigor of Body and of Soul, and rendering them both unfit for any serious Business; or steals our Time from better and more necessary Employments; or wastes and consumes our Wealth, and our Conveniences of Life; or often, being join'd with some criminal Practice, draws after it no other Train, than Trouble, Danger, Damage, and Disgrace. As therefore 'tis the next degree to Madness, to invite Uneasiness and Torment without use or occasion: So it is very rational to allow ourselves a moderate Taste of lawful and innocent Pleasures, without suffering them to overwhelm and to drown us. But this is to be fix'd as an inviolable Rule, That no Pleasure must be purchas'd at so dear a rate, as the Neglect or the Transgression of our Duty.

XII. The last Care which lies on us in the improving and well-ordering of our Mind, is with our utmost Diligence to maintain its Sovereignty over its own Motions and Affections; the greatest part of which do not only impair the Health of the Body and the Vigor of the Soul, but cast such a Cloud on the Judgment and Understanding, as to wrest them violently from the ways of Reason and of Duty. So that a Coldness of the Passions is, as it were, the natural Principle of Prudence and Probity amongst Men ^e. It may not be amiss to run with some light Remarks through the Particulars. Joy is in itself a Passion most agreeable to Nature. But strict Care is to be taken, that it do not break out on improper Occasions, as upon the Misfortunes of other Men: And likewise, that it do not drive us on any thing that is vain and trifling, or base and indecent. Sorrow ^f is a Canker that wastes alike the Body and the Mind. This therefore is, as much as possible, to be remov'd and expell'd; unless so far as the Offices of Humanity oblige us to express our Concern and Pity at the Misfortunes, or at the Deaths of others; and as it is requisite to the great Business of Repentance. Love is a friendly Motion to Mankind; yet this is so wisely to be manag'd and mo-

§. XI. ¹ Mr. Montagne has some curious Thoughts on this Subject, which are worthy our Observation. "Nature, says he, like an indulgent Mother, has enjoined us no Actions for our Necessities, but what it is a Pleasure to perform; being invited to them, not by our Reason only, but by our Appetite, so that it is Injustice to corrupt those Rules. When I see Cesar and Alexander in the midst of their great Employments, enjoying human and bodily Pleasures so fully, I can't think it was for the Refreshment of the Mind, but to strain it, by introducing those violent Actions and laborious Projects, through greatness of Courage, into an ordinary Course of Life. If they had been thought wise Men, what had been their ordinary Calling? This last. The Extraordinary——That the Soul assists and favours the Body, and does not absolutely refuse to share in its Pleasures, but seems to be delighted with them, it is to preserve a Moderation, as the wiser Part, for fear through Indiscretion Men should turn them into Trouble; for Intemperance is the Bane of Pleasures, and Temperance is so far from being any Abridgment of them, that 'tis a sweetning of them. I direct my Soul to look upon both Grief and Pleasure with a View equally regular and firm, but on the one pleasantly, and on the other sowrely; and, according to its Ability, to be as careful to shorten the one, as enlarge the other. The clear sight of good Things is always attended with a distinct Knowledge of Evil, and Grief hath something unavoidable at the beginning, as Pleasure hath something unavoidable in the end, which may cut off all Excess. Plato (De Legib. Lib. 1. Tom. 2.) couples them together, and will have it the Duty of Courage to encounter Grief and the charming Delights of Pleasure, with equal Bravery. These are the two Fountains at which whoever draws, where, when, and how he ought, whether he be Citizen, Man, or Beast, he is happy. The first he must take as a Medicine, merely for Necessity, and sparingly; the other to satisfy his Thirst, but not to Drunkenness. Grief, Pleasure, Love, and Hatred, are the first Things an Infant feels. If Reason happens to guide them, they follow it, and that is Virtue." Essays, Lib. 3. Chap. ult. There are many other curious Thoughts both before and after. See Porphy. de Vit. Pythag. §. 39. and what I have said in my Treatise of Games, Lib. 1. Chap. 4. §. 8.

² "I neither love nor value this Passion (saith Montagne) although the World set a peculiar Esteem upon it, and gives it a particular Honour. They call it Wisdom, Virtue, and Conscience. Foolish and vain Commendations! The Italians have given it a much properer Name, calling it, a corroding Humour. It is a Quality always noxious, always foolish, and the Stoicks maintain it to be base and cowardly, as their wise Men have ever esteemed it." Essays, Lib. 1. Chap. 2. See also Charron of Wisdom, Lib. 1. Chap. 33. and Lib. 3. Chap. 29.

derated by Reason, that it does not throw itself away on an ill Object; that it does not procure base and unworthy Fuel to its Flame; that it does not hinder the Exercise of other Duties, nor degenerate into Disquiet and Disease: That if it settle on a Thing subject to Loss, or to Corruption, it stick not so closely to it, as upon the Failure of it, to make the Soul unable to recollect and to recover its Force³. ⁴ Hatred is pernicious as well to the Person who employs it, as to him against whom it is employ'd. This therefore is to be diligently quench'd and stifled, lest it betray us to Injuries and Breach of Duty against our Neighbours. And if some Persons do really deserve our Aversion, yet 'twould be still Folly to create, on their account, Uneasiness and Disquiet to our selves. Envy is a most deform'd Monster, sometimes producing ill Effects in others, but always in the envious Person; who like Iron, o'er-run with Rust, not only defiles, but destroys himself continually⁵. Hope, altho' a Passion more easy and mild than others, yet it is to be guided with such a Temper, that it do not make the heart sick; nor, by aiming at Things either vain and⁶ uncertain, or beyond its Strength and Reach, tire itself to no purpose, and become as Aristotle terms it ἔγρηγορότης ἐνύπνιον, a waking Dream: And that we do not fall under Lucretius's Censure and Character;

Fear, as it is a dangerous Enemy to human Minds, so is it a Motion⁸ altogether usefess and unserviceable. For that good Caution which some make to be the Product of it, may arise without its Assistance from a wary Circumspection, and from a Prudence alike untouch'd with Anxiety, or with Consternation. Anger is a most destructive as well as a most violent Passion; which is to be resisted with our utmost Strength and Endeavour. And whereas⁹ some alledge in its Favour, that it excites our Valour, and confirms our Constancy in Dangers; its Effect is indeed directly contrary, for it binds a Man's Spirit and Courage, and drives him headlong to his Ruin¹⁰; ¹¹. *Anger*¹², is the most improvident Thing in the World: and seldom acts but what we afterwards repent of. Nearly related to Anger is the¹³ Desire of Revenge, which when it exceeds a moderate Defence of ourselves

Our Author here affirms, that the Maxim of Euripides agrees exactly to a Subject contrary to what he applies it to, I mean Hatred and Enmity, and that it ought rather to be looked upon as a Precept, not to make too great a Number of Friends. Whereas the Poet only condemns such an Excess of Familiarity as causes us to carry our Kindness beyond the Bounds of Duty, and makes the Loss of the Thing loved intolerable. This is evident from the Verses following, which are an Explication of the foregoing:

¹³ Marcus Antoninus says, "Αἰεὶ τὸ τὸς ἀμύνασαι, τὸ μὴ ἐξομῶσαι." The best way of revenging ourselves is, not to resemble him that has done us an Injury." See what is said in the following Chapter. Seneca has a proper Passage for our Purpose, of which our Author quotes a part elsewhere: Non enim ut in beneficiis honestum est, merita meritis repensare, ita injuriis injuriis; illic vinci turpe est, sic vincere. Inhumanum verbum est, & quidem pro justo receptum, Ultio, & à contumelia non differt, nisi ordine. Qui dolorem regerit, tantum excusatus peccat. Magni animi est, injurias despiciere, ultionis contume-

and of our Dependents or Concerns, and a just Assertion of our Rights against the Invaders of them, turns, beyond dispute, into a Vice ^a.

XIII. In such Duties then, as we have already reckon'd up, doth that culture of the Mind chiefly consist, which all are obliged to undertake, and in the implanting and enforcing which those Persons ought to employ especial Care and Concern, who have the Information and Institution of others committed to their Care. For the want of this Improvement, or the Disposition directly contrary to it, are both repugnant to human Duty, and lay such a Rub in our Way, as it is not easy to get over. And therefore whoever is found destitute of such a necessary Perfection, justly falls under common Censure and Reproach.

There is still behind ¹ a more peculiar culture of the Mind, consisting in the various Knowledge of Things, and of Arts and Disciplines. This cannot be absolutely necessary to the Discharge of our Duty in general: And therefore every one is to moderate his Pursuit of them, according to his own Capacities and Occasions, according to the Causes which drive him on such Searches, and the Fruits which he may fairly hope to obtain from them. Now as for those Arts which administer to the Necessities and to the Conveniences of human Life, no Man can raise a Doubt about their Excellency and Use. But concerning the Study of Letters, many have been so bold as to maintain, that Learning is not only useless, but destructive to Mankind; and that for this Reason we find it to have been forbidden in so many Commonwealths, above the degree of reading, writing, and managing Accompts. Every one knows the common Reproaches that are cast on Scholars: Of their unfitness for Business, their weakness of Courage, and of civil Prudence, their awkwardness in Gesture, and in Converse; with a thousand more Reflections of the same Nature, which some Men have thought themselves very eloquent in setting out ^b.

Now to come at the Truth of this Question, and to know how to set a just Value on such Attainments, let us first lay this down for an undoubted Principle, that to the acquiring of Wisdom and Prudence, bare Letters are by no means sufficient, without a native Excellency of Soul. If this Happiness be wanting, we can no more produce Wisdom by scholastic Institution, than we can procure a rich Harvest of Corn by ploughing on the barren Sands. For 'tis one thing to be a great Reader, and another to be a prudent Man^c. And Quintilian's Judgment is right, when he obliosissimum genus est, non esse visum dignum, ex quo peteretur ultio. Multi leves injurias altius sibi demiserunt, dum vindicant; ille magnus & nobilis est, qui, more magna fera, latratus minorum canum securus exaudit. Minus, inquit, contemnemur, si vindicaverimus injuriam. Si tanquam ad remedium venimus, sine ira veniamus, non quasi dulce sit vindicari, sed quasi utile. Saepe autem satius fuit dissimulare, quam ulcisci, i. e. "We must not behave ourselves under Injuries as under Benefits. These 'tis good to requite, but the other dishonest; there 'tis a Shame to be overcome, here to overcome. Revenge is an inhuman Word, though the Thing which it signifies is looked upon commonly as just and innocent. It differs nothing from an Injury, but in Time. The Aggressor does the first Injury, and he that revenges himself does another in his Turn; this last is but little more excusable than the former. A great and generous Soul contemns Injuries. The most injurious Revenge, and most mortifying to the Aggressor, is to be judged unworthy of Revenge. Many Men in revenging a small Injury, have gained nothing but an Affront more smarting and hard to be forgotten. A Lion hears the Barkings of little Whelps without Regard. But you'll say, By revenging ourselves we prevent others Contempt of us: Very well. But if you use Revenge as a Remedy, do it without Passion and Anger, and behave yourselves, not as if you delighted in it, but as a thing profitable. Nevertheless we must own that it is more advantageous often to dissemble an Injury than to revenge it." De Ira, Lib. 2. Chap. 32. See Justus Lipsius's Notes on it.

§. XIII. ¹ We may find several curious Remarks upon this Subject in Mr. Buddeus's Discourse, entitled, De cultura Ingenii, which is the fifth among his Selecta Jur. Nat. & Gent.

² Among the Passages here collected together by our Author, there are two nothing to the Purpose; viz. The first is of Plato, whom our Author makes to say, That a young Man of honest Condition ought not to apply himself to any Science in a servile Way. His Words are, Nullam disciplinam ingenium serviliter oportet discere. In which he seems to mean, That the Study of Philosophy is only agreeable to Slaves. But this is not the Sense of Plato in that Place: He only speaks of the Manner of teaching Youth the Sciences: He will not have any Constraint or Force to be used with Children, or have them treated like Slaves, but to be instructed with pleasure; because, as he says, what is put into them by Force can't remain long; besides he adds, by alluring them, their Dispositions are better known. Ὅτι (ὡς δ' ἐγὼ) ἐδέν μάθημα μὲ δουλείας ἢ ἐλεύθερον χρῆμα δάσκει, οἱ μὲ γὰρ τὰ σώματα πείσοι, βία πειθήσοι, χεῖρον ἐδέν τὸ σῶμα ἀποχρῆζονται. Ψυχὴ δὲ βίαιον ἐδέν ἔμμενον μάθημα - - - Μὴ πείσοι βία - - - τὰς παῖδας ἐν τῆς μαθήματι, ἀλλὰ παίζοντας πέσοι, ἵνα καὶ μάλλον οἴσθαι τὴν καθεσθῆναι, ἐφ' ᾧ ἔχασθαι πέσοιεν, De Rep. Lib. 7. Tom. 2. This is the very Notion which Mr. Locke has so well maintain'd in his Treatise, Of Education of Children; see chiefly §. 73, &c. and §. 131. of the last Edition at Frankfort in 1708. Plato is so far from discouraging any from the study of the Sciences, that he tells us particularly in that Book, what those are that Children ought to learn early, and says, with Reason, that they that cry down Philosophy, as of no Use to the Vulgar, never understood it; and that most of those that meddle with it are not well qualified for it. We will also rehearse some Words of the same Philosopher, and so the Heedlessness of this Author will give an Opportunity to produce some Quotations, which contain some remarkable Thoughts, viz. Τὸ γὰρ νῦν ἀμάχημα (ὡς δ' ἐγὼ) καὶ ἡ ἀίμα φιλοσοφία. δια ταῦτα προσπέτωκεν (ὁ καὶ) ἀρετῆς ἐπιπέτωκε ἐπὶ καὶ ἀξίαν αὐτῆς ἀπένονται, καὶ γὰρ νόθος ἐδέν ἀπένεται, ἀλλὰ γινώσκεις. The other Passage unforcly applied is, Seneca's Hippol. c. 459, 460. where we may plainly see that he is speaking of a clear different Thing, than of a Mind not adorn'd with the Study of Philosophy.

erves,

serves^a, that Prudence can do more without Learning, than Learning without Prudence. Therefore that Persons naturally foolish and stupid are not turn'd into great Sages by the Application of liberal Studies, doth no more detract from the Excellency of solid Learning, than it doth from the Efficacy of Medicines, that they are not able to recover dead Men. To him that bath shall be given, Matth. xxv. 29⁴. And Learning, as Horace says, *Vim promovet instita*⁵; and where that vis instita, that natural Vigor is wanting, the other Gift is vainly bestow'd.

We may observe farther, that as Learning cannot alter native Folly, so neither can it reform a native Disposition to Wickedness and to Impiety; which, on the contrary, grow more incurable by its Application, drawing thence a Supply of Arms for their open Defence. 'Tis a Remark of Hobbes^b, that without Learning it is impossible for any Man to become either excellently wise, or (unless his Memory be hurt by Disease, or ill Constitution of Organs) excellently foolish^c.

But the whole Course of those Pursuits which pass under the Name of Learning, is not all of the same Nature, and therefore should not be all rated at the same Price. We may divide Learning then into three Kinds, such as is Useful, such as is Elegant and Curious, and, lastly, such as is *Vain and Insignificant*⁶. Useful Learning may be again divided into three Classes, Morality, Physick, and Mathematicks. For Divinity stands on its own Bottom, and maintains a separate and a superior Esteem: Tho' if it condescends to enter the common Division of Sciences, it must be placed under this first Head. ⁷ Morality is concern'd about the Improvement of Mens Minds, and the Advancement of a social Life; Physick hath the Health of the Body under its peculiar Care; and Mathematicks are of apparent Use and Benefit in the Invention of so many Arts for the Profit and for the Conveniency of human Life. By that Learning which we term Elegant and Curious, we understand such as is not indeed of so necessary Use, as to render the Life of Man less sociable or less convenient upon the Want of it; and yet is worthy of the Enquiries of ingenious Persons, because it either leads us deeper into the Discovery of the secret Works of Nature, or shews the singular Excellency of human Wit and Cunning, or preserves the Memory of Things and Actions, and the Records of Mankind. And such may we reckon the Knowledge of various Tongues, natural Experiments and Speculations, the more fine and subtle Parts of Mathematicks, History of all kinds, Criticism (as it preserves Authors correct and entire) Poesy,⁸ Oratory, and the like. Which are all in themselves excellent, and worthy of Praise, and serve for the Garniture and Ornament of human Improvement; according to which Measure both the Practice and⁹ the Value of them are to be stated and determined.

Vain Learning we call, not only such as is made

³ Montagne's Words are, "The most learned are not the less foolish. I love and honour Knowledge as much as they that have it, and if it be rightly used, it is the most noble and powerful Acquirement of Men. But as to those (and there are a vast Number of them) who place their chief Excellency and Worth in it, and refer their Understanding to their Memory, Sub aliena umbra Latentes (as Seneca speaks, Epist. 33.) and can do nothing without a Book; I hate them, if I may so speak, almost as much as a Blockhead. In my Country and Time Learning has done much Service to the Purse, but little to the Soul. If it meets with dull Men, it loads and chokes them, becoming a crude and undigested Mass; if with airy Minds, it purifies their Wills, and so subtilizes their Notions as to turn them into nothing. 'Tis a Thing of almost an indifferent Nature; a very useful Addition to a generous Mind, but pernicious and hurtful to any other: Or rather 'tis a Thing of a precious Use, which can't be attain'd at a cheap Rate. In one Man's Hand 'tis a Scepter, in another's a Fool's Bauble." Essays, Lib. 3. Chap. 8.

⁹ We must observe here, that some of these Sciences are necessary, if not in themselves, yet in respect to others, in which no Progress can be made but by their Help; such, for example, is History in respect of Politicks, and Criticism in respect of History and Divinity. See Mr. Clerc's Ars Critica in the Preface.

up of false and erroneous Notions; but likewise all those Inventions of crafty or of idle Men, set up to amaze our Minds, and to hinder us from the Pursuits of solid Knowledge. Amongst which, as we must needs reckon many Opinions of the old Philosophers, so very disagreeable to the apparent Nature of Things; so we think it will not be over-severe to join to them the greatest Part of that barbarous Cant, which went under the Name of School Learning in the Ages preceding the Reformation of Religion; and which is still resolutely maintain'd by some Men, either because they know no better, or because they are ashamed to unlearn what they have made themselves Masters of with such prodigious Labour, or because 'tis the manifest Interest of the Papal Monarchy to keep Mens Wits employ'd on Trifles, for fear they should make some very dangerous Discoveries². Now the greater Proficiency any Person hath made in solid Knowledge, the more he despises these empty and unprofitable Enquiries.

Another Thing to be consider'd by those who dispute about the Usefulness of Learning is this; that the Faults of bad Institution and of hot-brain'd Pedants, are not to be charg'd on the Sciences themselves^b. Is it likely, that sound Knowledge and Wisdom should be learnt in such a School as Agathias describes under the Philosophaster Uranus? At their Meetings, says he, *every one talks as he pleases about the sublimest Matters, and Points of Divine Science; and tho' they are perpetually canvassing these Questions, yet they neither persuade others, nor will ever lay aside the Notion they themselves have taken up, but whatever they be, defend them Tooth and Nail against all Opposers. When the Disputations are over, they depart mutually incens'd, and vent their Rage against one another, like quarrelling Gamesters, in the most abusive and foulest Ribaldry*¹⁰. Thus the Contention ends, without the least Profit given or re-ceiv'd; and those who went to the Engagement very good Friends, come away most violent and spiteful Enemies^c.

But supposing Things rightly order'd, can any one doubt whether a Person endow'd with good natural Abilities, and instituted in solid Learning, will not discharge the greatest Affairs with more Accuracy and with more Dispatch, than if he depended on the bare Strength of Nature, and neglected other Assurances^d? But then all those who apply themselves to Study, should be exactly careful, first that they direct their Enquiries to a good End, the Service of Life, or the Improvement and Perfection of their Minds; and not make use of them for idle Amusements, or pleasant Methods of passing away Time. *Aristippus*¹² in Dionogenes Laertius, being ask'd what Things ingenious Children should be taught, answer'd, Such as they may use when they come to be Men. 'Twould not be only shameful, but wicked, if those whose Heads are fill'd with brave Notions and Sentences should do no more good than common Ideots¹³. The Egyptians call'd their Libraries Physick Shops for their Souls, intimating their Use as well as their Excellency^f. And Arrian's Epictetus^g thought he could not give a worse Character of Mens being falsely and insignificantly learn'd, than to say that they were Lions in their Schools, but meer Vermin out of them.

They are likewise to take heed, that they do not resolve all Science¹⁴ into bare Authority^h, and Custom of Speech, and an unintelligible Set of Terms; but that they search into the solid Foundations of Things, and build their Schemes on evident Reason. As for those Things which they cannot yet bring to clear Demonstration, there must be no Stubbornness or Obstinacy in maintaining them; but a former Opinion must be willingly quitted, upon a better and a more certain Information; because 'tis very likely another

¹⁰ See about the Abuse of Disputes, a fine Passage in Montague's Essays, Lib. 3. Chap. 8. which is copied out with some small Alteration of Words, by the Author of the Art of Thinking, Part 3. Chap. 19. §. 7.

¹¹ Plutarch's Greek is, Ὁ ὅ σοφιστικὸς [εἶ] τὸ περὶ τὴν διανοητικὴν ἀναγωγὴν, ἀναγωγὴν τὴν φιλοσοφίαν, ἀναγωγὴν ἢ πληρωμένην. The Author also quotes here the Saying of an antient Greek Poet, Γεγμματα μαθεῖν δεῖ, καὶ μάθοντα τὸν ἕχεν, He that affects Learning should grow wise by it.

¹² The Greek is, Ὁ ὅ ἐν Ἀείσειππῳ ἐρωτηθεὶς, τίνα ὄντιν αἰ δεῖ τοὺς ἄλλους παιδάδας μαθεῖν; ἔφη, Ὅτις ἀνδρες γενόμενοι χεῖρονται.

¹³ Isocrates's Words are, Οὐδὲ [σοφιστὰς] ἐχρῶ ἀρετικῶς ταύτης τὴν περὶ τὴν ἀρετὴν, τὴν μὲν τῶν λόγων ἐξελέγχειν περὶ σοφιστικῶν, ἐν ὅ τῶν ἔργων πόλιν ἢ τὸν χρόνον ἐξελίξασθαι, τὴν ἀλήθειαν διακρίνειν, καὶ περὶ τὰς ἀρετὰς, ἐν αἷς πολιτικῶν ἀρετῶν, τὸν σωφρονιστικῶν ἀρετῶν, καὶ περὶ τὴν ἐμπειρίαν τὴν τῶν γυμνασίων, ἐνδομηρικῶν ὅτι πολλὰ κρείττον ὄντι περὶ τὴν χρησίμων ἐπεικῶν ἀρετῶν, ἢ περὶ τὴν ἀρετῶν ἀρετικῶν ὅτι περὶ τὴν ἐμπειρίαν, καὶ μικρὸν σπεύχειν ἐν τοῖς μεγάλοις, ἢ πολλὸν διαφέρειν ἐν τοῖς μικροῖς, καὶ τοῖς μὲν περὶ τὴν εἶον ἀρετικῶν. Lucian's Greek is, Ὅτις ἔδεν ὄρεται ἢν ἀρετῶν ὅτι περὶ τὰ μαθηματικά, εἰ μὴ τις ἀρετῶν καὶ τὴν εἶον ἐννομεῖται περὶ τὸ βέλπον.

Man may have more quick and more piercing Parts than ourselves; and because every new Day may correct some Mistake in the former. And this teachable Disposition is a most infallible Mark of a generous Mind^a. Lastly, Care is to be us'd, that they do not in such a Manner bury themselves amongst their Books, as to neglect other Duties, and render themselves¹⁶ unfit for the Genius of a civil and sociable Life. For Pedantry of Mind is a¹⁷ Vice not peculiar to Scholars, but runs in some Measure through the whole World, and infects Men of all Orders, Professions, and Conditions.

XIV. But although the principal and the most laborious Part of human Improvement is concern'd about the Mind, we must not in the mean time neglect the Body; since² the Mind makes use of its Supports, and can never rise to any great Atchievement, if this Inferior be ill affected. We are oblig'd therefore, as much as in us lies, to secure³ a sound Body for our sound Mind to lodge in^b; and rather to harden our Limbs and Constitution by long Endurance of Labour, than to soften or break their Strength by Effeminacy and Idleness^c. Pyrrhus is said to have made this only Request to the Gods in his daily Devotions, ὕγιάνων, to be well in Health, judging this Blessing to contain under it all Degrees of Happiness. Care is likewise to be taken that our bodily Force and Vigor be not weaken'd by Intemperance in Meat or Drink, or by unseasonable and unnecessary

Labours, or any other way. Upon this Account Gluttony, Drunkenness, immoderate Use of Women, and the like Excesses are to be avoided. 'Tis a famous⁵ Saying of Democritus in *Plutarch*⁶, If the Body should bring an Action of Damage against the Soul, the Soul would be sure to be cast. Though to this it might be replied, that the Mistakes of the Mind in reference to Food, and Pleasure, and other Things which concern the Preservation of the Body, do all proceed from its yielding to the corporeal Appetites and Affections, contrary to the Admonitions of Reason: So that the Mind is never of itself the Cause of bringing the Body into a worse Condition than ordinary. And therefore to Democritus's Saying on one side, we will oppose the no less renown'd Sentence of⁶ Theophrastus on the other; The Soul (says he) pays large Rent to the Body for its Dwelling.

XV. Our Life is given us by our great Creator, as a kind of Course or Race, in which we might exercise our Strength and Abilities by the Direction of Reason: And therefore it is not to be measur'd by so many Times drawing Breath, but by a constant Succession of good Actions. Every one is therefore to take care, that he be not ἄχρηστος ἀνθρώπος^c, an useless Burden to the Earth; unprofitable to himself, and troublesome to others,² born only to increase the Number of Mankind, and to devour the Provisions of Nature,³ and that he do not only live for the sake of his Palate⁴. Farther, since human Industry com-

¹⁷ Here is a Fault in the Original that quite spoils the Sense, viz. Initium for Vitium; and 'tis surprizing that Mr. Hertius did not correct it in his Edition of 1706. Indeed all this is taken, Word for Word, out of the Art of Thinking, Disc. 1. and the Author ought to have referred us to the Original where he had it.

² Corpori vaco, cujus futuris animus sustinetur. Plin Epist. Lib. 1. Epist. 9. The Author alludes to this and the following Passage, though he does not quote them; nor are they distinguish'd by the Italick Letter, ³ Orandum est, ut sit mens sana, in corpore sano, i. e. We must pray for a sound Mind in a sound Body. Juv. Sat. 10. v. 356.

⁴ Juvenal. Sat. 11. ver. 34. ——— Buccæ Fools only make Attempts beyond their Skill; Nescenda est mensura tuæ ——— A wise Man's Power's the Limit of his Will.

This Verse does not reflect upon an Excess in Eating and Drinking, but upon such exorbitant Expences as Men are at, not considering whether they are rich enough to bear them. For 'tis a Proverb signifying, That Men ought in all Things to examine themselves, what they are capable of, and able to do. Our Author more fitly refers us to Socrates his Words about Intemperance, in his Memoirs collected by Xenophon, Lib. 1. Chap. 3.

⁵ Plutarch's Greek is, Ὅς εἰ τὸ σῆμα διασσωπὲ τῆ ψυχῆ, κακώσεως ἐκ ἀν αὐτῷ σπουδῆν. The Reflection which our Author makes upon these Words, is not altogether proper, for though Briskness of Spirits, and other Motions of the Body have great Influence upon the Soul, there are other Passions purely spiritual, as Covetousness, &c. which are not less violent, and do much hurt to a good Constitution of Body. See my Treatise of Games, Lib. 3. Chap. 4. §. 6. and Chap. 5. §. 11, &c.

§. XV. ² Nos numerus sumus & fruges consumere nati. Hor. Lib. 1. Ep. 2. v. 27.

³ Juvenal is refer'd to without Quotation, Aut quibus in solo vivendi causa palato est. Sat. 11. v. 11.

⁴ Cicero. de Nat. Deor. l. 2. c. 16. Mihi enim, qui nihil agit, esse omnino non videtur. i. e. He that doth not shew himself in Action, seems to me to have lost his very Being." But this is nothing to our Author's Purpose. For by these Words one of the

monly exercises itself one of these two Ways, either in procuring Things necessary for the Preservation of Life, or in discharging the Offices of a social and a civil Condition; which admit of great Variety, and do not all suit alike with all Mens Capacities and Abilities^a; it is manifest that every Man ought with early Care to choose out and undertake such a Course of Life as is honest, profitable, and comporting with his Parts and Strength. In which Choice^b Men are usually determin'd, either by Impulse and Inclination of Genius and Fancy, or by some peculiar Aptness of Body or Mind, or by Condition and Quality of Birth, or by the Goods of Fortune, or by the Authority of Parents, and sometimes by the Command of the civil State; or lastly, by the Invitations of Opportunity, or by the Compulsion of Necessity. ⁵ Isocrates in Areopagit. gives us this Account of the old Athenians: Under so great an Inequality of Fortunes, they could not prescribe to all the same common Exercises; and therefore they put them in different Ways, according to their Circumstances and Condition. The meaner Sort they engag'd in Agriculture and in Trading; well knowing, both that Idleness was the Cause of Poverty, and Poverty a Temptation to Injury and Mischief. So that by removing this Fountain of Vice they thought they should prevent the Evils which us'd to flow from it. As for the more wealthy, then they compell'd to apply their Minds to Horsemanship, Feats of Body, Hunting, and Philosophy: Apprehending that such Employments and Amusements must needs have this good Effect, to make some excel in Virtue, and to keep others from being notorious in Vice. It was an Ordinance amongst the Egyptians and Indians, that every Man should follow his Father's Trade. Diodor. Sic. l. i. c. 74. and l. xii. c. 41. ⁶ The Reason of which Institution is given by Isocrates, in Laud. Busir. The like Custom was receiv'd amongst the Peruvians, under their antient Incas; the Nobility alone being allow'd to improve themselves by the Study of Letters. De la Vega. l. iv. c. 19. 'Tis a true Observation of Xenophon, Cyropæd. l. ii. Those Persons arrive at the greatest Height and Perfection in particular Attainments, who have given themselves wholly to some single Pursuit, avoiding Multiplicity of Business and of Enquiry. As he says well in another Place, Lib. viii. 'Tis impossible that a Man who professeth many Arts together should excel in all. Hence it appears, that not only those Persons do live in a State repugnant to sound Reason, who maintain themselves by Robbery or Villanies; but those too, who withdraw themselves unnecessarily from the common Duties and Offices of Life; such are many of the modern Hermits and Monks, as well as some of the antient Philosophers. But those who chiefly fall under this Censure, are the sturdy and able Vagrants, who abuse the Divine Name into a Trade of getting Money, and make GOD, as it were, their Tributary. The Wickedness of these Varlets is the greater, if they voluntarily maim or distort any of their Limbs, so as to render themselves incapable of doing the World any Service, though they should afterwards desire it. 'Tis a Custom very remarkable amongst the Chinese, that no Person of sound Strength is permitted to beg, although he be blind; such unfortunate Wretches being employ'd in turning Mills, from which Service they earn their Subsistence^c.

Again, since Time runs on with such swift Steps, since Death surprizes Men so often when they least expect it, and is always beyond their Power to avoid; thence it follows, that 'tis our Duty to make an early ⁷ Use of Life, not to begin too long a Thread of Actions, not to lay

Dialogists labours to prove a Providence against the Epicureans that denied it: for, says he before, To maintain that there are no Gods, and to deprive them of all Care and Action, is much the same Thing; for he that doth not, &c. So that this Passage could not be fitly applied to the Idleness of Man, but by a Preacher: He might much better have quoted Salust's Words, who says, "That they only live truly, who are busied in doing good; the idle Man's Life is Death." Sed multi mortales dediti ventri, atque somno, inuolâ, incultique vitam, sicuti peregrinantes, transiere, quibus profecto contra naturam corpus voluptati, anima veri fuit. Eorum ego vitam, mortemque juxta existimo, quoniam de utraque filetur. Verum enimvero is demum mihi videtur, atque sui anima videtur, qui aliquo negotio intentus, preclari facinoris, aut artis bonæ famam querit. De Bell. Catilin. c. 2. Maximus Tyrinus also says, "That Idleness belongs to none but a dead Man, τὸ ἄλογον, ἀπερυσμωσμένη τὴν ὄψιν ἀλλὰ εἴη πλὴν νεκρῆ." Dissert. 5. Mr. Bruyere also has a fine Passage, which may perhaps agree better than all these Quotations of old Authors. "There are such Creatures made by GOD as are called Men, who have a Soul, which is a Spirit, whose Life is wholly employed, and all their Thoughts taken up in sawing Marble: This is very silly, and a Thing of little Worth; and there are others that wonder at it, but are nevertheless usefess, and spend their Days in doing nothing; this is worse than sawing Marble." Character of the Manners of this Age, Chap. of Judgments, p. 450, 451. See what I have laid in my Treatise of Games, Lib. 1. Chap. 1. §. 1. and Lib. 4. Chap. 6.

⁶ Isocrates only says, that Busiris would have no Man have more than one Trade or Profession, because 'tis not possible to excel in several. Ἄει πᾶς ἀπὸ τῆς πᾶς ἀπὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς μεταχειρίζεσθαι προσέταξεν εἰδὼς τοῦ μὲν μεταβαλλομένους τὰς ἐργασίας, πρὸς ἐβέν τ' ἐργῶν ἀκριβῶς ἔχοντες τοῦ δὲ ὅτι τ' ἀπὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς σιωπῆς δπιμένοντες, εἰς ὑποβολὴν ἔχασεν ἀποτελεῖσθαι. So that he had better have joined this with what he quotes out of Xenophon's Cyropæd. Lib. 2. Chap. 1. §. 8. and Lib. 8. Chap. 2. §. 4 too vast a Train of Designs^a. We ought likewise to have the Accompts of our Life always drawn up in a Readiness, and to harden our Minds betimes against the Terror of Dying; that without a trembling Reluctancy, without repining at our Creator's Pleasure, we may resign, when he demands it, what he lent us of his free Bounty, under no Terms of keeping^b.

XVI. How passionately every Man loves his own Life, and how heartily he studies the Security and Preservation of it, is evident beyond Dispute. But it will admit of a Debate whether the bare natural Instinct, which he enjoys in common with Beasts, inclines him to these Desires? or whether he is not engag'd in them by some superior Command of the Law of Nature? For, in as much as no one can, in a legal Sense, stand oblig'd to himself, such a Law seems to be of no Force or Significancy which is terminated in my self, which I can dispense with when I please, and by the Breach of which I do no one an Injury. Besides, it looks like a needless thing to establish a Law about this Point, since the anxious Tenderness of Self-love would beforehand drive us so forcibly on the Care of our own Safety, as to render it almost impossible for us to act otherwise^c. If then^d a Man were born only for himself, we confess it would be convenient that he should be left entirely to his own Disposal, and be allow'd to do whatever he pleas'd with himself. But since by the universal Consent of all wise Men it is acknowledg'd that the Almighty Creator made Man to serve him, and to set forth his Glory in a more illustrious manner, by improving the good Things committed to his Trust; and since Society, for which a Man is sent into the World, cannot be well exercis'd and maintain'd, unless every one, as much as in him lies, takes care of his own Preservation (the Safety of the whole Society of Mankind being a thing unintelligible, if the Safety of each particular Member were an indifferent Point) it manifestly appears, that a Man by throwing aside all Care of his own Life, tho' he cannot properly be said to injure himself, yet is highly injurious both to Almighty God, and to the general Body of Mankind^e.

It was not rightly infer'd in the Argument we just now mention'd, that the Law of Nature did not concern itself with this Matter, because Instinct did before drive us on the like good Resolution. We should rather imagine, that the Force of Instinct was superadded (as an able Second) to the Dictate of Reason; as if this Help alone could scarce make a Tie strong enough to keep Mankind together. For indeed, if we reflect on the Troubles and Miseries that constantly wait on human Life, and do so far outweigh that little and mean Portion of Pleasure^f, which through a perpetual Repetition grows every Day more flat and languid, so that we must needs loath it in every Enjoyment; and if we consider farther, how many Men have their Days prolong'd only to make them capable of more Misfortunes and Evils; who is there, almost, who would not rid himself of the Burthen of Life, as soon as possible, if Instinct did not render it so light and so sweet; or unless so much Bitterness or so much Terror were join'd to our Notion of Death? And yet who is there almost who would not break through the bare Opposition of Instinct, had not the Command of our Creator secur'd us with a much stronger Bar and Restraint? "Nature, says Quintilian, hath invented this chief Device for the "Preservation of Mankind, to make us die unwillingly, thus enabling us to bear so vast a Load of "Misfortunes as falls to our Share, with some Patience and Quiet." And Socrates in Xenophon declares it to be σφδ̄ δουρατῶν τεχνικῶν, the Artifice of a wise Workman, or Builder, "to have implanted in Men a Desire of producing Offspring; "in Women a Desire of nursing and bringing them up; and in all, when brought up, a vast "Desire of Living, and as great a Fear of Death." And this last Motive is the main Security of every Man from the Violence of others. For how easy were it to kill, were it not so hard to die? Hence he presently becomes Master of other Mens Lives, who hath once arrived at the Contempt of his own. And the Regard that others have to their own Safety, is the best Defence of mine.

² The Obligation of preserving and completing a Man's self, proceeds directly from Self-love plainly, which we have proved, §. 15. Note 1. of the foregoing Chapter, to be one of the principal Fundamentals of all our Duties. Indeed Instinct alone cannot always so forcibly conquer our own Idleness and Negligence, as to make us know sufficiently, what is really profitable, or hurtful, to our own Self-preservation, as Experience teaches. On the other side, 'tis sometimes too fierce, and sometimes too blind, to leave to its Direction entirely, a thing that requires so much Circumspection, as the Care of ourselves, and our true Interest does, which ought to be managed in such a manner, as not to be prejudicial to Religion, the Rights of others, or the good of Society.

³ Mr. Bayle has over and over prov'd in his Hist. and Crit. Dictionary, that the Miseries of Life are more and greater than its Comforts. The places are marked in his Index. See also my Treatise of Games, Lib. 3. Chap. 1. §. 3.

XVII. 'Tis a Question of more Difficulty, whether at all, or how far a Man hath Power over his own Life, either to expose it to extreme Danger, or to consume it by slow Means and Degrees, or lastly, to end it in a sudden and violent manner. Many of the Antients allow'd a Man an absolute Right in these Points, and thought he might either voluntarily offer his Life as a Pledge for another's, or devote it freely, without any such Design of preserving the Life of his Friend; or whenever he grew weary of Living, might prevent the Tardiness of Nature and Fate. Pliny calls the Ability to kill one's self, the most excellent Convenience, in the midst of so many Torments of Life. Whom we can by no means excuse from flat Impiety, for daring to think so abjectly of the greatest Gift of Heaven. It is our Business to examine what seems most agreeable, in this Case, to the Law of Nature. And here we may take it first of all to be true beyond Dispute,

^a Quint. Declam. 4. What Satisfaction, O wretched Mortals, can it prove, to keep the Soul for so many Years, or, if Nature allow'd it, for infinite Ages, in the unpleasant and wearisome restraint of the Body? If we diligently weigh and examine all our Joys, all the Pleasures, which in this universal Scene of the World, either attract our Sight, or flatter our Senses, we shall find the whole Life of a Man to be no more than a single Day. They must be low and abject Minds which are not tired with this poor Circulation of Actions. So that he who by Application to honest Arts is able to understand what is the Perfection of Goodness and true Happiness, will think no Death untimely: and those who refer the Design of our Being chiefly to the Mind and Soul, must every Day be forfeited of Life. Ye expect I should now give an account how many things there are in this short Stage, which we ought to avoid and decline; that I should set our Fears and our Calamities against our Joy and our Success. Let us then weigh those dear Comforts for which we weary the Gods with vain Petitions, and on the account of which we complain of the Shortness of Life: And what are they, but Vanity, Greediness, Luxury, and Lust? And shall not we be asham'd for the sake of such scandalous Privileges, to bear Weakness, Grief, and tedious Discontents; and even to court their stay, when we have an opportunity of throwing them off and escaping? ^b Xenophon Apomn. l. 1. ^c *Add. §. XVII. ' Mr. Montagne's Words are here remarkable: After he has alledged the Reasons of such as hold it lawful to kill themselves, he goes on and says, "Several hold, that they may not leave this World without the exprefs Command of him that sent them into it; and that God hath placed us in it, not for ourselves only, but for his own Glory, and the good of others, and he is to release us when he pleases, and not we ourselves; that we are not born for ourselves, but for our Country; and therefore the Laws call us to an account of Ourselves, for their Interest, and have an Action of Murder against us. Nay, we are in another World punished as Deferters of our Stations, as Virgil (in his Æneids, Lib. 6. v. 434, &c.) speaks:

Insontes peperere manu, luccique perosi Projecere animas*

Those doleful Souls in the next Rooms of Hell,
Who, without Guilt, did slay themselves, do dwell.

'Tis an Argument of much Bravery and Courage, rather to lug the Chain that clogs us, than break it. Regulus's Constancy is more commendable than Cato's Despair. 'Tis Indiference and Impatience that hastens our Pace; Virtue will not turn its back upon any Misfortunes, it rather seeks out Trouble and Affliction, as its Nourishment. The Threatnings of Tyrants, Fires, and Executioners, rather invigorate and enliven it. (See Horace, Lib. 4. Ode 4. v. 55, &c.) And Seneca's Theb. or Phœnix. Act. 1. ver. 190, &c.

"Most commonly, when we are flying from other Troubles we fall into this. By avoiding Death we sometimes run headlong to it.

Hic rogo, non furor est, ne moriari, mori? Mart. Lib. 2. Epigr. 80.

"As those who, for fear of a Precipice, throw themselves headlong from it. (See Lucan. Lib. 7. ver. 104, &c. and Lucretius, Lib. 3. v. 79, &c.) Contempt of Life is ridiculous, for our Being is our All. Things which have a more noble and excellent Being, may slight ours, but 'tis against Nature for us to despise it ourselves, and bring ourselves to neglect it. 'Tis a particular Disease, which no other Creature is troubled with, to hate and despise ourselves. 'Tis a like Folly to desire to be another Thing than we are. The Consequence of such a Wish does not concern us so much, as contradict and hinder itself. He that desires to be made an Angel, does nothing for himself, he desires nothing better; for having no Existence, how can he be sensible of, or rejoice at that Amendment? The Security, Indolence, Impassibility, and Privation of the Evils of this Life, which we purchase by dying, bring no Profit to us. In vain he avoids War, that can't enjoy Peace; and in vain he flies from Pain, who has no way to get Ease. All Inconveniences are not so heavy, as to make us desirous to die to avoid them; for since there are so many sudden Changes in human Affairs, it is hard to judge when we are come to the full end of our Hopes. All Things, says an antient Proverb, are full of Hope to a Man as long as he lives. Essays, Lib. 2. Chap. 3. Madam Desboulivieres has some fine Verses to this purpose:

*In greatness of Courage Men do not know
When they are got to the Rank of the Hero's,
Those Greeks and Romans who themselves slew,
That they might make themselves famous,*

*But Disgrace follows them hard, as they deserve.
By one Death they have escaped a thousand.
How sweet it is to troubled Hearts to sigh!
It is more noble, more difficult*

To bear a Misfortune, than to be delivered from it.*

that since Men both can and ought to apply their Pains to the Help and Service of another; and since some certain kinds of Labour, and an overstraining Earnestness in any, may so affect the Strength and Vigor of a Man, as to make old Age and Death come on much sooner, than if he had pass'd his Days in Softness, and in easy Pursuits; and one may, without Fault, voluntarily contract his Life in some degree, upon account of obliging Mankind more signally, by some extraordinary Services and Benefits^a. For since we do not only live to our selves, but to GOD, and to human Society; if either the Glory of our Creator, or the Safety and Good of the general Community require the spending of our Lives, we ought willingly to lay them out on such excellent Uses^a. Pompey the Great, in a time of Famine at Rome, when the Officer who had the care of transporting the Corn, as well as all his other Friends, intreated him not to venture to Sea in so stormy a Season, nobly answered them, That I should go 'tis necessary, but not that I should live. And Achilles in Homer, when his Fate was put to his Choice, prefer'd a hasty Death in the glorious Adventures of War, to the longest Period of Age, to be pass'd idly and ingloriously at home.

XVII. Farther, in as much as it frequently happens, that the Lives of many Men cannot be preserv'd, unless others expose themselves, on their behalf, to a probable Danger of losing their own; this makes it evident, that the lawful Governor may lay an Injunction on any Man in such Cases, not to decline the Danger, upon Pain of the severest Punishment. And on this Principle is founded the Obligation of Soldiers, which we shall enlarge upon in its proper place. 'Tis a noble Saying of Socrates in Plato's Apology, In whatever Station a Man is fix'd, either by his own Choice, as judging it the best, or by the Command of his Superior; in that he ought resolutely to continue, and to undergo any Danger that may assault him there; reckoning neither Death nor any other Evil so grievous as Cowardice and Infamy.

Nor doth it seem at all repugnant either to natural Reason, or to the Holy Scriptures (which command us to lay down our Lives for our Brethren) that, without any such rigid Injunction of a Superior, a Man should voluntarily expose himself to a Probability of losing his Life for others; provided he hath good hopes of thus procuring their Safety, and that they are worthy of so dear a Ransom: for it would be silly and senseless, that a Man should venture his own Life for another whom 'tis impossible to preserve; and that a Person of Worth and Excellence should sacrifice himself for the Security of an insignificant paltry Fellow^b. We conceive it then to be lawful, that a Man may either give himself as a Surety for another, especially for an innocent and worthy Person, or as a Hostage for the Safety of many, in the Case of Treaties; upon pain of suffering Death, if either the accus'd Person doth not appear, or the Treaty be not observ'd. Tho' the other Party, to whom he stands bound on either of these accounts, cannot fairly put him to Death upon such Failure; as we shall elsewhere make out. But that those vain Customs of Mens devoting themselves out of Foolhardiness and Ostentation (such as we observ'd to be in use amongst the Japonese) are contrary to the Law of Nature, we do not in the least doubt. For there can be no Virtue in an Action where there's no Reason. Nor do we pretend to maintain, that the Law of Nature obliges a Man to prefer the Lives of others to his own; especially supposing the Cases and Circumstances to be equal. For besides that the common Inclination of Mankind is an Argument to the contrary, we might alledge the Testimony of Witnesses beyond all Exception, allowing a Man to be always dearest to himself, and Charity still to begin at home^c.

XIX. It remains that we examine, whether or no a Man, at his own free Pleasure, either when he grows weary of Life, or on the account of avoiding some terrible impending Evil, or some ignominious and certain Death, may hasten his own Fate, as a Remedy to his present or to his future Misfortunes^d. On this Point we have a famous Saying of Plato, in Phædo, frequently mention'd with Honour and Commendation by ^a Statius Theb. X. 609.

² In fine, We may observe with Mr. Titius (Observ. 115.) That the effect of these great Undertakings is not always so certain, that we need believe that they thereby infallibly shorten their Days. Moreover, the equal Poise between Self-love and Sociableness, doth not consist in an indivisible Point, but contains a considerable Extent. Lastly, Sociableness sometimes prevails more than Self-love. See what I have said in the foregoing Chapter, §. 15. Note 5.

² There would be not only Folly, but great Injustice in it; for the Law of Nature positively ordains, That all other Things being equal, every one should love himself better than others, and prefer his own Interest before theirs, in a thing of that great Consequence as Life is, which is the Foundation of all the good Things of this World. By a much stronger Reason, he that runs the hazard of his Life, can't endure that a Person of Merit and Worth to Society, should sacrifice himself to save his.

§. XIX. ¹ Plato plainly treats here of the private Instructions which the Pythagoreans gave their Scholars, just admitted into their Schools, and in which they discover the Reasons of the most abstruse and private Doctrines of their Philosophy. These secret Instructions they call'd their Ἀπόρρητα, about which see Scheffer, De Not. & Constit. Phil. Ital. Chap. 10. What Plato says before of Philolaus, a Pythagorean Philosopher, will not allow us to doubt, that the Reason which he sets down here, as very obscure and hard to comprehend, is no other than what the Pythagoreans give, to prove that Self-murder is not allowable. And 'tis the same exactly which Cicero attributes to Pythagoras, De Senec. Chap. 20.

Christian Writers: ὡς ἔν πνευματι ἐσμὲν οἱ ἀνθρώποι, καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἐπιτέθεικεν ἐκ ταύτης λύειν, ἢ δ' ἀποδιδοῦσκειν. We are plac'd, as it were, upon the Guard, in Life; and a Man must not rid himself of this Charge, or basely desert his Post. Which Lactantius hath express'd more fully in his Divine Institutions ^a; As, says he, we did not come into the World upon our own Pleasure or Choice, so neither must we quit our Station otherwise than by the Command of him who gave it us; who put us into this Tenement of the Body, with Orders to dwell here, till he should please to remove us. It is worth while to hear how Plato ² describes the Self-murderer, whom he hath condemn'd to a disgraceful Burial: He that kills himself, preventing by Violence the Stroke of Fate, being forced to his End neither by the Sentence of the Judges, nor by any inevitable Chance, nor on the account of defending his Modesty in extreme Danger; but thus unjustly condemning and executing himself, out of Cowardice and Unmanliness of Spirit. Aristotle hath well seconded his Master: To die, says he ^b, either to get rid of Poverty or of Love, or of any other Trouble or Hardship, is so far from being an act of Courage, that it rather argues the meanest degree of Fear. For 'tis Weakness to fly and to avoid those things which are hard and painful to be undergone^c. Grotius^d hath observed, that Persons guilty of Self-murder were excluded from decent Honours of Burial, both amongst the Gentiles and the Jews. But amongst the latter, one Case is commonly excepted, and allow'd as a just Reason for killing one's self; and that is ³ when a Man finds he shall otherwise be made a Reproach to GOD, and to Religion. For acknowledging the Power over our Lives not to be in our own hands, but in GOD's, they took it for granted, that nothing but the Will of GOD, either manifest or presumptive, could excuse the Design of anticipating our Fate. As Instances of this excepted Case, they alledge the Examples of Sampson, who chose to die by his own Strength, when he ⁴ found the true Religion expos'd to Scorn in his Person and Misfortunes: And of Saul, who ⁵ fell on his own Sword, lest he should have been derided and insulted over by GOD's and his Enemies; and lest, if he should have yielded himself Prisoner, the Slavery of his Country and Kingdom should inevitably follow. For the Jews are of Opinion, that Saul recover'd his Wisdom and Honour, as to the last Act of his Life; in as much as after the Ghost of Samuel had foretold his Death in the Battle, yet he refus'd not to engage for his Country and for the Law of his GOD; whence he merited eternal Praise, even by the Testimony of David; who likewise commended so highly the Piety of those Men, who honour'd their Prince's Relicks with a decent Burial.

Some extend this Exception and Allowance to many other Cases which bear a Resemblance to the former. And the Foundation they build upon is this, that as no Man can be properly bound or oblig'd to himself, so no Man can do an Injury to himself, when he takes away his own Life. As for a Man's being engag'd by the Law of Nature to preserve himself, they say the Reason of this is, because he is constituted and appointed by GOD for the maintenance of human Society, which he must not by any means forsake, like an idle Soldier, who runs away from the Post assign'd him in Battle: And that therefore my Obligation to save my own Life, is not a Debt to myself, but to GOD, and to ⁶ the Community of Mankind. So that if that Respect to GOD and to Mankind be taken off and be remov'd, the Care of my Life is recommended to me only by Sensitive Instinct, which not rising to the Force of a Law, an Action repugnant to it cannot be accounted sinful. On these Considerations, they think the Case of those

Note 1. where you'll find an Abridgment, and a lively Representation of the principal Reasons which can be alledged against those who believe that Self-murder is allowable, and some other Passages which our Author puts in the Margin here.

³ This Reason does not excuse Self-murder at all. Supposing that we do not any thing to dishonour GOD on our part, 'tis not our Fault, if profane Persons take an occasion unjustly to ridicule their Creator; and this does not at all authorize us to violate the express Prohibition both of the Natural Law and Revelation, in departing out of this Life without his Leave.

————— They
Who prodigally throw their Souls away;
Fools, who repining at their wretched State,
And loathing anxious Life, sullen'd their Fate.

Mr. Dryden.

Persons deserves a favourable Judgment, and at least a kind Pity rather than a rigorous Censure, who lay violent Hands upon themselves, when they see that they shall otherwise infallibly suffer a Death of Torture and Ignominy from their Enemies; since it cannot be for the Interest of the Publick, that they must needs die in so infamous a manner: Or else, when they see such an Injury likely to be offer'd to them, as if they undergo, they shall be ever after scorn'd and derided by the rest of Mankind. Of the former sort are those who seeing themselves condemn'd to Death, either by cruel Enemies abroad, or bloody Tyrants at home, have wilfully prevented the Stroke; either to avoid the Tortures and the Shame of a publick Execution, or to procure some Benefit to their Friends or Families by this Expedient. Thus Tacitus, Ann. VI. 29. giving an Account of some of the accus'd Persons under Tiberius, who made themselves away, observes, that the Fear of the Executioner render'd these Acts very frequent. And that whereas such as suffer'd Death in publick were denied the Privilege of Burial, and had their Goods confiscated; those who died by their own Hands were decently interr'd, and their Last Wills stood good with full Effect; these Indulgences serving as a Reward for their Haste. And here, by the way, we may remark, that Martial's Censure doth not always hold good,

———— Furor est, ne moriari, mori;

———— 'Tis mad to die for fear of Death;

For, as Æschines^a hath well distinguish'd, To die is not so terrible, as to bear the Infamy that attends some kinds of Deaths.

The other sort of Persons whose Death we observ'd to be so favourably interpreted by some Casuists⁹ are those Women and beautiful Boys, who have kill'd themselves to avoid the Violation of their Chastity^b. And in their Behalf they urge this plausible Excuse, that being assaulted with such a Danger as they could not otherwise, unless by a Miracle, escape, they might well conclude, that their Almighty Sovereign and General now gave them a Dismission, and that they might well presume on the Consent and Leave of Mankind, to whom they were already lost: It being no one's Interest that they should not anticipate their Death for so little a time, to avoid the feeling of such Tortures and Abuses as might, perhaps, tempt them to yield to a more grievous Sin: And inasmuch as it seem'd unreasonable to condemn generous Souls to such a Necessity, as that they must wait for the Sword of Villains, who would enhance the Bitterness of Death, by their foul and ignominious Usage^c.

But to leave this particular Point without venturing at a Determination; thus much we take to be evident, that those who voluntarily put an end to their own Lives, either as tired out with the many Troubles which commonly attend our mortal Condition; or from an Abhorrence of Indignities and Evils, which yet would not render them disgraceful Members of human Society; or through Fear of such Pains and Torments as by resolutely enduring, they might have become useful Examples to others; cannot be well clear'd of the Charge of Sinning against the Law of Nature. Sir Thomas Moor seems to be of another Opinion in his Utopia, but his Reasons do not prevail with us to alter our Judgment.

But those are, on all Accounts, to be exempted from the Crime of Self-murder, who lay violent Hands on themselves, under any Disease robbing them of the Use of Reason. Many Persons likewise who have run into voluntary Destruction, upon an exceeding Fright and Consternation, have on that Account been excus'd by moderate and candid Judges^d.

It ought to be observ'd farther on this Head, that it makes no Difference whether a Man kill himself, or force others to dispatch him. For he who at such a Time, or on such Occasion, ought not to die, is by no means excus'd, if he makes use of another Man's Hands to procure his Death; since what a Man doth by another, he is suppos'd in Law to have done himself, and must therefore bear the Guilt or Imputation of the Fact. David was guilty of the Death of Uriah, tho' he got it effected by the Hands of the Ammonites. Cato left the World rejoicing that he had met with an Opportunity of Dying. For that Divine Power which dwells in us, forbids us to depart without his Leave. But when Heaven presents a fair Occasion, as formerly to Socrates, now to Cato, and offers to other Persons, I dare engage, that a truly wise Man will quit with Joy this Vale of Darkness, to enter into Happiness and Light. And yet such an one will not violently break the Chains of his Prison; for this the Laces forbid him; but he will go out quietly and fairly, when God is pleas'd to give him his Enlargement; as if his Release from the Restraint were sign'd by the proper Magistrate and Power. ⁹ This is not a sufficient Reason to justify Self-murder, for they ought to comfort themselves with the Testimony of their own Conscience, which can't blame them in that Respect, and bear patiently the unwarrantable Censures of Men, and the other Inconveniences which may redound from such a Violence. True Chastity, as Mr. Thomajus's speaks very well (Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. §. 76.) is a Thing which no Man can take away by force, and 'tis without Reason that they are less esteem'd so, who have been obliged to yield to a greater Power.

were Pilate and the Pharisees guilty of that of our Saviour, tho' they did not themselves fatten him to the Cross, but order'd the Soldiers to do it. Altho' the Person who lends his Hands to such a Service, may likewise bring himself in for a Share in the Fault. For this Reason we don't admire the Reflection which Florus^{a 10} makes on the Deaths of Brutus and Cassius; Who, says he, doth not wonder, that these wise and great Persons did not employ their own Hands in their concluding Strokes? Perhaps it was part of their Persuasion, that they ought not to defile themselves by such Attempts, but that in delivering their most holy and most pious Souls from the Confinement of their Bodies, they should make use of their own Judgment, in the Intention, and of other Mens Wickedness in the Execution. For if it were unlawful for them at that time to end their Lives, it was indifferent whether they fell by their own, or by others Violence. But if it were lawful, how can any Wickedness or Guilt be imputed to the Servants who assisted them? Tho' the Historian might, in some measure, be excus'd, if the same Custom were practis'd in his Country, which Æschines mentions amongst the Grecians, that if a Person murth'rd himself, the Hand that perform'd the Deed was buried apart from the rest of the Body^b.

To conclude, since we deny that a Man hath absolute Power over his own Life, it is plain that we cannot approve of those Laws, which in some Countries either command or permit People to make themselves away. Such a Law Diodorus Siculus, L. ii. c. 57. reports to have been in force amongst the Inhabitants of the Island Ceylan, ordaining, "That the People should live only to such a Number of Years, which being run out, they eat a certain Herb that put them into their long Sleep, and dispatch'd them without the least Sense of Pain." Add, L. iii. Ch. 33. And thus too amongst the Ceans, all Persons above Sixty Years old, were obliged by the Laws to poison themselves, to supply Food for the rest^c. Though Ælian gives this better Reason for the Practice; "That having arriv'd at such an Age, they were conscious to themselves, that they were no longer able to promote their Country's Interest by their Service; growing now towards Stupidity and Dotage^d." Procopius, Hist. Goth. L. 2. relates a Custom of the Heruli, by which those who were weaken'd and disabled, either by Disease or Age, voluntarily sent themselves out of the World: The Wives hanging themselves at the Tombs of their Husbands, if they lost them in this manner. Ælian, L. iv. C. 4. reports somewhat to the same purpose of the Sardi, and the Bebrycei; and Strabo, Lib. ii. and Herodotus, Clio in fin. of the Massagetæ, who may be consulted at Leisure.

TO Self-preservation, which not only the tenderest Passion, but the exactest Reason recommends to Mankind, belongs Self-defence, or the warding off such Evils or Mischiefs as tend to our Hurt, when offer'd by other Men. This Defence of ourselves may be undertaken two Ways, either without hurting him who designs the Mischief against us², or else by hurting or destroying him. As to the former Expedient, no sensible Man can question, but that it is altogether lawful and blameless. But concerning the latter, many have entertain'd a Scruple; inasmuch as by putting it in Practice, we hurt or destroy a Man like ourselves, with whom we are oblig'd to live in a social manner, and whose Death seems to be as great a Loss to Mankind as our own. And besides, because a forcible Repulse of an Aggressor may cause more Disturbances and Outrages in human Society, than if we should either decline the Mischief by flight, or patiently yield our Body to it, when an Escape is impossible. Yet that the Defence of ourselves may not only be undertaken the first of these Ways, but³ when that proves ineffectual, even with the Hurt of the Assailant, we are inform'd, as well by the Judgment of Reason, as by the concurring Testimony of the learned and unlearned World. 'Tis true, Man was created for the maintaining of Peace with his Fellows; and all the Laws of Nature, which bear a Regard to other Men, do primarily tend towards the Constitution and the Preservation of this universal Safety and Quiet. Yet Nature is not backward in giving us an Indulgence to fly even to Force, when we cannot by other Means secure ourselves from Injuries and Assaults. For the Obligation to the Exercise of the Laws of Nature and the Offices of Peace, is mutual, and binds all Men alike; neither hath Nature given any Person such a distinct Privilege, as that he may break these Laws at his Pleasure towards others, and the others be still oblig'd to maintain the Peace towards him. But the Duty being mutual, the Peace ought to be mutually observ'd. And therefore when another, contrary to the Laws of Peace, attempts such Things against me, as tend to my Destruction, it would be the highest Impudence in him to require me at the same time to hold his Person as sacred and inviolate; that is, to forego my own Safety for the sake of letting him practise his Malice with Impunity⁴. But since in his Behaviour towards me he shews himself unsociable, and so renders himself unfit to receive from me the Duties of Peace, all my Care and Concern ought to be how to effect my own Deliverance from his Hands; which if I cannot accomplish without his Hurt, he may impute the Mischief

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. V. § I.

¹ This is well stated by the Roman Lawyers, for they lay it down as a Maxim of the Law of Nations (which we call The Law of Nature) Ut cum atque injuriam propulsemus: Nam jure hoc evenit, ut quod quisque ob tutelam corporis sui fecerit, jure fecisse existimetur, Digest. Lib. 1. Tit. 1. De Justit. & Jure, Leg. 3. See also Lib. 9. Tit. 2. Ad Leg. Aquil. Leg. 4. in princ. Indeed, as Mr. Titius observes (Observ. CXX.) there may be some Opposition between Self-love, and the Duties of a Community, either in respect to the good Things which can't be possessed by two Persons at the same time; and in this Case Self-love ought often to shew itself; or in respect of Evil, which equally threatens others and ourselves. Our Author, in this and the next Chapter, treats of this last Opposition, which happens either by the Act of him towards whom we ought otherwise to observe the Laws of the Community, or without any Act on his part. He explains the first Case in this Chapter, and clears the other in the following; for the Fact of the other, which produces this Opposition, is either malicious, or not. He treats of the first in this Paragraph, and will speak of the other in §. 5.

² We may add this Explication here, which our Author uses in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. Chap. 5. §. 12. i. e. Taking good Heed that he shall not gain his Ends in insulting us; or that he may have Reason to fear the ill Success of his Attempt.

³ We ought to observe this Limitation well; how unjust soever the Attempt of the Aggressor may be, the Community obliges us to spare him, if we can do it without Prejudice to ourselves. By this just Temper we may, at the same time, preserve the Rights of Self-love, and Duties of Community. The Roman Lawyers have owned this Truth, Injuria autem (say they) occidere intelligitur, qui nullo jure occidit. Itaque qui latronem [Insidiatorem] occiderit, non tenetur, utique SI ALITER PERICULUM EFFUGERE NON POTEST, Institut. Lib. 4. Tit. 3. De Leg. Aquil. §. 2. See Mr. Nood's excellent Treatise, Ad Legem Aquilianam, Chap. 4. p. 15, 16.

to his own Wickedness, which put me under this Necessity^a. For otherwise, all the Goods which we enjoy either by the Gift of Nature, or by the Procurement of our own Industry, would have been granted us in vain, if it were unlawful for us to oppose those in a forcible Manner, who unjustly invade them. And honest Men would be expos'd a ready Prey to Villains, if they were never allow'd to make use of Violence in resisting their Attacks. So that upon the Whole, to banish Self-defence though pursued by Force, would be so far from promoting the Peace, that it would rather contribute to the Ruin and Destruction of Mankind. Nor is it to be imagin'd that the Law of Nature, which was instituted for a Man's Security in the World, should favour so absurd a Peace, as must necessarily cause his present Destruction, and would in fine produce any Thing sooner than a sociable Life.

II. But now, whether a violent Self-defence, and such as is join'd with the Hurt or the Slaughter of the Assailant be an obliging and a necessary Duty (as we have already shewn it to be a lawful and an allow'd Practice) is a Question not so easy to be determin'd. In stating which Point we do not speak of Soldiers, or of the Guards hired by Travellers, who whilst they defend themselves with the Slaughter of the Enemies or the Robbers, at the same time protect and deliver their Country, or the Men who have put themselves under their Care. But we confine ourselves to the Case of those who are excited to make such Defence by their own particular Danger^b. Now there are some who will have this Defence to be so strict a Command, that it cannot be taken off even by Civil Constitutions; and consequently that he who suffers himself to be kill'd, when he might have violently resisted, ought to be look'd upon as guilty of Self-murder^c. Which is something like the Custom in Sparta, where the Ephori punish'd a Man for having suffer'd many Persons to injure him^d.

The Author of the Treatise, De Principiis Justitiae & Decori, declares in favour of this Opinion; and the Argument he proceeds on is to this Purpose,

^a Hor. 2. Sat. 1. v. 44.

*Nec quisquam noccat cupido mihi pacis: at ille
Qui me commorit (melius non tangere, clamo)
Flebit.* ———

^b Plutarch in Phocion: 'Ο δὲ Φωκίων, ἐπὶ τὸ προσέειπαι ἄνδρα [Νικάνωρα] μὴ μὲν χαλαρῶν ἐγκαλέμεν, ἔφη πιστεύειν μὲν πρὸς Νικάνωρα, καὶ μὴ δὲν ἀπ' αὐτῆς προσδοκᾶν δεινόν. εἰ δὲ μὴ μάλλον ἐθέλειν ἀδικεῖν, ἢ ἀδικῶν φάνερον γένεσθαι. τὸ τοῦ ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ μὲν ἂν τινι σκοπεῖν εἰ δίκαια χαλοκαγαθῶς κελύχθαι, καὶ γενναίως. ὁ δὲ εἰς παρρησίαν ὑπεκινδυνεύων σωτηρίαν, καὶ ταῦτα στρατηγὸς καὶ ἄρχων, καὶ οὐδὲν μὴ μείζον πρὸς θανάτου, καὶ προσεβύτηεν τὸ πρὸς τοῦ πολιτείας δίκαιον. When he was censur'd by some for letting Nicanor, the Ambassador of Cassander, enjoy his Liberty, he answer'd, that he did not distrust the Man, nor apprehend any Danger from him: But if Things should happen otherwise, he would be glad to let the World see how much more willing he was to receive an Injury than to offer one. This, if he look'd no farther than his own Person, was spoke with Honesty, as well as with Bravery. But if a Man by such an Act of Generosity endangers the Safety of the State, especially being himself in a publick Trust, I question if he does not violate that greater and more sacred Law, his Obligation to his Country.

² In general, no Man can release his own Rights, or renounce his private Interests, when they are intermixed with another's, who will not allow us to do it. To this add the Example of Phocion alledged by our Author. See Letter^c.

³ Mr. Veltbuisen does not say this, 'tis our Author's Comment.

⁴ Liban. Declam. 23. Ἄ γδ ἂν ἐπαθεν, καὶ ἀδικῶν, ταῦτα αὐτὸν ἔδρασαν ἡδίκηκός. He who unless he had offer'd one Injury, had not suffer'd another, is equally the Cause of both.

old Maxim might be so well apply'd to this Case, that any Man may renounce his own Privilege, provided he doth not thereby injure a third Person: Which Quintilian hath thus express'd and illustrated, This, says he, is the Nature of all Benefits, that they do not impose a Necessity, but grant a Power. Whatever Expedient you invent to procure the Honour or Safety of another, loses the Name of a Privilege, if you compel him to make use of it. Run over all the Institutions and all the Rights of Mankind, and you shall never observe that the Law is so fondly solicitous for our Good, as to extort that from us, by which it intends only to do us a Favour.

III. But in order to more exact Judgment of Self-defence, and to know by what Rule it should be moderated, and how far it may rightly proceed: First of all we should examine, whether the Defendant live in a State of Nature, or of civil Society; since the Bounds of this Practice are much narrower in the latter than in the former Condition. Which Difference not being observ'd by many Authors, hath been the Occasion of their delivering such Things in general concerning unblameable Self-defence, as will hold true only under one particular State. But now if we first distinctly explain what Right we have to such a Practice in a State of Nature, it will appear with great Ease and Evidence, how far, and on what Grounds this Liberty is stinted, in Persons living together under a civil Government.

It is then a good Rule of Prudence, that a wife Man ought to try all other Expedients, before he proceed to Arms or Violence¹. For inasmuch as all Combat and forcible Contention is of uncertain Issue, it would be advisable first to make Experiment of safer Remedies and Redresses, e'er we enter the Lists, and come to a formal Engagement². Thus if I can cut off the Invader's Access to me, I am a Fool if I unnecessarily meet him hand to hand. And if I can defend myself with a Wall or a Gate, 'tis absurd in me to expose my Breast³ to my Foe. Farther, Wisdom advises us to put up a small Injury, if we can with convenience, and so rather to recede in some degree from our Right, than by an unseasonable Defence, to expose ourselves to a greater Danger: Especially if that Thing or Concern of ours, upon which the Attempt is made, may be easily made amends for, or repair'd³. Thus a Man who hath a Debt owing him from another, suppose to the Value of ten Pounds, would act more wisely, in my Judgment, if he made up the Business by any kind of Composition, than if he engag'd in a troublesome Suit, where the Lawyers Fees might exceed the main Sum which he endeavours to recover^b.

⁵ Declam. 7. Omnium beneficiorum ista natura est, ut non sit necessitas, sed potestas. Quicquid in honorem alicujus inventum est, desinit privilegium vocari posse, si cogas. Coacta, si videtur, jura percurrere, nusquam addo pro nobis sollicita lex est, ut quod prestat, extorqueat. See Mr. Daumal's Civil Laws, Tit. 1. Sect. 4. But we ought here to observe, contrary to our Author's Hypothesis, That Self-defence is not so inseparable a Right, that we may use it or not, at all Times as we see fit. The Law of Nature does not allow us to defend ourselves only, but it positively orders us thereby to love ourselves, and do all we can for our Preservation. See Mr. Vander Muelen's Commentary on Grotius, Lib. 2. Chap. 1. §. 8, & 9. and Mr. Titius's Observat. 121. If we were not under this Obligation, it would follow, that any Man might suffer himself to be kill'd as often as he was attack'd, and no Man need to be concern'd for his Preservation. Now, who sees not that this tends to the Destruction of a Community, and to deprive it of the most honest Men? Besides, such as survive would have a fair Occasion to leave the World. It is true, that the Creator hath provided by a natural Instinct, that every one should defend himself, inasmuch that we are more apt to offend on the other side than this; but this shews, that Self-defence is not a Thing absolutely indifferent in its own Nature, or barely permitted, so that it is always at our Liberty to suffer ourselves to be slain. All that has been said, tends only to this, that a Man may, yea, ought sometimes to renounce his Right of defending himself, as we shall shew below. And that in these last Cases, the Fear, into which the Greatness of Danger, and the Force of our Natural Instinct throws us, may excuse or free them from Blame, who save their own Lives by the Loss of theirs whom they ought rather to have spared with the Expence of their own. We may also believe on the other hand, that if one sacrifices his Life through great Kindness, or some other weighty Consideration which he has for the unjust Aggressor, who does not of himself deserve such a Sacrifice, he is excusable, for yielding to a Motive of that Nature, as to be of Force enough to overcome Self-love and Fear of Death.  _____ 'Tis wise to close
 A great Contention with a little Loss.
 'Tis hard to end a Quarrel with the Great.
 War is as blind as Chance: The doubtful Day
 Oft cheats the Fighter, e'er it end the Fray.

At the same time it may be observ'd, that the injur'd Party doth not owe this Patience and Moderation to the Person from whom he receiv'd the Damage; who, as far as lay in his Power, hath broke off all Duties of Humanity and Commerce with him; but to his own Security and Quiet. And therefore if a Man provok'd by Anger or Pain should happen to exceed these Bounds, he does no Injury to the Provoker, but can only be said to have⁶ acted imprudently, or without sufficient Temper and Discretion.

But when by the Application of these moderate Expedients, I cannot secure myself from the impending Danger, I am then to oppose Force with Force, and am compell'd to enter the Combat. During which, if the injurious Party continue to push on his malicious Designs against me, and do not declare his Sorrow and Repentance for his Fault, and his Willingness to renew the Peace, I am at liberty to kill him. And although he do not directly attack my Life, as suppose he only attempts to load me with a great Number of Blows, or to maim me by the Loss of some Member not vital, or to rob me of my Goods; yet since he hath once broke the Peace with me, and since he gives me no Caution or Security, that he will not from these lesser Injuries proceed to much greater, I may even in these Cases make use of Extremities for my own Deliverance. For at the same Instant, as a Man professes himself my Enemy (which he doth while he injures me without shew of Repentance) he gives me, as far as 'tis in his Power to give it, an⁷ infinite Liberty of proceeding against him. Some indeed there are who do not approve of this Liberty of resisting in infinitum: For (say they) there can be no natural Right of Defence and of Resistance against Injuries, but such as is consistent with that Order, which is the chief End and Design of a social Life. Therefore in resisting by natural Right, this Exception is always understood, unless the social Order be infring'd by my present resisting, to which Order Nature hath the first and chiefest Regard. And if this Caution were not interpos'd, upon our failing to maintain that necessary and natural Order, we should render Society itself unfociable^a. But we do by no means assert, that this infinite Liberty of resisting is to be actually made use of in all Cases; because several intervening Considerations may prevail with the injur'd Party not to proceed to Extremities: But only that the injurious Person cannot complain of hard Measure, though he be repell'd with the utmost Violence and Severity. The Life of Men would be then indeed most properly render'd unfociable, if, in a natural State, any Bounds were set to the Liberty of Resistance. For what an Age of Torments should I undergo, if another Man were allow'd perpetually to lay me on only with moderate Blows, whose Malice I could not otherwise stop or repel, than by compassing his Death? Or if a Neighbour were continually to infest me with Incurfions and Ravages upon my Lands and Possessions, whilst I could not lawfully kill him, in my Attempts to beat him off? For since the chief Aim of human Sociableness is the Safety of every Person, we ought not to fancy in it any such Laws, as would make every good and modest Man of necessity miserable, as often as any wicked Varlet should please to violate the Law of Nature against him. And it would be highly absurd to establish Society amongst Men on so destructive a Bottom as a Necessity of enduring Wrongs. Wherefore he is to be reckon'd a foolish and base Traytor to his own Safety, who whilst an Enemy persists in the Exercise of Hostility, vainly spares his Life, and chooses rather to perish than to destroy. For the Law of Nature obliges me thus far only to be mild and merciful towards my Enemy, as that if he shall express a Sorrow for what is past, and an Inclination to desist from farther Injury, shall make Retribution for my present Damage, and give Security for his not offending hereafter, I may entirely spare and pardon him, and, renewing the Peace, may perform all friendly Offices towards him, as he shall towards me⁸. For meer Revenge, which proposes no Aim but the Grief or the Destruction of Controversy to the Decision of Friends. Lucian. Eunuch. This is highly ridiculous, that Men who pretend to Philosophy, should engage in Suits and Quarrels; whereas they ought to compose, in a Friendly Manner, their Differences of the greatest Consequence. Add. l. 4. f. 1. D. de alienat. jud. mut. That which Polybius (in Excerpt. Pieresc.) applies to the Achæans, proves a Truth in many other Cases, εἰ μὴ ταχέως ἀπολωμένοι ἔκ ἀν' ἐσώθημεν: Unless we had been quickly lost, we had never been sav'd. Seneca, de Irâ l. 2. c. 14. Reason often prescribes Patience, when Anger calls for Revenge: And when we might have escap'd smaller Evils, we sink ourselves into greater. Some upon the Resentment of one affronting Word have been cast into Banishment: They have incur'd the severest Troubles, by not being able to digest a slight Injury; and been made arrant Slaves, by their disdain of a petty Encroachment on their Liberty. See Stobæus, Serm. 19. To this may be apply'd, the * Interpretation of Matth. v. 25. offer'd by Gratius, l. 1. c. 1. f. 8. Though others will have that Saying to relate to Men who are under Oppression, and who cannot obtain Justice. (Comp. Lamentat. iii. 28, 29, 30.) Whereas in a well-ordered Commonwealth every one is oblig'd to apply himself for Redress of Injuries to the Judge (Levit. v. 1.) not for the sake of Revenge (Levit. xix. 17, 18.) but with a good Design of defending the Laws and Justice of his Country, and to hinder wicked Men from reaping any Gain, or any Pleasure from their Crimes. Lyfias, Orat. contrâ Theomnest. I take it to be a Sign of a most litigious and a most ungenerous Temper, to sue a Man for an affronting Word. It was a Law amongst the Cyrenians, that the Ephori should bring the litigious Citizens before the Court of Justice, and impose a Fine on them, with the Addition of a Disgrace. Arrian, Epictet. l. 1. c. 28. Suppose I stand as deaf as a Stone when I am abus'd; what Advantage can the Slanderer reap from his Calumny? Seneca de Irâ. To despise Injuries is a Mark of a great and generous Mind. 'Tis one of the most grating Ways of being reveng'd upon a Man, by seeming not to think him worthy our Revenge. He is truly brave and noble, who like some Princely Beast, can hear the puny Dogs barking about him with Scorn and Security.

* This Explication does not give us the true Meaning of CHRIST's Words, whose Sense is certainly this, as Mr. Le Clerc expresses it: "JESUS CHRIST would not have us to go to Law for small Matters, lest having suffer'd one Injury, we bring upon us another. Moderation much gains and sweetens Mens Minds, and sooner makes an end of Quarrels than the Penalties which the Magistrates inflict according to Law. The Revenge which is exercised by their Means, is often the Cause of irreconcilable Animosities between Families."

⁷ Antiphon. Orat. 11. Οὐ γὰρ πῦτα, ἀλλὰ μείζονα καὶ πλείονα δίκαιοι οἱ ἀρῶντες ἀπιπέθαι εἰσὶ, i. e. "The first Aggressors in an Injury not only deserve to suffer the same, but much greater Evils."

⁸ It is a Rule of Hesiod's, Oper. & Dier. l. 1. v. 710.

Ἡγήτ' ἐς φιλότῳτα, δίκην δ' ἐθέλεισι παραγαῖν, Δέξασθαι.

But if the injurious Friend the Wrong repair,
And beg a Re-admission to thy Care, Reject him not _____ him who hath hurt us, is detested and discarded by Nature, as falling under the Vice of Cruelty. Whence it follows, that the Remembrance of Enmities and Contentions ought as soon as possible to be defaced out of our Minds. On this Account, as we find the Story in Tully, the Thebans were accus'd in the General Dyet or Council of Greece, for setting up a Brazen Trophy of their Victory over the Lacedemonians; inasmuch as it did not become one Grecian State to fix an eternal Monument of their Quarrel with another. For it seems, the Custom was to raise their Trophies only of Wood, to prevent their long and reproachful Continuance⁹.

But further, Persons in a natural State may not only repel a present Danger that threatens them, but having got rid of that Fear, may pursue their Success against the Assailant, till such time as, upon sufficient Caution given, they shall think themselves secure of him for the future. Concerning which Caution this is to be observ'd; if a Man having injur'd me, shall presently after, repenting of what he had done, desire my Pardon, and offer Reparation of the Damage, I am then oblig'd to be reconcil'd to him, and cannot fairly demand any farther Security than his Faith and Promise. For his voluntary Repentance, and Application to me for Pardon,¹⁰ are a sufficient Argument of his firm Resolution to offer me no Wrong for the future. But he who must be brought to Repentance by main Force, and who then only thinks of begging Pardon, when his Strength fails him in prosecuting his Violences; such an one is not safely to be trusted on his bare Promise: And therefore in order to our farther Security, we must either cut off from him all Power of doing mischief, or we must lay some such Bond or Confinement on him, as shall hinder him from appearing ever after formidable to us: Inasmuch as his Malice having been once express'd, and never rightly purg'd or amended, hath render'd him a just Object of our perpetual Suspicion.

IV. But that which is a lawful Practice in Men living under a natural Liberty, who are to work out their Safety by their own Strength, and according to their own Judgment, can by no means be indulg'd in the Members of Civil States; and especially in regard to their Dealings with their Fellow Subjects. For against these who live under the same Government and Laws (either perpetually, or only for the time being) they ought to be so moderate in the Use of this violent Self-defence, as then only to betake themselves to it, when the Time and Place will not admit of any Application to the Magistrate for his Assistance in repressing such an Injury, as puts either their Life, or something as valuable as their Life, or some Good which can never be repair'd, into present and manifest Danger. And even in such a Case we are, by our own Strength only, to rid ourselves of the present Mischiefe, leaving both the Punishment, and the Caution for future good Behaviour, entirely to the Magistrate's Determination. Cicero² tells us, that nothing is so contrary to Rights and Laws, as the using Force in a well-order'd Commonwealth: But then 'tis his own Observation in another Place, that these Laws are silent, when Arms appear bent against us; and do not command us to wait for their Help and Protection, when we should most certainly suffer an unjust Violence, before we could procure a just Redress.

By these Rules and Foundations which we have laid, may be decided most of those Disputes, which are usually bandied in Authors, concerning the Measure and the Moderation of unblameable Self-defence.

V. Some Men have rais'd a Doubt, whether, supposing a Person assaults me by mistake, without any evil Design against me, and intending to employ his Force against another, I may in such a Case kill him in my own Defence. For the clearing of which Point Grotius³ lays down this Principle to proceed upon, That the Right of Defence doth primarily and absolutely arise from that Favour of Nature, by which she hath recommended every Man most strongly to himself, whence no one can refuse to apply all his Endeavours for the Procurement of his own Safety; and not from the Injustice or the Sin of the Aggressor. It will therefore be sufficient to render my Defence innocent, if the Assailant have no Right to invade or to destroy me, and I lie under no Obligation of taking Death at his Hands, without Reluctancy or Resistance. Farther, since in the

§. V. ¹ We ought to observe these two Conditions, for upon them depend some Cases which our Author makes no mention of, as that of a Person being assaulted by his Prince. What we are to think of this, is this, in my Judgment: I suppose, that he that defends himself resolves to free himself of the unjust Aggressor, by killing him, otherwise he had better suffer himself to be kill'd than come under the Hand of the Executioner, and suffer cruel Torments. This being premis'd, the Prince who would kill me, does it either maliciously, and with Deliberation, or else in a Passion, which he can't govern. In the first Case, I may as lawfully defend myself against him as against my Equal. See my Comment on the Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and

Case propos'd the Love of our own Persons and Lives must needs gain an easy Conquest over all other Considerations, it is impossible but that a Man who finds himself expos'd to equal Danger with another, must, if he follow Nature, give his own Deliverance the Preference in his Regard: And since such a Danger as we are speaking of is brought on me without my deserving it, my Fact is, for that Reason, the less odious, if I turn the Mischief on the Author. All this being taken for granted, 'twill be very easy to decide all those Particulars and Cases which may happen about the Point in hand. As suppose a mad Man, or a Person walking in his Sleep and affrighted with some terrible Dream, should make an Attempt upon my Life; inasmuch as he hath no Right of assaulting me, and I have good Reason to prize myself above all Things, it doth by no means appear why I should prefer his Safety to my own. But here it must necessarily be suppos'd, that I could not decline the threaten'd Danger any other way: Which is not so scrupulously to be observ'd, when a Man attacks me upon a Grudge, or upon a manifest ill Design. The same Decision will hold, in case a Soldier, fighting with good Intentions, assaults me, whom he mistakes for one of his Enemies. For if even an Enemy had a Right of resisting him, there's no reason why I, who am in no such State of Opposition, should patiently run upon his Sword: But he ought to impute it to his own Folly and Heedlessness, that he thus drives a Friend on the Necessity of an hostile Act; since he ought to have known against whom his Force was to be employ'd. The same is to be said, when a private Man, lying in wait for one with whom he hath a particular Quarrel, sets upon me, instead of him, by mistake. For why should I, upon account of the Aggressor's Blunder, be brought under a harder Condition than that other Man, whom perhaps he had some Reason to hate? Such an Assailant is indeed by the ² Cornelian Law of Rome guilty of Murder. For though there was an Error in the Person, yet there was no Error in the Design; but the Will and the Attempt of committing Murder were both manifestly declar'd^a.

VI. To render the Defence of ourselves entirely innocent, it is commonly thought a necessary Condition, that, as to the Time, the Danger be just upon us, or, as it were, in the very Point of feizing us: And that no Suspicion or Fear, whilst yet uncertain, is sufficient to justify our assaulting another. But this Assertion too will prove very unaccurate, unless we relieve it with our Distinction between a Natural and a Civil State. For as in neither Case the Point of Danger, which these Men speak of, can be understood without some Latitude, so is it most certain, that Persons plac'd under a Natural Liberty are allow'd a longer Space in making their Defence by Violence, than those who live under the Protection and Assistance of a Government.

Inasmuch as Nature obliges us to maintain Peace with others, it may and ought to be presum'd that every one will fulfil this Obligation, unless he give manifest Evidence of contrary Designs, and unless it be apparent that he quits his Obedience to sound Reason, which advis'd him to this Duty. But considering how prone the greatest Part of Mankind are to violate this Precept of Reason, whoever hath a true Concern for his own Safety, will fortify himself betimes by all innocent Methods of Defence; as suppose by shutting up the Avenues against such as are plotting any hostile Design; by providing Arms and all other Necessaries for offensive or defensive Force; by entering into Confederacies and Alliances; by keeping a watchful Eye upon the Motions and Attempts of others, and the like. Thus we justly esteem it Wisdom in a Commonwealth, to think of War during the full Enjoyment of Peace. And altho' Innocency will always find a strong Guard and Support in the Divine Providence, yet is it most senseless Vanity for that Man to expect Miracles from Heaven for his Deliverance, who lies still in a drowsy Idleness, and neglects all Care of his own Affairs. And even in Civil States, where our Goods are in some measure secur'd against Thieves and Ravagers, by the Severity of Penal Sanctions, he would be reckon'd a very ill Husband, who should forbear to secure his Doors in the Night, or to lock up his Closets and his Chests. To this purpose we are inform'd, that the old Romans us'd to seal their meanest Utensils and Household Goods with their Rings, to secure them from pilfering Slaves; over whom, at the same time, they had the free Power of Life and Death^b.

But now, though my providing thus far for my

Citizen, L. 1. c. 5. §. 20. In the latter Case, I ought to spare him, and rather sacrifice my own Life than take away his, provided that he did not by his own Fault put himself into a Condition where he could not command himself; for if a Prince, knowing himself subject to such violent Transports of Anger, and Lion-like Fury, gives himself up to his Temper, without any Restraint, and takes no Care to avoid Provocations, at least in certain Circumstances, and to keep himself from Drink, he deserves to be had in no Regard, and we have as much Right to defend ourselves against him, as if he acted in cold Blood. He had a Design to hurt us, if not formally, yet interpretatively, at least, and the Interest of a Society is so far from requiring us to suffer ourselves to be slain by such a Sovereign, that it ought itself to fear him. After all, there is nothing more easy for Princes, since few of them are good Men, than to keep themselves from such Extravagances. If a Society loses by a Change, it also gets sometimes by it, and perhaps it would be better for it, if Men would not allow Princes so great a Liberty to satisfy their Passions, and if Successors had before their Eyes some sad Examples of an unhappy Fate, which their Predecessors had brought upon themselves by thinking all Things lawful for them. What I have said, will, by a much stronger Reason, have place in respect to the Ministers of a Prince, and his inferior Magistrates, for whom, doubtless, there is much less Regard to be had than to the Person of the Sovereign himself. I shall speak something, §. 14. Note ult. of the Case, where the unjust Aggressor is a Father.

² The Cornelian Law, which is treated of in the *Digest. Lib. 48. §. VI. ¹ Such are principally in relation to States, Fortresses built on the Borders of Kingdoms. See Mr. Thomasius's Discourse upon this Subject, entitled, Non-Ens actionis Forensis contra ædificantem ex æmulatione, §. 18, &c.

Security can be injurious to none, yet before I can actually assault another under Colour of my own Defence, I must have Tokens and Arguments amounting to a moral Certainty, that he entertains a Grudge against me, and hath a full Design of doing me a Mischief, so that, unless I prevent him, I shall immediately feel his Stroke. Amongst these Signs and Tokens, giving me a Right to make a violent Assault on another Man, I must by no means reckon his bare Superiority to me in Strength and Power; especially if that Happiness deriv'd its Increase from harmless Industry, or from the Bounty of Providence, without the Oppression of others. For 'twould be inhuman Malice, to envy another, and to endeavour to take from him a Blessing which he came so fairly by. 'Tis a very gross Knack of philosophizing which some Men have got, when they tell us, by way of Advice, He that is able to hurt you, undoubtedly is willing; and therefore, without farther Warning, down with him, as you love your own Safety. This kind of Doctrine is manifestly destructive of all sociable Commerce amongst Men; and the Authors commonly cited in Defence of it, either are such whose Character prevents their Authority, or else in the Passages alledg'd from them, they speak only of Precaution in our dealing with those Wretches, who have given us sufficient Tokens of their Resolution to hurt us ^a ². And whereas some Men bring Examples instead of Arguments for so base a Practice, this is to make another's Sin the Rule and Standard of my acting ^b. Yet because any Man may abuse his Strength to ill Purposes, therefore, as we said before, we ought to fence against Danger, by timely and by harmless Methods.

Nay, although such a mighty Neighbour hath shewn himself to have the Will of hurting as well as the Power, he doth not yet give me directly a just Cause of setting upon him, because he doth not yet express this ill Will towards me in particular. For it is not sufficient Proof that a Man designs to hurt me, because he hath already hurt others; in as much as he might be provok'd to his Attempt on them by some particular Reasons, which he doth not find against me. An Injury then done to another, gives me no License of falling on the Aggressor, whilst I am tied to both Parties only by the common Band of Humanity. But I may happen to be united by a more peculiar Obligation to the injur'd Person; as if, upon his Desire, I have promis'd and engag'd to assist him. For it is very agreeable to Social Nature, that a Man who hath himself receiv'd no Wrong, should yet join Forces on Covenant with another, to help him to drive off an unjust Assault, as being allied to him by those general Ties which hold together all Mankind. Because, supposing the two Parties to be otherwise indifferent to me, yet it is a standing Rule, that an Injury receiv'd ought to incline me to Favour, and an Injury offer'd ³, to Hatred and Aversion ^c. But farther, if on good and probable Grounds I suspect that this powerful Aggressor, when he hath dispatch'd his first Prey, will turn his Force upon me, and use his former Conquest for the Instrument of another; I may then more readily assist the distress'd Party, because his Preservation is likely to ensure my own Safety. As a wise Man will lend his best Help towards quenching a Fire in his Neighbour's House, when his own is the next in Danger.

More than this, if it appear by clear Tokens that a Man is at present under a real Design of hurting us, though he doth not yet proceed to the open Execution of it, supposing us to live in a natural State, we may immediately enter on our own Defence by violent Methods, and prevent the Foe, provided that either upon a friendly Admo-

^a And as for that saying of Cicero (Epist. Fam. 11. Ep. 28.) Even Slaves have been always allow'd this Liberty to fear according to their own Judgment, not another's; we may oppose to it the sharp Return of Vibius Crispus (in Quintilian. l. 8. c. 5.) Who ever gave you Permission to fear so unreasonably? Nay, Cicero himself hath sufficiently overthrow'n this Opinion, Who, says he, ever made such an Ordinance as this, or to whom can this be granted, without the manifest Danger of the whole Community, that a Man may lawfully kill him, by whom he shall pretend to fear being hereafter kill'd? Orat. pro Tull. in Quintil. l. 5. c. 13.
^b Add. Alberic. Gentil. de Jure Belli, l. 1. c. 14. ^c For that of Exodus ii. 14. only holds in a Civil State.

² Our Author quotes these Words of Cicero, as favouring the Opinion which he confutes: At hæc etiam servis semper libera fuerunt, timerent, gauderent, dolerent suo potius, quam alterius arbitrio. But if we consider the following part of the Discourse, we shall find that the Words will not bear the Sense which he gives them. The Latin of the following passage in Quintilian is, Quis hoc statuit unquam, aut cui concedi sine summo omnium periculo potest, ut cum jure potuerit occidere, à quo metuisse se dicat, ne ipse posterius occideretur?

³ That the Laws of Nature, which tend to the Preservation of Mankind, may be observ'd, without which they are useless, and that no Man may offer an Injury to his Neighbour, Nature has given every Man a Right to punish the Violation of its Laws, both in respect to all Mankind, and to private Persons. The Laws of Nature, as well as all others, which are imposed upon Men here below, would be altogether useless, if no Body in the free State of Nature had Power to execute them, by protecting and preserving the Innocent, and restraining the Insolent. For all Men being naturally equal, it follows, that if in that Estate every one have Right to punish the Breach of the Law of Nature, there is no Man but hath it in as large an Extent as another. These are the Principles of the illustrious Mr. Locke, in Part I. of his excellent Treatise of Civil Government, Lib. 2. Chap. 2. We shall elsewhere observe the Consequences which he draws from it in Relation to other Matters of Importance. See Lib. 8. Chap. 3. §. 4. Note 3. Hence it appears, that our Author is mistaken, when he affirms, That unless we are under some particular Engagement to help a Person that is wronged by another, we are not obliged to oppose this latter, unless he insults us directly. Much rather, we not only have a Right to espouse the Quarrel of the Injured, but also, according to the Laws of Humanity, we are indispensibly engag'd to defend him, if we find our selves able to do it. This is the Consequence of the Principle of Sociableness, as Mr. Titius, with much Reason maintains, Observ. 131. And I wonder our Author did not mind it, since, in Lib. 1. Chap. 5. §. 14. he approves of that fine Maxim of Cicero, Qui non defendit, nec obstitit, si potest, injuria, tam est in vitio, quam si parentes, aut amicos, aut patriam deserat, i. e. "He that does not prevent or resist an Injury, if he "be able, is as much to blame, as he that forsakes his Friends, Parents, or Country." Menander also has a fine Sentence relating to this Matter, saying, "If any one would be as much concern'd for the Injuries done to another, as if he receiv'd them "himself, and vigorously undertake the Defence of them that are oppress'd, there would not be so many Evil-doers, and those "that are would not be so daring.

dition he is not likely to be driven from his hostile Intentions, or that the giving such an Admonition would prove of ill Consequence to our Affairs. For no Man is oblig'd to expect patiently the Insult of another, that he may thereby build the Justice of his Violence on the absolute Necessity of his Defence. And therefore, in this Case, he is to be accounted the Aggressor, who made the first Motion towards hurting his Neighbour, or who conceiv'd the first Design of Mischief, and was preparing to accomplish it, though the other Party using greater Expedition, may have surpriz'd and oppress'd him before he could bring his Plot to Perfection. For it is not absolutely necessary to the Notion and Business of Defence, that a Man receive the first Stroke, or that he only ward off or elude the Blows that are aim'd at him; but he too shall be interpreted to act by way of Self-defence, who, taking his Foe tardy, hath prevented the Mischief that was hatching against him⁴.

VII. But we must by no means allow an equal Liberty to the Members of Civil States. For here, if the Adversary be a Foreigner, we may resist and repel him any way at the Instant when he comes violently upon us: But we cannot (without the Sovereign's Command) either assault him whilst his Mischief is only in Machination, or revenge our selves upon him after he hath perform'd the Injury against us¹, lest we should, by this rash and unwarrantable Proceeding, involve our Country in an unnecessary and unseasonable War. And a much greater degree of Caution must be us'd in our Dealings with our Fellow Subjects. For though I understand that such an one is now coming to do me a Mischief, or that he threatned me desperately in Publick, this will on no Account bear me out in assaulting him; but I am to inform against him before the common Magistrate, who is to require Security for his good Behaviour. But if the Magistrate refuse to interpose, I may then consult² my own Safety by what Means I can, with the same Freedom as if I were plac'd under a natural State and Condition.

Those Moralists are widely mistaken, who, as Grotius^a says, maintain, "That I may lawfully kill, not only the Man who offers me present Violence, but him too whom I shall have discover'd to plot and conspire against me; as by Poison, by false Accusation, false Witnesses, the Procurement of an unjust Sentence, or the like." Nor is the Absurdity at all lessen'd by that Restriction which they add³, if either the Danger cannot otherwise be avoided, or if we are not sufficiently assur'd that it cannot. Because such a Delay of Time as is here suppos'd, how short soever, may put us on many good Ways of Redress and Relief; besides⁴ the Variety of Accidents which may perhaps work our Deliverance. It is manifest, that these Authors suppose a Civil State, because in that only we can conceive such Things as unjust Judgments, Accusations, Witnesses, &c. For the Suppression of which Injuries, if we permit the Subjects to inflict Death, what occasion have we for Magistrates or for Laws? No Man is in Danger of being condemn'd, if he can prove the Accuser guilty of Calumny and Forgery. Yet, if being unable to make this out, he assaults his Life, 'twill be hard to excuse him from the Legal Censure and Penalty of Murther. But when a Man is already actually set upon, and reduc'd to such Streights, that he hath not Power or Opportunity to implore the Assistance of the Magistrate, or his Neighbours, he may then make use of Extremities in repelling the Assailant: Yet the Reason and Ground of his proceeding to such Violence must not be, that he may thus revenge himself for the Injury offer'd; but only because he could not otherwise secure his Life from the imminent Danger. And therefore supposing that Danger to be more easily driven off, he cannot lawfully pursue the Aggressor, so as to strike or harm him in his Flight⁵.

VIII. It appears then from these Considerations, that under the Civil Governments the Time of making an unblameable Self-defence, is set within very narrow Bounds, and indeed reduc'd almost

² We may add, and that of ours. So Moses seeing one of his Brethren, an Israelite, suffer Wrong, he defended him; and in vindicating the Person injured, slew the Egyptian, Exod. ii. 11, 12. and Acts vii. 24. for, as Mr. Le Clerc says upon this last Passage, "Moses knew very well that the Israelites could obtain no Justice of the Egyptian Judges. And when Power is arrived at that height, that Justice can't be had, and the Foundations of Civil Society are destroy'd, we return again to the State of Nature, in which 'tis lawful for every one to defend himself and his Friends, against all Force, without seeking Help, in vain, from them who will not assist us. But this Right can't be made use of but in extreme Confusion, as Egypt was, where any Injuries might be done the Israelites, without any Fear from the Egyptian Judges."

³ Grotius reads it thus, but carelessly. He maintains that all the Reasons which he mentions there, are not sufficient to prevent a Person who has ill Designs against us, and kill him, altho' he can find out some way to escape the Danger, or is not sure that he can otherwise escape it; which Determination he founds upon the Remedies and Accidents which a little Space of Time may produce. But he adds, that there are some Divines and Lawyers, who extend this Favour farther, i. e. as any one may see, who grant to the Person against whom any thing is attempted, a greater Liberty, believing that he hath a Right to prevent his Enemy, although he could avoid the Danger some other way. So these Moralists do not perplex themselves in any manner with the Restriction of which our Author speaks. Grotius embraces the Exception in the Negative, and maintains it against them. Nevertheless I assert, That if you examine the Thing in itself, he doth not sufficiently distinguish between the State of Nature and Civil State, as will appear by what our Author says afterwards.

to a Point or Instant, yet such as admits some small Latitude, and in which a slight Excess will escape the Magistrate's Censure. And therefore altho' an understanding Judge will be best able to settle the Innocency of any Defence, from the Circumstances of the particular Facts: Yet we think it may be asserted in general, that the exact Time when a Man may fairly destroy another in his own Defence, begins at the Instant, when the Aggressor shewing plainly his Design upon my Life, and being furnish'd with Strength and Weapons for the Execution, is already got into a Place whence he may perform his Mischief; Allowance being only made me for just so much Space as is necessarily requir'd for me to attack him in, before he attacks me. For Example, if a Man is making towards me with a naked Sword, and with full Signification of his Intention to stab me, and I at the same time have a Gun in my Hand, I may fairly discharge it at him whilst he is at a Distance, and cannot yet reach me with his Weapon, because, should he get too near me, my Arms would be of no use. And the same holds more strongly in relation to Bows, and Instruments of that nature, which signify nothing at all, unless we give them full Room and Space to exert their Force in. Again, suppose a Man approach me with full Design upon my Life, and is only arm'd with Pistols, or the like, whilst I am furnish'd with a longer Piece, I am not oblig'd to wait till he comes within Pistol-shot, but may prevent him with my Arms before he can use his own. For this is what the Laws call ¹ to meet a Danger in time, which is esteem'd much better, than to revenge it after it hath taken Effect. The continuance of this Time for innocent Defence is so long as till the Aggressor either is repuls'd, or hath retreated of his own accord, whether repenting of the mischievous Design in the very Moment that he was performing it, or else because he sees he is like to lose his Aim; as suppose his Sword is broke, or his Piece hath mis'd fire, or shot beside us; so that at present he can hurt us no farther, and we have an Opportunity of retiring into a Place of Safety. For the Revenge for past Injury, and the Caution for future Security, belong to the Care of the Magistrate, whom we are to address on those Accounts ². Whoever, enjoying the Protection of a Civil Government, shall kill another beyond these Bounds and Conditions, under the Notion of Self-defence, cannot be acquitted as entirely guiltless. Whence we may perceive how unreasonable the Assertion of old Baldus is, when he declares, If a Man chance to say to me, I'll kill you where ever I find you from hence forward, I may, without incurring any Penalty, take away his Life by way of Prevention, either in the midst of his Threats, or whenever I can do it with most Convenience. For though I be not oblig'd to wait till he performs his Threats, yet in a Commonwealth I ought to pursue other ways of Safety than by killing him: Even when it appears from the former Course of his Life that he is not backward in making good such bold Resolutions; which Condition is by some Authors added to mitigate Baldus's Opinion.

IX. As to the common Determination; that this killing a Man in our own Defence is then only innocent, when we cannot possibly escape the Danger by other Means; this is not to be interpreted in too strict a Sense, but admits of a reasonable Latitude, upon account of that Perturbation of Mind which arises from so surprizing and so imminent a Mischief. For it is scarce possible that a Man under so terrible Apprehension should be so exact in considering and discovering all Ways of Escape, as he who being set out of Danger can sedately deliberate on the Case. Hence, as it is meer Rashness for me to come out of a safe Hold to him who challenges me, so if another assault me in an open Place, I am not strictly oblig'd to betake myself to Flight, unless there be near at hand a Place of most secure Refuge; nor am I always bound to draw back from the Onset. Because I then turn my defenceless Parts to the Danger, and there is great Hazard of tripping or falling; and besides, when I have once quitted my Posture of Guard, 'tis not very easy to recover myself. Neither doth it render my Defence blameable, if I chose to run the Hazard of such Accidents, rather than omit such Business, which was either a part of my Duty, or which however I had a Liberty of acting: As suppose, whilst I am going to any publick Place, about my Affairs, I kill a Man that sets upon me in the Way, I am not the less innocent, because if I had staid at home the Thing had not happen'd. For the publick Security would be ill guarded, and our Liberty would stand us in little stead, if we might not make use of it in opposing those sudden Violences which others offer us, out of pure Malice and wicked Design.

There is no need of proving Balsamon's Distinction ^b to be ridiculous; A Man (says he) who kills another in his own Defence, is free from all Guilt, if the other Person had first given him a Mortal Wound, or the like Mischief; but if the Hurt that was first offer'd him be slight and cureable, the Slaughter of the Aggressor is then unjust, and he must answer for the Fact.

Much more pleasant is their Nicety, who make it a Question, Whether an Equality of Weapons be necessary to the rendering a Defence innocent? As if the Aggressors were so generous, as constantly to give Notice to the other Party of their Design, and of the Arms they purpos'd to make use of; that they might have Leisure to furnish themselves in like manner for the Combat. Or if in these Rencontres we were to act on our Defence by the strict Rules of the common Sword Plays, and Tryals of Skill, where the Champions and their Weapons are nicely match'd and measur'd for our better Diversion.

But it must be observ'd on this Head, that the Plea of Self-defence shall not excuse or indemnify him, who being challeng'd to meet in the way of Duel, doth by so appearing put himself into such a Condition, that he must either kill or be kill'd.

For in the Estimation of such a Fact, the Danger will not be consider'd, since the Laws forbid him to meet it; and therefore he will not only be guilty of Manſlaughter, but will ſtand obnoxious to thoſe other Penalties which are particularly ordain'd againſt the Cuſtom of Duelling.

X. There is one Enquiry commonly made farther on this Point, and that is, Whether it be lawful for a Man to kill another, who comes upon him, not with a Deſign to take away his Life, but only to maim him; provided the Danger cannot be otherwiſe avoided? And here, as to a Natural State, we may ſafely hold the affirmative Side of the Queſtion. For Nature hath inspir'd us with ſo tender a Care to preſerve our Bodies whole and entire, that we cannot but make uſe of all Ways and Methods for that purpoſe; and the Loſs of one Member, eſpecially if it be of the moſt noble Kind, is reckon'd almoſt equal to the Loſs of Life itſelf. Beſides, Death is frequently the Conſequence of ſuch barbarous Treatment; and I have no Security but that the Villian will proceed to greater Miſchief. Laſtly, as we have heretofore hinted, ſuch an Attempt declares a Man my open Enemy, and conſequently gives me a Licence in infinitum of acting againſt him.

Nor do the Laws, even in Civil Governments, ſeem to engage the Subjects to ſuch hard Conditions, as that they muſt rather ſuffer themſelves to be maim'd, than uſe Extremities in repelling the Aſſailant: For ſince ſuch a degree of Patience ſurpaſſes the ordinary Strength and Conſtancy of Mankind, 'twould look very rigid to require it, only in favour of a malicious Rogue. But when ſuch an Injury is once actually receiv'd, the Proſecution of the Malefactor is to be left entirely to the Magiſtrate.

XI. The Defence of Chaſtity is in almoſt all Nations eſteem'd equal to the Defence of Life, and doth in the ſame manner excuſe the Slaughter of thoſe who attempt it. The Reaſon of this Favour is grounded on the natural Conſideration, that the Honour of Women is their chief Treafure and Ornament; together with the Reſpect had to the Weakneſs of the Fair Sex, which 'twas convenient ſhould be guarded by all poſſible means from Violence and Abufe^a. Even in Civil States, as the Legislators might very reaſonably appoint Capital Punishments for Offences of this kind, ſo they might farther give a Liberty to all honeſt Women, to uſe Extremities in their own Defence, upon danger of loſing what 'tis impoſſible for them to recover, and for which no Reparation can be made them. Amongſt the Jews, as Mr. Selden^b tells us, a Man was allow'd to kill another, not only in his own Defence, but in the Defence of a third Perſon, if unjuſtly aſſaulted, whether with regard to Life, or to Chaſtity of either kind^c. And thus the Sentence of C. Marius was highly applauded amongſt the Romans, when he not only abſolv'd, but crown'd the Soldier who had kill'd his Nephew, a Tribune, or Colonel in the Army, for ſoliciting him to an unnatural Debauch^d. St. Auguſtine^e hath a Saying, that the Holineſs or Purity of the Body is never loſt, whiſt the Purity of the Mind remains, tho' the Body ſuffer Violence^f. But it follows no more from hence, that forcible Ravishers are not to be repell'd with Extremities, than that becauſe a good Man is tranſlated to eternal Happineſs by Death, therefore he ought not to defend himſelf with Violence againſt a Villain who attempts his Life.

'Tis^g obſervable what Lyſias^h reports, that the Attick Laws decreed a ſeverer Punishment againſt him who perſuaded a Woman to an unchaſt Compliance, than againſt him who compell'd her by mere Force. The Reaſon we find ſubjoin'd, Becauſe (ſays he) *a Man who commits a violent Rape is ſuppos'd to be hated by whom he abuſes. Whereas thoſe who by Flattery and Inſinuations tempt Women to their Deſires, do by this Means gain a greater Intereſt and Authority with them than their own Huſbands, and conſequently have the whole Family in their Power and Diſpoſal: beſides the Inconvenience of confounding the Childrens Birth, and hindring all Diſtinction between thoſe who came lawfully, and thoſe who came unlawfully into the World*ⁱ.

XII. 'Tis another famous Queſtion, Whether the Danger of receiving a Box on the Ear, or ſome ſuch ignominious, though ſlight Injury, will excuſe the killing of a Man in our own Defence. And Grotius's Deciſion^j makes it not to be repugnant to expletive Juſtice. The Senſe of which Expreſſion is this, that ſince expletive Juſtice is equally violated by denying one that which he had a perfect Right to poſſeſs, or by bringing ſomewhat

XI. ¹ The Affront is ſo much the greater, becauſe a Woman of Honour may be reduced to that hard Neceſſity, to raiſe up, from her own Blood, a Child to an Enemy, Duties of a Man and Citizen. Lib. 1. Chap. 5. §. 22. To me the very Recital of ſuch an Argument is its own Confutation. And I ſhould wonder that Mr. Bayle ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be blinded with ſuch weak Reaſons, if I did not plainly ſee, that he has eſpouſed the falſe Notions of ſuch as pervert the Moral Doctrines of the Goſpel, by ſuch Explications as are contrary to the Rules of good Senſe and Criticiſm.

on him which he had likewise a perfect Right not to suffer; when a Person is kill'd for offering an Injury of this Nature, there can be no Complaint made that a Breach of expletive Justice hath been committed upon him. For he who first makes an Attempt of any Mischief against another, retains no Right why the other should not proceed to Extremities in returning it; or (what comes to the same thing) gives the other an infinite Right of opposing him; though other Considerations may frequently hinder the injur'd Party from a full and rigorous Use of this Right. Nor will it signify any thing to object, that in such Returns that equality is neglected which Justice commonly requires. For that Equality is chiefly concern'd with the Exchanges of Things, and the Distribution of common Goods. But Evils, which by way of War are mutually offer'd, cannot be exactly reduc'd to any such Measure, nor is it necessary they should. As for Grotius's Remark, that the degree of hurting in War should be stated according to the Manner of Restitution and Reparation in Civil Damages; there is good Reason for this Limitation to it, as nearly as we can: And then that Moderation doth not arise from any Right inherent in the Enemy, but from the Generosity and Courage of the Victor. Grotius adds, that Charity doth not of it self require our patiently suffering such an Affront, in favour of the Person who offer'd it; tho' the Doctrine of the Gospel doth indeed forbid the Repulse of such Attempts by violent Means.

For our Parts, we have already shewn, that in a natural State a Man cannot be requir'd to bear even a slight Injury (especially if it be continued) without endeavouring, even by the utmost Violence, to keep it off. And we read, that the most holy King David, for an Affront put upon his Ambassadors, rais'd a War, to almost the utter Ruin of a Nation^a.

But 'tis very doubtful, whether in Members of a Civil State the same violent Procedure is excusable. It is indeed in common Judgment a most high Affront to receive a Box on the Ear, and the Reason of this Opinion amongst many of us Europeans seems to be, because we treat our Servants in this Manner, and other Inferiors plac'd under our Discipline. And hence 'tis a Custom in some places, when Persons are first allow'd the Use of Arms, or come out of their Apprenticeship, and the like, to give them a Box on the Ear, in formal Manner, to put them in mind of their former Condition, and to let them understand, that they are above such Treatment for the future. Therefore to offer such an Affront highly disgraces the Sufferer, and supposes him to be unworthy of bearing Arms, or of being reckon'd amongst free and grown Men. But here we must observe, that such a Blow never appears ignominious and disgraceful, but when it is given before the other Party prepares for Resistance: For thus Slaves and Children are beaten without the Liberty of Opposition. Therefore those who fall by mutual Consent to Fifty-Cuffs, and deal freely with each others Face and Head, can on neither side complain of an Injury of this affronting Nature. Nor is it easy to conceive how a Man that bears Arms, and is preparing to use them for his Defence, can be capable of receiving a Blow under the same Notion and Aggravation of Contempt. Beside, 'tis a great Mistake to fancy that a Man's Honour is really impair'd by such a Trifle; for² Honour would be a most fragile and a most precarious Good, if 'twere in the Power of every saucy Fellow to diminish and to infringe it. And as for the Contempt which is shewn in such an Action, this may be either quite taken off, or however easily repair'd by the Magistrate, by setting a heavy Fine on the Offender, and by enjoining him farther to perform in publick some Marks of Honour and Respect to the Persons whom he hath injur'd. Nor is the Vulgar Notion of any Weight, which fancies the Courage of Men, and especially of Soldiers, to be indamag'd in its Character, by the receiving these kinds of Affronts, and that therefore their Credit must be vindicated by Sword and Duel. For that Man shews sufficient Testimonies of his Courage, who bravely maintains and discharges the Office assign'd him by the State. And there are much more noble and more shining Occasions of exercising Valour, than, contrary to the Laws of Reason and of our Country, to pursue an immoderate Passion, or to engage in the Hazard of an unnecessary and unprofitable Combat. Yet if, as it commonly falls out, upon the offering of such an Injury, Swords are immediately drawn, and the Man who thus began the Fray happens to be kill'd, or desperately wounded, 'tis reasonable that the other Party should have his Penalty mitigated, upon account of the high Provocation. But 'tis an intolerable Paradox which some maintain, that a Man may fairly kill another, not only to avoid an Affront of this kind, but for the Recovery of his Honour, after the Affront has been actually given, and the Party who offer'd it is fled.

We may add to these Observations, that though the Rate and Estimation of Things is not to be determin'd by the Multitude, but by the Judgment of wise Men, yet if in any State the Receipt of some particular Injury is attended with extraordinary Scandal and Disgrace, there ought to be a most severe Punishment ordain'd against Delinquents in this Point; in as much as all Men have not Philosophy enough to put up those provoking Indignities; and because it would be inconsistent with the Characters and Stations which some Men are to maintain in the Commonwealth, should they be expos'd to the Contempt and Derision of the meanest Subjects. The Magistrate then hath little Reason to be angry, if he neglecting or refusing to give Redress in Complaints on this Score, a Man asserts his own Honour by what Means he can, though only in Regard to the Opinion of the Vulgar, since the same Opinion

^a 2 Sam. x. 4, &c.

¹ These Words of Grotius, as our Author expresses himself, ought to have been found in the same place with the foregoing and following, but I can't find them either in those Places, or in the Third Book, where Grotius treats expressly of the Disposition which Men ought to observe in War.

² See Lib. 8. Chap. 4. §. 8. following.

would otherwise load him with so much Reproach. Therefore those Governors who would effectually suppress all Duels and private Combats, ought to enact the most grievous Penalties against those who shall offer such a Blow or other Affront as is reckon'd ignominious in the Opinion of the particular Country. For the Course and Manner of Civil Life will not bear that refin'd Philosophy of Grotius; since Honour is no more than an Opinion of Excellence, and the Sufferer of such an Injury shows himself excellently patient, his Honour is rather increas'd than impair'd^a.

XIII. From what hath been said it may likewise be understood, whether in Cases of Assault, a Man is oblig'd, if he can conveniently, to betake himself to Flight, so as that the Slaughter of the Assailant is never justifiable under a Possibility of running from him? Now here 'tis plain, that in a State of Nature the Aggressor hath no Right, by which the other Party is bound to decline his Violence in this Matter, rather than oppose it. And the Reason why a Man (under this Natural Condition) sometimes chooses rather to fly than fight, is not out of any Favour to him who sets upon him, but because he thinks it most convenient for his own Affairs¹. Distinct Nations and Kingdoms are set, we know, in this natural State towards each other: And who will ever maintain, that when one King unjustly invades the Realm of another, the injur'd Prince is oblig'd to save himself, if possible, by flying; for fear he should kill some of his Enemies by making Resistance?

But under Civil Governments, we are to fly, if we can with Convenience, rather than take away the Assailant's Life. Nor can such a Flight be at all base or unworthy of a Man at Arms; in as much as it is not undertaken out of Cowardice or Neglect of Duty; and because Reason can never think this a fit Occasion of exerting my Valour, when I only kill a Fellow Subject without any Necessity, from whom the Magistrate could have sufficiently secur'd me. We added this Restriction, if we can with Convenience, because (as hath been already hinted in part) we are not always oblig'd to retreat and to turn our Backs, since we thus expose ourselves to a greater Danger of Wounds and Mischiefs, as well as to the additional one of falling; and since a Man who hath once betaken himself to his Heels, if he meet with a Stop, or if the Aggressor happen to overtake him, cannot easily recover himself into a Posture of Defence. Therefore in case there be not a Place of safe Refuge near at hand, he doth not transgress the Bounds of innocent Self-defence, §. XIV. ¹ Mr. Fortescue Professor of Divinity at Tubing, undertakes to defend St. Ambrose, and some other Fathers, who maintain'd, that Christian Charity would not allow a Man to slay an unjust Aggressor, and that he ought to suffer himself to be slain. But if we examine the Words of this Divine, Dissert. 1. in Offic. Ambrosii, we shall find, that after he has discoursed long, he does not touch upon the Reasons of our Author. I find only one thing reasonable, which I have observed above, §. 2. Note 5. viz. That in following the Principles of Mr. Pufendorf, he asserts, That he that slays his unjust Aggressor, ought to have more than a simple Permission.

who opposes an Assailant Breast to Breast, rather than he will lay himself open to his Violence, by running off on a Disadvantage.

Lastly, Grotius hath done well to censure those Authors, who allow that we may lawfully kill a Man who hath said any such Thing of us, as we think will injure our Repute and Character with good Men. For, if the Man hath spoken false, have we not many more convenient ways of wiping off the Calumny? And if he hath said nothing but Truth, must we study the Concealment of one Sin by the Commission of another? How much better is *Plato's Law*², If a Man kill a Slave who hath not injur'd him, only out of Fear he should discover some base Action, or on the like account; he shall undergo the same Penalty as if he had murder'd a free Subject or Citizen?

XIV. All this seems plainly enough deducible from Reason. But many raise a Scruple about these Doctrines, in regard to the peculiar Temper and Genius of Christianity, asserting that although it be indeed lawful to kill a Man who unjustly attempts our Life, yet 'tis an Action³ more praise-worthy to lose our own Life in such a Case, than to take his. Because he thus dying in the Commission of a Mortal Sin, incurs the Danger of Damnation: And that it is not consistent with Justice to rid our selves of a less Evil, by bringing a greater on another Man. Now, tho' the Solution of this Difficulty doth not properly fall under our Business; yet we think the Maintainers of this high Notion would do well to consider, that in the Consternation of Danger, and in the Heat of Fighting, a Man hath little Leisure for a nice Reflection on such Reasons; in as much as all his Thoughts and Faculties are taken up with consulting how to save himself from present Death. Again, the Person who is thus assaulted, is not always so well prepar'd, as not to need some farther Time for composing his Mind and Conscience, and for making up his Bundles, before he takes his long Journey, as *Varro*² speaks. Besides, it doth not appear very probable, that I ought in this Case to be more solicitous for the Soul of the other Man, than he himself is. And therefore if he, neglecting this great Concern, invade my Life, ought I to pay so precious and irrecoverable a Ransom, for rescuing him from the Danger of incurring so sad a State³? For it is very doubtful whether, if I should now spare him, to my own Ruin, he will not, for all my Charity, still deserve, and still meet with the same terrible Sentence. 'Tis a Maxim vulgarly known, that no Regard is to be had to such a

Danger as a Man throws himself into by his own Default, and from which he may deliver himself if he pleases. Now in the Case before us, provided he draw off or forbear to treat me in this injurious Manner, the Danger to which he exposes his Soul, ceases as to the present Matter. And doth not this Opinion allow greater Favour and Indulgence to Wickedness, than to Goodness, whilst it makes the former, as it were, sacred and inviolable? For according to such Rules, the most holy and virtuous Men would be always oblig'd to yield their Throats to Villains and Murderers, lest, by resisting, they should send them immediately on their Road to Hell^a. That saying of our Saviour, in which he commands us to love our Neighbour as our selves, Matt. xxii. 39. seems not so fitly to be interpreted of the degree of Love, as of the Truth and Sincerity; in as much as no Man dissembles or counterfeits a Passion towards himself. And that Phrase, As thy self, looks like a proverbial Speech, importing a sincere and hearty Kindness^b. But should we take the Expression in the highest Sense^c, it would scarce follow, that supposing the Love of our selves and of our Neighbour not capable (in some Instance) of being answer'd both together, the former ought to yield to the latter^d. Nor are the Proofs which we find sometimes alledg'd from Exodus xxiii. 4, 5. and Deuteronomy xxii. 4. sufficient to evince, that the Love of our Neighbour ought to take place before our own real Advantage: For it cannot thence be gather'd, that we are first to help our Neighbour's Beast out of the Ditch, if our own be in the same Condition; or that we are oblig'd to give such an Assistance, when the Business we must neglect for that good Office is of more Consequence, than the Thing we thus endeavour to save or rescue for another. And besides all this, it may very fairly be question'd, whether a Person who assaults us in a violent manner, ought to keep the Title of a Neighbour, as the Word seems to be meant in our Saviour's Command^e.

Lactantius^a hath censur'd Tully^b for describing a Good Man to be one that doth good to as many as possible, and that hurts no Body, unless provok'd. O what a most excellent and most true Sentence (says^c the Father) hath he spoil'd by the Addition of two Words! For what occasion had he to say, unless provok'd? If a good Man may thus hurt another when provok'd, the very offering that Hurt will make him lose his Character and Name: It not being less Evil to return an Injury, than at first to give it. For whence arise all the Contentions and the Combats which we behold amongst Men, unless from this Miscarriage, that Impatience opposing Wickedness, occasions so many Tempests in the World? Whereas, if in opposing the same Wickedness we should make use of Patience, than which there is no truer Virtue, and none more worthy of human Nature, we should as effectually extinguish the ill Design, as if we were pouring Water upon Fire. But indeed, as the Impatience of the injur'd Party is frequently the occasion of unnecessary Combats, which might with Convenience have been avoided; so, on the other hand, Patience is not always infallible in the Cure of Malice and Villany. Nor doth the Virtue which, under that Name, is so highly recommended to Christians, equally oblige us to the putting up^d all Injuries promiscuously, without Difference

⁴ If as often as a Man finds himself in the same Danger as another, he ought indispensibly to resolve to perish to save him, he is obliged to love his Neighbour better than himself. Moreover, this Command of CHRIST is a general Maxim, which can't be of use to determine a particular Case, and invested with the Circumstances of all Particulars, such as this, when a Man finds he can't at the same time satisfy the Love of himself and Neighbour; for, all things else being equal, the Love of a Man's Self ought to be preferred, as appears by St. Paul's Words, 2 Cor. viii. 13. The Determination of that Case, in which there is an Opposition between the Love of a Man's Self and Sociableness, depends upon other Principles, from which it may be inferred, That as there are some Cases in which the Love of a Man's Self is to be preferred before every other Thing, so there are other Cases, when the Preservation of another may be preferred before his own. This is taken out of the Apology of our Author, which is in the Eris Scandinica, §. 32.

Perturbatio vitæ, si ita sit, atque officiorum omnium, consequatur, i. e.* "Thus much indeed is brave, and right, and true, that we should love those who ought to be most dear to us, as well as our selves. But to love them better, is absurd and impossible. 'Twould be ridiculous for me to wish, that my Friend and I should each of us prefer the other's Person and Interest to his own; because such a change of Hearts could not but be follow'd with a Confusion of all Offices of Life." Cicero Tus. Quæst. l. 3. c. 29.

⁶ Tully's Words are, Eum virum bonum esse, qui profit quibus possit, nocet nemini, nisi laceffitus injuriâ. Our Author might here have oppos'd to this Censure of Lactantius other Words of Cicero, which will shew, that that Orator believed, that a good Man ought to spare his greatest Enemies, when he can do it without Danger to his own Life. Jugulare civem, nè jure quidem quisquam bonus vult. Mavult enim commemorare se, cum possit perdere, pepereisse, quam cum parere potuerit, perdidisse. Hæc in homines alienissimos, denique inimicissimos, viri boni faciunt, & hominum existimationis & communis humanitatis causa: ut cum ipsi nihil alteri scientes incommodarint, nihil ipsis jure incommodi cadere possit, Orat. pro Quintio, c. 16.

⁷ Lactantius's Words are, O quam simplicem, veramque sententiam duorum verborum adjectione corrupit! Quid enim opus fuerat adjungere, Nisi laceffitus injuriâ? — Nociturum esse dixit bonum virum, si fuerit laceffitus; jam ex hoc ipso viri boni nomen amittat, necesse est, si nocerit. Non minus enim mali est, referre injuriam, quam inferre. Nam urde certamina inter homines, unde pugnae, contentionesque nascuntur, nisi quod improbitati opposita impatientia, magnas sæpe concitat tempestates? Quod si patientiam, quâ virtute nihil verius nihil homine dignius inveniri potest, improbitati opposueris, extinguetur protinus, tanquam igni aquam supersuderis.

⁸ This may be infer'd from the Words of CHRIST, Matth. v. 39, 40. in which Patience is most earnestly recommended. For that divine Teacher says not, If any one will slay, wound, or smite you mortally, bear it patiently, but, If any one smite you on the right Cheek, turn to him the other also, for a Blow on the Cheek is a small Injury in it self, and easy to be born. Moreover, in these Words there is a Proverbial Expression, which imports thus much, That rather than revenge our selves of them that have done us any personal Wrong, we should suffer our selves to receive some new Injuries. Nor doth JESUS CHRIST say, If any Man will take away all your Goods, or the greatest part of them, do not resist the Spoiler, nor oppose his Injustice, neither by your own Act and Deed, nor by seeking Protection from the Magistrate; but, If any Man sue you at the Law, and take away thy Coat, let him take thy Cloak also, i. e. rather than engage thy self in a Law-suit for so small a Matter, be ready to undergo a fresh Loss. See Grotius, and Mr. Le Clerc on this Place. The Heathens also acknowledge, that we ought sometimes, though not always, to depart from something of our Right. See Cicero De Offic. Lib. 2. Chap. 18.

and Distinction. He that defends himself in a lawful manner, doth not act directly for the Hurt of another, but for his own Preservation: And he who repels a Wrong is not injurious, but he who offers it. 'Tis one thing to exercise an unblameable Defence, and another thing to prosecute an unmerciful Revenge. The latter may be as great a Sin as the first offer of an Injury, but the former can never fall under so hard a Censure.

But farther, those who maintain that in Cases of this Nature it is more commendable to be kill'd than to kill, add this Exception, Unless the Party assailed be a more useful Person than the Assailant. As if it were always possible for me, under the Apprehension of so imminent Danger, to weigh my Abilities nicely with those of the other Man, and to determine, whether the World would have more occasion for his Service than for mine! This is beyond Dispute, that he on whom the Safety of many depends, and whose Office or Duty it is to keep off Violence from others, ought not to resign his own Life for the sparing an unjust Invader; tho' he should be of so mild a Disposition as with Piso in Tacitus ⁹, to think it as great a Misery to kill another, as to die himself. And the Reason is evident, because by throwing himself away, he betray'd the Safety of so many other Persons. This is the Case of those who accompany Travellers by way of Guards; as likewise of Princes, of Generals, and other Commanders, whose Deaths are usually attended with so wide a Ruin, and to whom we may apply that Saying of Lucan, v. 685.

*Cum tot in hac anima populorum vita salusque
Pendeat, & tantus caput hoc sibi fecerit orbis, Sævitia est voluisse mori.*————

Since one dear Life ensures and guards us all,
And with the World's great Head, the World must fall,

'Twere Cruelty to court your Fate ².

² And that of Alexander's Friends in Quintus Curtius, L. 9. c. 6. What God can secure to us a long Enjoyment of this Light, this Bulwark of Macedon; when you so often, with a kind of Greediness, expose your Person to certain Danger; not reflecting how many Thousands of Lives you hazard in one?

⁹ Tacitus's Words are, Si nobis aut perire hodie necesse est, aut quod æquè apud bonos miserum est, occidere. Hist. Lib. I. Chap. 29.

¹⁰ De LL. Lib. 6. Οὐδ' ἀμυνόμενον θάνατον, μέλλοιεν ἄπο τῶν γονέων τελευτᾶσαι, παρέξει νόμος ἔδεις κτείνει ἢ πατέρα, ἢ μητέρα, τοῦ εἰς φῶς τῆς ἐκείνου οὐσίαν ἀγαθόντας, ἀλλ' ἄπομεινάντα τὰ πάντα πύργον, πρὶν τι δεῖν τοῦτον. Ἀδελφός ἢ ἀν' ἀδελφὸν κτείνει, ἐν πάσει μάχῃ γενόμενος, ἢ πρὸς πῶ τούτου ἀμυνόμενος ἀρχοῦσα χερσὶν πέτερον, καὶ ἄπειρ πολέμιον ὑποκτείνει, ἔσω καὶ πατρίδα. Ἐὰν ἢ αὐτὸν δ' ἄλλο ἐλεύθερον ἀμυνόμενος ὑποκτείνῃ καὶ ἑαυτὸν ὀκτείνῃ πατέρα, πῶς αὐτῷ ἔνοχος ἔσω νόμος.

To treat of this Question more exactly, I observe, That in Truth the Laws may by reason of some Inconveniences, punish all Children, who shall slay their Father or Mother, though in Defence of their own Persons; because we may suppose the Case so very rare, that it would be to no Purpose to make such an Exception, which might be an Occasion of suffering a real Parricide to go unpunished. But if the Thing be considered as it is in itself, without any relation to Civil Tribunals, we must, in my Judgment, thus think of it: 1. If a Father be hurried by his Passions, which he can't master, to kill his Son, and knows not what he is doing, as I have spoken, in the Case of one attacked by his Sovereign, Note 1. of §. 5. so I say here, that he ought to suffer himself to be slain, rather than imbrue his Hands in his Father's Blood. 2. But if we have reason to fear, that a Father is inclined with some Knowledge and Deliberation to put us in Danger of our Life, we ought to avoid the least Occasions to provoke him, and abstain from doing many of those Things which we have Right to do, if we were concerned with any other. 3. But if, after we have done all on our Part, we see ourselves infallibly in danger to lose our Life by the Hand of him, who, above all Men, is bound to preserve it, though in this Case we may, if we will, suffer our selves to be slain, out of Excess of Love and Kindness, and in Regard to him from whom we have derived our Being, yet I do not believe him guilty of Murder and Parricide, if, in defending himself, he slays the Aggressor. The Right of defending our selves is prior to any Obligation we have to another; and a Father, if he so far forgets himself, as to fall into such an extravagant Passion against his own Son, deserves not to be looked upon as a Father.

§. XV. ¹ Of which see Lib. 20, 22, 24. 32. D. ad L. Jul. de Adulter. and Lyfias Orat. 1. pro cæde Eratibhen. where he shews, that by the Attick Constitutions it was allowable to kill, if catch'd in the Fact, the Abuser, not only of a Wife, but of a Concubine; and as Demosthenes extends it, of a Mother, a Sister, or a Daughter. And the Reason he gives is this; Because whatever Persons we fight for against our Enemies, to rescue them from Injury or Affront, for the sake of the same Persons the Law permits

But it cannot be hence inferr'd, that supposing a Man to have the Lives of none, or of very few depending on him, such an one may not fairly kill an Assailant, who is perhaps of more Service to the Publick, or in whose Life the Interest of more Persons are concern'd. For at this rate, a Man who is either unmarried, or without Children, must in no Case kill an Invader, who hath a Family, for fear his Wife and Children should be left Desolate and in Want. But if the Affection and Concern for these Relations could not hinder the injurious Party from attempting his Villany, what Reason hath the other Person to give his own Life for the Prevention of their Misfortune and Trouble?

Plato ¹⁰ in his System of Laws hath been very nice and exact on this Point: If the Life of a Son, says he, be attempted by his Parents, did ever any Law allow him in such a Case to kill those who gave him Being, although in his own Defence? So far from this, that he is obliged and commanded to suffer all Extremities, rather than to engage in so unnatural a Deed. But if upon account of Tumult, or Sedition, or the like occasion, a Brother kills his Brother, to preserve himself from his Violence and Assault, he shall be equally guiltless as if he had slaughter'd an Enemy. As for the Additional Clause, If a Slave in his own Defence kill a free Man, he shall be obnoxious to the same Penalties as a Parricide, this was not the Fault of the Lawgiver, but of the Age.

XV. From what hath been observ'd on this Head, it appears, that a Slaughter committed within the just Bounds of Self-defence, doth not taint the Author with any real Blemish or Guilt, and consequently doth not render him obnoxious to any Punishment: and that it is not to be rank'd amongst those Actions, which, tho' they are in themselves sinful, yet human Laws favour with Impunity, upon account of the violent and almost unavoidable Transports of Passion: As when they allow the Husband to kill the Adulterer ¹. If therefore in any Places some Penalty nalty or Expiation hath been enjoin'd the Actors of just Slaughter, it either belong'd not to the Case of innocent Defence, or it was introduc'd without any true Ground or Reason; or, lastly, it might be apply'd for the making Men understand how heinous a Crime it was to kill unjustly, when the killing even upon a just Account, stood in need of some Satisfaction. ² Pbilo the Jew, in his Life of Moses, Lib. i. tells us, He commanded the Priest to perform a solemn Purgation, on those who return'd fresh from the Slaughter of their Enemies; because tho' the Laws did by no means forbid such Attempts, yet he who kills a Man, tho' by Compulsion, and in repelling an Injury, seems to contract some Stain, upon account of the near Relation which Mankind bear to one another, being all deriv'd originally from the same Head. And this therefore was the reason of the Ceremony to take off the very Appearance and Shadow of Guilt. As for the Benefit of the Asylums or Places of Refuge and Sanctuary, a Man who preserv'd his own Life by the Death of an Assailant, seems to have had no occasion for these Reliefs; but only he who had been the Author of another's Death by an involuntary Stroke, yet such as upon exact Care and Diligence he might have forborn and avoided. That Place in the First of the Chronicles, Chap. xxix. ver. 3. doth not belong to the Case of Self-defence; and * the Building of a Temple seems to have been forbidden David, not so much because he had gather'd any Pollution by his Slaughters in War, as because he who had acquir'd sufficient Honour to himself by martial Achievements, ought not to have robb'd his Son of such an Occasion of growing glorious by the Works of Peace. The Scholiast on the Orestes of Euripides informs us, that 'twas an antient Custom amongst the Grecians, for those who kill'd any one upon a just Reason, immediately to shew their Weapons to the Sun for a Token of their Innocence; as desiring him to be Witness of the Fact, who, in their Opinion, overlook'd and overheard all things. And besides this Formality, they apply'd some Means of Expiation, and were oblig'd to undergo one Year's Banishment: Which Banishment is likewise mention'd by Plato de LL. l. ix. Vid. l. xvi. f. 8. D. de Paenis, & Grot. in flor. Sparf. ad loc. And we learn farther from Demosthenes, and from the Scholiast on Aristophanes, that at Athens when a Man had kill'd another, and pleaded to have done it justly, the Cause was try'd in a peculiar Court, call'd the Delphinian, with Allusion to the Oracle of Apollo at Delphi. Amongst the Ethiopians, whoever had slain a Man involuntarily, quitted his Country till such time as the Gymnosophists had purg'd him by their Ceremonies³. And we find Aeneas in Virgil declaring in reference to the holy Reliques,

*Mc bello è tanto digressum & cæde recenti
Attrectare nefas; donec me flumine vivo Ablucro.*

In me 'tis impious holy Things to bear,
Red as I am with Slaughter, new from War:
Till in some living Stream I cleanse the Guilt.

Mr. Dryden.

In the 18th Canon of the Council of Nantes, held under Pope Formosus, we have this nice Injunction; If a Man by accident, and unwillingly, hath been Author of another's Death, let him repent forty Days with Bread and Water; when this Course is over, let him for two Years be separated from the Congregation of the Faithful, and let him neither communicate nor offer. After the space of two Years, let him offer with the Congregation, but not communicate. At the end of the five Years let him be receiv'd to full Communion, but let his Abstinence from Meats continue at the Discretion of the Priest. Yet neither doth this Canon touch the Case of Defence, nor can it well be vindicated from too much Rigor. Thus too what we meet with in the Laws of the Lombards^b, seems not capable of being extended to the Business in hand, or if it be, may deservedly fall under the Censure of unreasonable Severity. De Mornay^c tells us, that 'tis religiously observ'd by the Judges in France, scarce ever to absolve Persons in Causes of this Nature, without enjoining them at the same time to bestow peculiar Largesses upon the Poor, and sometimes to be at the Charge of Christian Sacrifices, or Propitiations for the Soul of the Party kill'd. And tho' the latter Part of this Custom smells too much of Superstition; yet every good Man hath reason to be deeply afflicted and concern'd, when he is put under the Necessity of depriving another of Life, by any such unfortunate Means.

XVI. Indeed, the Defence of Life, of Limbs, and of Chastity, as of irreparable Goods, admits so large a Degree of Favour, as to stand exempted from one of the positive Divine Laws, and to be construed as no Breach of the Sabbath. Viac 1 Maccab. i. 32, &c. Joseph. Antiq. L. xii. c. 8. For those who maintain'd the contrary Opinion, are not without Reason scouted by Plutarch and mits us to kill even Friends, if they offer them any unjust Violence. For since Enemies and Friends are to be judg'd and distinguish'd by their Actions, those that practise Hostility, we may prosecute in an hostile manner. Amongst the Persians, he that kills the Adulterer and the Adulteress at the same time, is presented with a new Garment as a Reward of his Service to the State. Add, Olear. Itin. Persic. L. 5. c. 22. Val. Max. L. 9. c. 1. f. 13. Ant. Matthæ. de Crimin. ad L. 48. D. tit. 3. c. 3. f. 13, &c.

^c Ad. Leg. 3. D. de Just. & Jure, in which there appears but little Superstition.

² Porphyry, as Mr. Hertius observes, speaks very well, That the Reason why Lawgivers command, that Murthers committed without any Design, and upon Necessity, should not be wholly exempted from Punishment, is, for fear it should be a Pretence to any to attempt it on set Purpose. Ἐπι κ' τὸν ἀκούσαν φόνον ἐκ ἕω πεισῆς συνέλας καλέσσαν οἱ νόμοθέται, ὅπως ὑπερβαῖν ἐνδὸν πέλοσιν τῆς ἐκείνης τὰ τῶν ἀκρίως δεινῶν ἔργα μισῶσαι περιουσιώδεις. De Abstinēt. Lib. 1.

³ The Historical Remarks made here by the Author had better have been placed under a Note. See Numb. xxxv. 10, &c. Deut. xix. 1, &c.

* See Mr. Le Clerc upon that Place, who gives another Reason more apparent.

§. XVI. ¹ I may add, That as Mr. Le Clerc observes, Jesus Christ alludes to this Opinion of the Jews, when he says to them who were offended because he did Cures upon the Sabbath-Day, Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath-Day, or to do evil, to save Life or to destroy it? Mark iii. 4.

Agatharchides, as Josephus observes in his Antiquities^a. And therefore 'tis strange that the same Author, in his first Book against Appion, should celebrate, as worthy of all Commendation, that Act of the Jews which we read of in the History of the Maccabees, whilst refusing to make Resistance on the Sabbath-Day, they prefer'd this Command of GOD to their own Lives, and to the Liberty of their Country: Unless he is to be understood as rather praising the good Intention than the Deed itself.

But in reference to the Defence of Things or Goods, which as they may be restor'd or compensated, so they seem not all of them absolutely necessary to Man's Happiness, it will bear a Dispute whether these may be preserv'd and secur'd by the Use of Extremities. Especially since many are very ready to approve of what Taxilles said to Alexander in Plutarch, What occasion is there, Alexander, that you and I must needs quarrel and fight; since you neither came to rob us of our Water nor of our Food, which are the only two Things that Men in their Wits think worth contending for?

Euripid. Supplic. ver. 775.

Τὸ πρῶτον μόνον ἔστιν, &c.

For, Life alone's th' irreparable Loss;
Breaches of Fortune have an easy Cure.

The Judgment and the Custom of all Nations is manifest in this Point, whilst they allow Men to fight for their Goods and Possessions, even to the Slaughter of those who wrongfully invade them. It is plain likewise, that most War is engag'd in, not for the sake of destroying Mens Lives, but of winning their Lands or their Wealth. And it would be reckon'd a very pleasant Humour in an Enemy, if to hinder himself from being oppos'd by violent Means, he should make Protestation that he came not to kill but to rob. Thus much therefore is certain, that he who is kill'd in the Attempt of plundering or of wasting another Man's Goods, hath no Injury done him: Tho', in other respects, those Goods do not bear an equal Proportion to the Life of a Man. For in a natural State, he who offers any kind of Injury with a malicious Intent, immediately becomes an Enemy; and then he can have no Right inherent in himself to forbid the Use of the utmost Extremities against him. And since another hath no more Right to invade my Possessions than to assault my Life, I have certainly an equal License and Power to defend them both. Besides, since Life cannot be preserv'd without a Competency of Goods, he that goes about to rob me of these, doth, by consequence, endeavour to deprive me of that. And indeed, it is clearly evident, that the Security and Peace of Society, and of Mankind, could very hardly subsist, if a Liberty were not granted to repel by the most violent Course, those who come to pillage our Goods, for which Men have commonly a very hearty Love and Concern.

Those who have tormented themselves in maintaining the more rigid Side of the Question, build chiefly on two Suppositions; first, That a just Punishment ought always to be so equal to the Crime, that the guilty Person be not depriv'd of a greater Good than what he attempted to hurt or to destroy in another². The Falseness of which we shall elsewhere make out. Secondly, That the Hurts which we offer to an unjust Invader, in defence of ourselves and our Possessions, are Punishments in a proper Sense, and consequently ought to be stated by the Rules of vindicative Justice. But this Hypothesis is no truer than the former. For all Punishment proceeds from a Superior against a Subject, by virtue of his Sovereign Right; and the Degree of it is measur'd with respect to the publick Good. But Defence is a Thing of more antient Date than any civil Command, and chiefly takes place amongst those, neither of whom are subject to the other; and is moderated with regard to our own Safety, and to the Necessity of Self-preservation. Indeed amongst those who live under the same civil Government, the Liberty of natural Defence is very much restrain'd. Because the inward Tranquillity of a State could not subsist, if the Subjects were to return Hostilities to each other for every Injury or Affront. The Members then of a Community may so far only make use of violent Defence, as it is not taken off or forbidden by the Genius of civil Society, or by the Laws of the State. And the Laws of most Places, tho' they allow one Subject to repel another who invades him, by offering a greater Evil, than the Invader design'd against him³; yet according to the regular Course of Proceeding, they would not have private Persons apply Extremities, in opposing such Injuries as are levell'd only against Things that may be restor'd or repair'd. Inasmuch as such Reparation or Restitution may easily be procur'd by the help of Government; whereas when there is no Government to interpose, Men cannot be forc'd to make Requitals, but by War. There is no need then of being so solicitous with Grotius^b to make up the Inequality between the Thing invaded and the Life of the Invader, by our Favour to the Defendant, and our Hatred and Rigor against the guilty Party. Unless we join with Baclar in his Explanation of the Place, and say no more than this, that since in a Cause or Action of this kind it is generally very difficult to determine what was done within, and what beyond the due Bounds, it is not repugnant to Nature that we turn our Favour on the side of the Person who suffer'd, or was likely to suffer the Damage, and our Hatred upon the Plunderer or Thief; that is, when the Case is doubtful, we may fairly pardon in the former the Death of the latter. In civil States therefore it is sufficient, that a Man do not exceed the Limits of Defence appointed by the Laws of his Country. And yet if he should transgress these Measures he doth no Injury to the Invader, but only is guilty of a Breach of Civil Law. But it may be ask'd farther, whether it is not at least a Sin against Charity to kill one who comes to plunder us of a repairable Good? In answer to which, it is our Judgment, that Charity towards one who professes Hostility against us, takes place only so long as we have probable Hopes of bringing him, by this means, to Repentance and to Peace. But when these Hopes appear fruitless, he that spares his Enemy betrays himself. Or if at any time my Reason persuades me, that a Thing of little and despicable Value is not to be defended with the same Eagerness and Violence, I forbear, in this Case, not for the sake of the Robber or Invader, but partly because I would not give myself so much Trouble about a Matter of so slight Concern, and partly because I would not seem narrow-spirited and covetous, by resenting to so desperate a height so inconsiderable a Damage.

³ Such was the Athenian Law mention'd by Demosthenes (advers. Aristocrat.) ordaining, That he who kill'd another in defence of Goods, which this other Person was taking or carrying off by Violence, should not be chargeable with any Guilt. The Greek is, Καὶ εὖν φέροντα, ἢ ἄροντα εἰς ἀδικίαν, εὐθὺς ἀμυνόμενοι κτείνει, νηπινοὶ πηδᾶναι κελύσει.

XVII. It may be proper for us, on the present Occasion, to reflect on that most noble Law giving License to kill a Night Robber, but not one that comes in the Day-time¹; which we read in Exod. xxii. 2. and which hath been so often imitated in the Grecian and the Roman Constitution. Thus the Law of Solon recited by Demosthenes (contra Timocrat.)² If any one, in the Day-time, steal above fifty Drachmæ, all Persons are empower'd to bring him before the Court of the Eleven. But if he steal in the Night, whatever the Value be, it shall be allowable either to bring him before the Judges, or to pursue, and wound, or kill him. For which Ulpian the Rhetorician gives this Reason, * In the Day we may call for Assistance, which in the Night cannot so well be had. So Plato de LL. l. ix. He that kills a Thief entering his House in the Night shall be blameless. The same we find in the Roman Twelve Tables. Tho' as to this, Caius (L. iv. f. i. D. ad L. Aquil.) affirms, That the Roman Law doth indeed permit a Man to kill the Night Thief; but then it obligeth him to give notice of it by crying out. The latter Part of which Assertion, Jac. Gothofredus (ad LL. vi. Tali) observes to be a Specimen of Tribonian's mild Disposition, inasmuch as that there was no Clause originally in the Twelve Tables, appears from Cicero Orat. pro Milon. The Twelve Tables, says Cicero, allow the killing of the Night Thief by any means possible; but the Day Thief only if he defend himself with his Weapon. M. Senec. l. x. Controv. ult. The Law which permits the killing of the Night Thief any way possible, doth not speak of him as condemn'd, but as surpris'd in the Fact. A. Gell. l. xi. c. ult. when he reports that Draco made Theft capital, and Solon only double Restitution; adds, that the Roman Decemviri took the middle way between the Severity of the former, and the Mildness of the latter; then only permitting a Thief, taken in the Act, to be kill'd, if either the Thing happen'd in the Night, or if being in the Day-time, he defended himself with his Arms against the Discoverer. As for the Sign of Crying out, the Twelve Tables requir'd it only in the Case of the Day Thief when he fought in his own Defence. Si luci furtum faxint, si se telo defensint, quiritato, endoque plorato: Post deinde si cæsi esint, se fraude esto. Comp. l. iii. S. D. ad L. Aquil. where the Term Æque is mollified by Tribonian. Yet it is not improbable, that in course of Time, and upon the Authority of wise Men, that antient Law was plainly mitigated, as Cujacius allows, L. xiv. Observ. 15. This appears from Ulpian, L. v. ad Edict. whose Words are fully recited in the comparison of the Jewish and Roman Laws, first publish'd by Peter Pitheus. Which are main'd, as we have them in L. v. D. ad L. Aquil. (Add. L. ix. D. ad L. Cornel. de Sicar.) The reason of which Alteration perhaps might be, that it was a Practice sometimes with Villains to rush out of their Houses and murder Persons, and then pretend that they found them in the Act of Thievery: As likewise, because Houses which are strongly built, and stand thick together, cannot easily be robb'd without the Master's Negligence; or at least cannot afford Rogues so frequent Opportunities. Compare Justin, L. ii. c. 2. s. 9. Whence Cujacius conjectures, that the said Law as by L. i. C. quando hic unicuique, was abrogated in Towns and Cities, and only allow'd to hold good in the Country. Tho' indeed this Order which he cites, doth not speak of Thieves who make their Attempts in Privacy and Silence, but of violent Robbers and open Assailants; as appears from the Reason subjoin'd, That they may meet the Death which they threaten'd, and incur that which they design'd against others. Sextus Cæcilius in Gell. L. xx. c. 1. explains this Law of the Twelve Tables falsely, when he makes it relate to the insidious Violence of nightly Murderers³. Now the Reason of such Distinction we take to be this, that in the Day we may easily seize the Thief and recover our Goods; whereas in the Night he may slip from the House undiscover'd; it being difficult to know him in the dark; or if one Person should chance to have a Knowledge of him, yet this would not convict him, unless, which cannot be done without great Trouble, more Witnesses are call'd out of their Beds. But in this Opinion there is one Thing which startles most Men, and puts them to some Loss and Difficulty; for they are apt to argue thus: Since the Laws which make this Allowance do not decree a capital Punishment against Robbers, it looks like an Absurdity, that private Persons should be indulg'd with a License of proceeding farther in these Cases, than

¹ The Words are, If a Thief be found breaking up [an House] and be smitten that he die, there shall no Blood be shed for him. But if the Sun be risen upon him, there shall be Blood shed for him, for he should make full Restitution; if he hath nothing, then he shall be sold for his Theft, [to make Satisfaction.]

² The Greek of Demosthenes is, 'Εἰ ὅ τις νύκτωρ ὄπῳ κλέψῃσι, τῶπυ ἐξείναι, καὶ ἀποκτείναι, καὶ πρῶσαι δώκουτα. * Ulpian's Greek is, 'Εν νύκτῃ μετίζονα πῖν πτωχείαν ἐδέειξεν, ἐπιδιδόντες μείζον ὅτι τὸ ἐγκλημα τῆ νυκτὸς, ἐν τῷ ἡμέρᾳ δύναιται πῖς καὶ βοηθὸς καλέσαι ἑαυτῶ, ἐν ὅ νυκτῇ, ὁ κλέπ.

Plato's Words are, Νύκτωρ ὄπῳ εἰς δικίαν εἰσιόντα ἐπὶ κλοπῆ χρημάτων, ἐὰν ἐλθὼν κτείνῃ τῆς, καθ' αὐτῆς ἕσται.

³ Mr. Noodt has shew'd in §. 1. of Law IV. ad Leg. Aquil. that there was no Addition of Tribonian's, nor any thing contrary to the Law of the Twelve Tables. He treats there of Restitution, not Punishment. The Cornelian Law, as well as that of the Twelve Tables, allows an absolute Impunity to them who slew a Thief in the Night, whether they cry'd out or no, whether they might have avoided killing of him or no; but the Aquilian Law did not exempt them from paying Damages and Fines, unless when there was an absolute Necessity of slaying the Aggressor to save their own Lives. Observat. Lib. 1 Chap. 15. and his Probabil. Juris Lib. 1. Chap. 9. as also ad Leg. Aquil. Chap. 5.

the Sovereign Power thinks proper for itself to do. In answer to which it may be observ'd, that all those Laws concerning the Punishment of Thieves, do suppose the Things stolen to be restor'd or compensated, upon the Apprehension of the Felon. And in order to this they judg'd the giving of two-fold, or sometimes of four-fold to be sufficient; according to the different Custom of particular Commonwealths. But it doth not hence follow, that therefore the same Laws, in Cases where Reparation was not to be had, could not furnish the Subject with some larger Power taken out of the Stock of natural Liberty. For the Lawgivers of Kingdoms and Republicks have not always thought it necessary, in ordaining Penalties for Offences, to take their Standard from what in a State of Nature the Right of War allow'd to be done. Thus there are some States in the World where Adultery is not a capital Crime; and yet the Husbands are indemnified if they kill the Adulterers upon surprising them in the Act. Now supposing Men to be plac'd in a natural Liberty, the Performance, or the very Offer of an Injury to their Bed, is plainly a sufficient Cause of War, and how far the License of War extends every one is sensible. And yet these Laws would not stretch the Punishment of Adultery when once actually committed, to such Violence as might be allowable in a War undertaken upon that Score. But for their Indulgence to private Persons of farther and severer Methods, we may borrow this very good Reason from Dr. Cumberland^a; that inasmuch as Offences of this kind escaping the Cognizance of the Civil Magistrate, do frequently pass unpunish'd, therefore whenever their Circumstances make them capable of receiving Punishment, it hath been thought proper to allow the most rigorous and extreme; that the Boldness of wicked Men, as much as it increases by common Impunity, so much it may be lessen'd and kept under by the Fear of meeting sometimes with so grievous and so terrible a return. That Clause in the Roman Law giving Authority to kill a Day Thief, *Si telo se defenderit, If he defends himself*⁴ with his Weapon, plainly intimates, that I am hereby permitted to kill him, tho' barely for the Preservation of my Goods, and not then only when he first assaults me with his Weapon, but when upon my endeavouring to recover my Things from him, he employs it against me for his own Security.

XVIII. And therefore it is clear, that they are in the wrong who make the Reason of the fore-said Law to be only this, Left if the Robber escap'd in the Night the Crime should pass unpunish'd. As to Grotius's^b Discussion of this Point, there are many Things in it to which we cannot subscribe. He makes the Laws we have been speaking of to be founded on this Bottom, that the Legislators hereby intimated, that no Man ought to be kill'd directly for the sake of our Goods. Which is more than we can discover in those Laws which treat of such Thieves as creep into Houses with design to carry Things privily away. 'Tis true in the Case of the nightly Thief, it may happen that whilst I endeavour to save my Goods, my Life too may be in danger: And then the Slaughter of the Thief is permitted me upon a double Account. Nor here will it be an Objection against my Innocence, that I seem to throw myself into this Danger, by attempting to retain or to recover my Matters. For I am then engag'd in a lawful and almost a necessary Act; from which no Effect that arises without my Fault, can be imputed to me. But were it not lawful to kill another purely on the Account of Goods, how can we utterly clear him from all Guilt, who for the Preservation of those Concerns casts himself deliberately into such a Condition as makes it necessary for him either to kill, or to be kill'd? As we do not allow him the Plea of Self-defence, who kills a Man in a Duel voluntarily undertaken.

The other Reason which Grotius assigns for the Hebrew Law seems not of sufficient Strength and Solidity. Inasmuch (says he) as by Night Witnesses of the Fact are difficult to be procur'd, therefore more easy Credit is given to him who shall affirm that he kill'd the Thief in defence of his own Life; as having found him with an Instrument that might have done hurt*. For granting that the Hebrew Word in the Text cited by him signifies an² Instrument of Digging or Stabbing, yet if the Intent of the Law

* If the Affirmation or Word of every Particular stood for a legal Evidence in this Case, this great Inconvenience would follow, that any malicious Person (tho' his Credit be no better than his Temper) might, with Impunity, destroy his Neighbour, if he would but give his Word his Neighbour first assaulted him.

⁴ See the Authorities alledged in the first Note of this §. and chiefly Cicero's Orat. pro Milone, Chap. 4. and the Commentators on it.

§ XVIII. 'Then (says Gronovius the Father in his Notes upon Grotius) here is only a bare Fiction of Law, as in the Case of Prescription and Postliminium. But can such a weak Foundation be of Force sufficient to give one Right to slay a Man whose Life he ought to have preserved? We ought rather to hold, that he ought to call for the Assistance of his Fellow Citizens against the Attempts of an unjust Aggressor, and more, that the Laws grant us an extraordinary Protection and special Privileges. Among the antient Scythians, as Justin relates, Lib. 2. Cap. 2. Robbery was a Crime punish'd with the greatest Severity and greatest Reason, because if that had been permitted, what could they have enjoy'd whose Goods consisted in Herds of Cattle, which could never be shut up? For this Reason the driving away of Cattle (Abigeatus) is punish'd more severely even by the Law of God, than Theft, Exod. xxii. 1. altho' the Thing stole be of much greater Value than the Beast. (See Mr. Le Clerc's Notes upon that Text.) So that in the Night, while Men sleep, the Law's awake, as we may say, and when the Proprietors of Goods are less able to take care of themselves and defend their Goods, it deters Thieves by making them apprehensive of a greater Punishment than if they rob in the Day-time. Moreover, 'There is a great Presumption that a Night Thief comes arm'd, and Lawgivers suppose it as a Thing undoubted; for all Things being commonly made fast in the Night, can a Thief be supposed with his Hands only to break thro' a Wall, force open Gates, Chests, and Cupboards? Wherefore for this Reason, because all Things are shut fast, we can't believe that a Thief will come in the Night without Arms and Engines to enter by force a Place which he ought to look upon as a Thing sacred. See Cicero's Orat. pro Domo. Chap. 41.

² Our Author hath reason to doubt, whether במיחורו Bammabbtereth, signifies, with an Instrument to break thro', 'tis more probable it means, in breaking thro', as the LXX and Vulgar translate it. But Mr. Le Clerc has very well observ'd, that it comes much to the same, since none can break thro' a Wall but with an Instrument. We may add with the same Commentator, that this Expression is founded upon the easiness of breaking thro' Walls; for it appears, that heretofore, as well as at this day, that most of the Houses in the East, as well in the Country as Cities, were built with Clay, struck upon Laths placed across, and whited over with Lime. Hence Job, Chap. iv. 19. alludes to it, when he says, That Men dwell in Houses of Clay.

had been as he makes it, 'twould have been much plainer to have said, If he be found with a Weapon. Nor indeed is it, after all, a good Consequence to say, that because the Thief was found arm'd with a Weapon, therefore he came certainly to assault the Life of the Person who kill'd him. No more doth it follow, that because by the Law of the Twelve Tables the Day-thief could not be kill'd, unless he defended himself with his Weapon, therefore there lies a fair Presumption against the nightly Thief that he actually made use of his Weapon in the same manner. For that Law gave Commission to kill the nightly Thief³ without Conditions, and by any Means possible. In after Ages indeed, ⁴ this farther Clause was added to it, Si parcere ei sine periculo suo non potuit, dum rem servare conatur^a: If whilst he endeavours to save his Goods he cannot spare the Robber's Life without manifest Danger. But before this Addition it cannot be prov'd, that a Person stood guilty of Homicide, who had kill'd a nightly Thief, tho' there were Witnesses to prove that the Party slain never brought him into danger of his Life. The Example of a Maid ravish'd in the Field, which Grotius here alledges, is nothing at all to his Purpose: For in that Case, the Law expressly commands us to presume that Violence was offer'd her. But in the Matter we are now concern'd about, we cannot discover that any Presumption of mortal Danger is made or suppos'd by the Laws. As indeed it is not the Business of these purloining Rascals to fight, but to run. Yet after all, we are ready to confess, that a Man who in defence of his Goods only lays hold on the Night-robber (if he can with Safety and Convenience) and carries him before the Magistrate, acts much more generously than if he had unnecessarily depriv'd him of Life^b.

XIX. The last Point usually disputed on this Subject is, whether the Party who first gave and begun an Injury, may fairly resist the other Man when he endeavours to return or to revenge it? Many here take the affirmative side, upon this Reason, that whilst Men undertake to right themselves by their own Pleasure and their own Force, they are seldom very exact in proportioning the Punishment to the Crime. But we conceive the Question ought to be determin'd with more Caution and with more Distinction. The Law of Nature then commands, that he who has injur'd another should offer him Satisfaction: And at the same time it obliges the other Party to pardon the Offender, when he intreats him with Signs^c of Penitence, offering Reparation for past Damages, and Security for his future good Behaviour^e. He therefore that refuses to make Satisfaction, and hereupon resists the Person demanding it, manifestly heaps one Injury upon another. But when a Man refuses to accept fair Satisfaction, when offer'd him, and resolves to prosecute his Revenge by open Arms, in this Case he practises unjust Force, and consequently it can be no Fault to make Resistance against him^d.

See his Probabil. Jur. Lib. 1. c. 9. §. 6.

§. XIX. The Philosopher Arrian says, That the only way to atone for a Crime, is, in his Opinion, to confess it, and shew Repentance; for, adds he, the Fault appears not so great to him that has received it, when the Offender acknowledgeth that he hath done ill, and he hath reason to hope that he will do so no more, because he seems so much troubled for what he has done. Μὴν γὰρ ἐμνηστὸν δεκτὴ ἴασις ἀμαρτίας, ἀμολογεῖν τε ἀμαρτίαν, καὶ δῆλον εἶν ἐπ' αὐτῷ μετάνοια, ὡς τοῖς παθόντων πᾶρα ἔστι πάντη χαλεπὸν τι παθόντων φανόμενα, εἰ δὲ δρῶντος αὐτῷ ἐνυγχαρίη, ὅτι κατὰ ἔθετα, αὐτῷ τε πινυῖς τὸ μέλλον ταύτῳ ἐπιτελεῖ ἀγαθῶν ὑπολειπόμενον, μὴ ποτε ἀν' ὀρθοπλήσιον ἢ ἀμαρτίην, εἰ τοῖς περισσὺν τλημελεθῆσιν ἀχρεῖα σοίσι, De Exposit. Alexand. Lib. 7. cap. 29.

² This hath place chiefly in the Quarrels that happen between two Sovereigns, or two States, only we must observe; that they will not take a slender Reparation for a sufficient Satisfaction, or some Signs of Repentance for Recompence. But as to those Damages which Fellow-citizens do one to another, and for which the Laws prescribe a Satisfaction, it is more easy to determine which of the Contenders shall pay for the Aggressor. Titius Observ. on Pufendorf, CXL. But before I end this Chapter, we shall supply a considerable Omission of our Author, which neither he nor Grotius have taken notice of, and that is, the Right which every one hath to defend his Liberty. Mr. Locke hath proved the Justice and Extent of that Right which all have to defend themselves; However, says he, endeavours to usurp an absolute Power over any one, puts himself into a state of War with him; so that this last can't look upon the Proceedings of the former but as a plain Attempt against his Life. Indeed, from the Moment that a Man labours to bring me into Subjection to him against my Will, I may presume, that if I fall into his Hands, he will treat me as he pleases, and make no scruple to slay me in his Humour. Liberty, if I may so say, is the Bulwark of my Preservation, and the Foundation of all Things that belong to me; so that he that will make me his Slave, authorizes me to repel him all manner of ways, that I may secure my Person and Goods. But here we must carefully distinguish the State of Nature from the Civil State; for 'tis upon this that the extent of our Right, that we have to defend ourselves against them who would bring us into Subjection to them, depends. Man's natural Liberty consists in acknowledging no superior Authority upon Earth, and following the Laws of Nature, without any Dependence upon any other Man. Liberty, in a Civil Society, is not submitting to any Legislative Power but that which is established by the general Consent of the whole Body, nor to any other Government than what they acknowledge, nor to any other Laws than those which the same Legislative Power may make according to the extent of the Right which it hath received. But of this I shall speak more largely elsewhere. See that English Author's Treatise of Civil Government, whose Notions I have mentioned Lib. 2. Chap. 3. & 4. §. 17 & 22.

THE Case of Necessity is a thing in every Body's Mouth, and the force of it generally acknowledged in the World: Hence we commonly say, that it hath no Law, that 'tis a suppos'd or presumptive Exception to all human Ordinances and Constitutions; and that therefore it gives a Right of doing many things otherwise forbidden^a. Now whence this Force or Power arises, and how far it extends, we ought with the more Accuracy to examine; because some Casuists seem to allow it none, or very little Efficacy, as to the Morality of human Actions. But before we proceed to this Enquiry, we may observe in general, that ¹ Tully in his second Book of Invention, c. 57, 58. makes a twofold Necessity, the one simple and absolute, which can by no possible means be resisted, alter'd, or abated; and the other conditional or respective. This again he divides into three kinds, with regard either to Honesty^b, to Safety, or to Convenience. Of which, he says the first is by many degrees the highest, the second of next Moment and Consideration, and the third very much inferior, and not able to stand in Competition with the rest. He proceeds to give it for a Rule, that altho' Honesty be better than Safety, yet in some Cases we may give the Preference to the latter; when what we take from Honesty in the consulting our present Safety may be recover'd and made up by our future Virtue and Integrity: When this cannot be done, Honesty is absolutely to be prefer'd and embrac'd. Others choose to say, that when the Necessity of Safety is prefer'd to the Necessity of Honesty, such a Fact cannot be defended in a direct way, and by any Prescription of Right, but leans wholly on the Excuse which we allow to human Infirmary, and on the Indulgence of our Mercy and Pity. But that Necessity of Convenience is still much weaker, and weighs very little either in the defence or the excuse of Actions; unless when the Cause comes before such a Judge, as hath more regard to his own partial Inclination, than to the Suggestions of Wisdom and to the Demands of Right.

Now our Business on this Subject lies chiefly in examining and stating the Necessity of Safety, and in considering what force it hath to exempt any Action from the Obligation of common Laws: that is, whether we may not sometimes do things forbidden, and omit things commanded by the Laws, when we are (not by our own Fault) cast into such Streights, that we cannot otherwise secure our own Preservation²? And here it is apparent, that the Favour, the Right, the Leave, or whatever it is that in such Cases we attribute to Necessity, doth spring from this single Principle, that it is impossible for a Man not to apply his utmost Endeavour towards preserving himself; and that therefore we cannot easily conceive or suppose, such an Obligation upon him, as ought to outweigh the Desire of his own Safety.

II. No good and pious Man can question, but that GOD Almighty, who is the absolute Master of our Lives, and whose free Bounty gave us the precarious Enjoyment of them, may impose on us so severe a Law, that we ought rather to die, than to recede the least degree from it. Of which kind the Jews took their Law against eating Swine's Flesh to be; as we find in the History of

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. VI.

§. I. ¹ Tully's Words are; Atque etiam hoc mihi videor dicere, esse quasdam cum adjunctione necessitudines, quasdam simplices & absolutas. ——— Puto igitur esse hanc necessitudinem, cui nullâ vi resisti potest; quæ neque mutari, neque leniri potest. ——— Quod adjungitur ——— omni tempore, id pertinebit ——— aut ad honestatem ——— aut ad incolumitatem ——— aut ad commoditatem. ——— Ac summa quidem necessitudo videtur esse honestatis; huic proxima, incolumitatis; tertia, ac levissima, commoditatis: quæ cum his nunquam poterit duabus contendere. Hæc autem inter se sæpe necesse est comparari, ut quamquam præset honestas incolumitati, tamen utri potissimum consulendum sit, deliberetur. ——— Quâ in re fieri poterit, ut cum incolumitati consuluerimus, quod sit in præsentia de honestate delibatum, virtute aliquando & industriâ recuperetur, incolumitatis ratio videbitur habenda: cum autem id non poterit, honestatis. Farther, we must observe, that Necessity which we must suppose always happens without his Fault who is reduced to it, begets a Contest not only between Self-love and Sociableness, but also between Self-love and Religion; as also between the divers Duties of Self-love. The Contest between Self-love and Sociableness happens, when the Persons with whom we ought to have dealt otherwise, have no part in the Necessity to which we are reduced: For our Author hath spoken in the foregoing Chapter of the Contest produced by the Reason of another's Fact, whether malicious, or not. See the Notes on the following Paragraph.

² Either in our Persons or Goods, as it appears from the following part of this Chapter.

the Maccabees. And their Judgment was then indeed right; because as the Case stood with them, to eat that sort of Flesh was look'd on as an open Denial of the true Religion. Whereas, were they under no such hard Circumstances, it was no Sin for a Man to keep himself from starving by feeding on this forbidden Meat, when no other could be procur'd. Sometimes too by the Authority of a Civil Sovereign, Men may receive so strict and rigorous Commands, that they must rather part with their Lives, than omit the Duty enjoin'd them. But the Obligation of Positive Laws is not always presum'd to be so harsh and severe. For in as much as the Authors of these, or of any other Rules and Constitutions in the World, chiefly design'd by them to promote the Safety or Convenience of Mankind, we may suppose them, generally speaking, to have had before their Eyes the weak Condition of human Nature; and to have reflected on the Impossibility which every Man lies under, not to avoid, and to drive off, all things that aim at his Destruction. Upon this account then, ' most Laws, especially those which we call Positive, are judg'd to except the Cases of Necessity; that is, not to oblige, when the Obervance of them must be attended with some Evil, destructive of our Nature, or exceeding the ordinary Patience and Constancy of human Minds: Unless when this very Case is included plainly in the Injunction, either by express mention, or because the Nature of the Business cuts off all Exception and Reserve. Hence it is clear, that no such Power ought to be attributed to Necessity, as that it should give us the Privilege of directly violating a Law, or of committing a Sin; but we only presume from the favourable Intention of Legislators, and from the Consideration of the Nature of Man, that the Case of Necessity is not comprehended under the general Terms of a Law. An Instance of this our Saviour himself hath been pleas'd to give us, in David's eating the Show-bread^a, intimating, that the Matter and the Reason of the Law which forbid that Action in general, could not be suppos'd to have any such rigorous Design, as that a Man ought rather to die with Hunger, than to touch the consecrated Food^b.

It is plain then, that as to positive Laws this Privilege of Necessity is admitted and allow'd: But 'tis a Point much more difficult to determine, whether the same Favour can take place in^c the Laws of Nature; that is, whether in necessary Cases we may fairly omit what is naturally commanded, or perform what is naturally forbidden? As for the first Question, it appears from the Nature of affirmative Precepts, that whenever they oblige a Man to the actual exerting of such a Performance as is enjoin'd, they at the same time suppose him to have Opportunity, Subject, and Power of acting: But now we may fairly judge these Conditions to be wanting, when I cannot do a thing without the Loss of my Life. Since to throw off the Love and Care of ourselves, is justly rank'd amongst impossible Attempts; or however amongst such as surpass the common Strength of Mens Souls. Therefore, unless it either be expressly and particularly provided by the Law, or deducible from the Quality of the Business to be undertaken, that I must rather lay down my Life than omit the Duty, all affirmative Edicts of Nature may be understood to except the Case of extreme Necessity: Especially when a Man hath not fallen under such Necessity through his own Neglect and Default. Thus I

^a See Matt. xii. 4. Add. Casaubon Exercitat. ad Baron. 1. n. 9.

§. II. ¹ Otherwise, as Mr. Thomasius observes, the publick Good redounds from the Good of private Persons; and for the most part, the Preservation of a private Person is more advantageous to the State, than the Observation of any human Law. Instit. Jurispr. Div. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. §. 131.

² We must say the same thing of Injunctions to keep Days of Festival, to which our Author's Words refer, Necessitas ferias caret, out of Pallad. de Re Rustic. Lib. 1. Chap. 6. Necessity makes no Holidays.

³ These Principles are most exact, and proper to decide all Questions which can be propos'd in this Matter; they are borrow'd from Titius's Observ. CXXI. and partly from Thomasius's Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. §. 130. &c. For we must distinguish between the Laws which concern God, and those that relate to Men. As to the first of these, we may lay down these two Rules; 1. That always when in doing or not doing a certain Action, we shew directly, or indirectly, some Contempt of the Divine Majesty; the Law which forbid, or orders this Action otherwise, admits of no Exception in Cases of Necessity; for in this last Case, the Nature of the Thing itself makes it evident, that no Man ought to preserve his own Life by any thing whereby God is dishonour'd. 2. But if in doing, or not doing a certain Action, we do not directly, or indirectly, shew any Contempt of the divine Majesty, the Law which forbids, or orders that Action otherwise, does not indispensibly oblige, in a Case of extreme Necessity; for then the Glory of God not suffering any Affront, his infinite Goodness will not allow us to presume, that he will not oblige us to expose our Lives needlessly, or our Goods. So that when we cannot commit any Action positively by the Law of Nature, without shewing at least indirectly some Contempt of the Supreme Legislator, these sort of negative Laws admit of no Exception in the Case of Necessity; and so much the more, if we do not find ourselves reduced to this Dilemma, either to die, or break some negative Maxim of the natural Law, which thro' the Violence of him that proposes it, either formally, or by Interpretation, may make us condemn the Authority of the Supreme Legislator. Wherefore we must resolve rather to die, than lie (for Example) with our Mother, or slay a Person whom we know to be innocent. See what we have said upon Lib. 1. Chap. 5. §. 9. Note 2. But we may, to avoid a great Evil, with which we are threaten'd by an unjust Aggressor, promise something, even with an Oath, without Intention of swearing, or contracting by such a forced Act, any valid Obligation; for in that Case 'tis neither a true Oath nor Promise; and he that forces us unjustly, does it only because he thinks we have a greater Respect to the Deity, otherwise he would not value it; so far is he from engaging us to violate our Duty, that he would be much troubled that we should. See what is said Lib. 4. Ch. 2. §. 8. As for such Actions as are forbidden by some positive divine Law, as they are otherwise indifferent in themselves, the Exception of the Case of Necessity hath place, or not, in that respect, according as in doing of them we shew, or not, some Contempt of the divine Majesty, which must be judg'd of by Circumstances. The first is seen in the Example of David, and the other in the seven Brethren spoken of in the History of the Maccabees, upon which our Author reasons well. As to the natural affirmative Laws, which concern the Divinity, Mr. Titius believes with Mr. Thomasius, that they do not indispensibly oblige to an outward positive Worship, whose Omission may be a sign of such a Contempt. See what is said upon Chap. IV. of this Book, §. 3. Note 2. But altho' some Acts of outward Worship are expressly commanded by some positive Law, we are not oblig'd to practise them in the Case of extreme Necessity, unless the Omission passes for an open, or tacit Abjuration of the Religion which we esteem true, as in the Case of Daniel, Chap. vi. ver. 10. or when it shews a Contempt of the Divinity directly or indirectly, which does not commonly happen. I shall speak in Note 5. of the Privileges of Necessity, with relation to the Duties which concern Men themselves.

am not bound to furnish an hungry Person with Bread, when I want it for my own Sustainance^a; or to help a Man that is drowning, when I cannot save him without losing myself. Seneca's Resolution is good in both Cases, I will give (says he)^b to those that are in need; but so as not to put my self in the same needy Condition: I will succour those who are ready to perish; but so as not to expose my self to certain Ruin.

As for the negative Precepts, or the Prohibitions of natural Laws, this in the first place is most certain, that no Necessity can make it allowable for us to undertake an Action directly dishonouring Almighty GOD, as suppose to blaspheme or to deny him, and renounce his Worship and Service, tho' for the avoiding of present Death. For in as much as GOD is able to inflict on a Man a much more grievous Evil than natural Death can be imagin'd to be, our Reason doth with good Probability assure us, that he will requite us with a much more noble Happiness, when we part with our Lives for his Sake: On the other hand, it would be absurd, as well as impious, to sin against the Divine Honour for the escaping of a lesser Evil, than what he incurs by such an Offence^c. Yet the unhappy Case of those who yield to the Force and Violence of Tortures, is not altogether unworthy of our Pity.

Concerning those Laws which contain the mutual Duties^d of Men, it may be first observ'd, that some of these natural Precepts do presuppose some Human Deed or Institution; which, as may be gather'd from its End and Purport, not extending to the Case of extreme Necessity, the same Exception may be fairly understood in the Law. And then we may remark farther, that a Man cannot be said by his own Act immediately to have violated a Law, unless the Act can be rightly imputed to him. Now an Act may proceed from a Man two ways, either as he is the Principal, or as he is the Instrumental Cause of it. And this Instrumental Cause is again of two kinds, either as it exercises no Motion but what is impress'd on it by the principal Cause, and against its own natural Inclination, if it have any; or, as it applies itself upon its own proper and internal Impulse to such a Performance, tho' the Influence and the Direction of the first Cause do likewise assist in the Operation. If then a Man be, according to this latter way, Instrumental in an Act, the Act may not only be imputed to the principal Cause, but also to him, as his true and proper Work. But if he be instrumental or concurrent only in the former manner, the Act shall not be imputed to him, but only to the principal Agent. What farther Conditions are requisite to this Case shall hereafter be^e more largely explain'd.

III. Thus much being premised, we may go on to discuss the particular Cases and Questions usually disputed on this Head. In reference then to a Man's self, tho' otherwise he hath no such Right and Power over his Members, as to destroy, to distort, or to maim them at his Pleasure; yet it shall be lawful for him to cut off a Limb, that is either possess'd by an incurable Gangrene, or that is rendred useles by a Wound; in the former Case^f, to keep the whole Body from perishing, or the sound Parts from being infected, and in the latter, that the use of the other Members be not hindered by the Clog of an unserviceable and cumbersome Appendage. Whether the extreme Necessity doth farther give a Man any Right over his own Life, that is, whether for the escaping a ^e First, as often as in doing any Action otherwise forbidden, with relation to another, or ourselves, we find a sure way to avoid some great Danger, without falling into some greater Evil, or equal to that from which we keep ourselves, the Law permits an Exception of the Case of Necessity. 2. But if the Performance of the like Action is no surer way of escaping the Danger, and the Evil which may redound from it, appears greater, or equal, the Law does not allow the Exception of a Case of Necessity. By sure means we understand those which have a natural and necessary Power to remove the Danger wherewith we are threaten'd, and not a pure arbitrary Force, which depends upon the Fancy of him who has brought himself into that Necessity; for in the first Case 'tis divine Providence which affords Means to deliver out of Danger, whereas in the other 'tis the Malice of Man, and such a Malice as intends either directly, or indirectly, to oblige us to disobey the Magistrate. We may add, that the Certainty of the Means of which we are speaking, is not an absolute and infallible Certainty, and such as ought to be understood in a negative Sense, rather than a positive, i. e. in such sort, that without such a Means we are lost, and are not sure we shall escape if we put them in practice. A Man, for Example, who is pursued, may be at length convicted, but to make his Escape, runs in haste upon a Cripple who stands in his Way, this is no hindrance but that he might make his Way, altho' he did some great Damage to him who was not able to retire, for Nature allows every one to maintain his Ground as long as he can. As for the great Injury which may arise from that to which Necessity leads us, it ought also to be measured physically, for we neither can, nor ought to compare the moral Evil which may be on the one side, or the other, because that's the Thing in question. Provided therefore that there be no Fault in him who is in danger, which must always be supposed here, the Circumstances observed are sufficient to enable us to make a probable Conjecture of the Will of GOD; for the Law of Nature without Contradiction tends to the Happiness of Mankind, and when we can be probably delivered from a great Evil by exposing ourselves to a lesser, we have Reason to choose the latter. But if the Evil which we embrace, is equal to that from which we fly, and we cannot otherwise promise ourselves any Certainty of avoiding the Danger by that means, in this Case nothing can dispense with our Obedience. See Mr. Titius's Observ. CXLII. As to the Affirmative Precepts of the Law of Nature, which refer to another, our Author has treated of them well enough.

^f See Lib. VIII. Chap. 1. §. 6. and what I shall say upon it contrary to our Author's Notions.

§. III. ! We may in this place apply the Principles laid down in Note 4. of the precedent §. Indeed the loss of a Member is without Contradiction a lesser Evil than the Loss of Life, and is also a sure Means to keep ourselves from Danger. The same Thing hath place, as any one may see, in the Cases where to save a more noble and necessary Member, we are contented to be deprived of one less considerable and useful. But we ought to observe, 1. That it is sufficient here to suppose a bare Permission, there being but few Men who have Courage sufficient to bear such a painful Operation as the cutting off a Member dangerously affected is, and therefore had rather die of their Wounds in ease. 2. That Necessity to which we were reduced ought not to be understood in its utmost rigor. So that when we have in some manner contributed by our own Fault to put ourselves into such an Extremity, we may not lawfully, to retrieve our Affairs, resolve upon a thing otherwise unlawful. See Mr. Titius's Observ. CXLII.

Death of Ignominy or of Torture, he may lay hold on more gentle Means of leaving the World, we have enquir'd and stated in the preceding Chapter. We may proceed therefore to examine what Right necessity can give us over others. To feed on Man's Flesh in the desperate Extremity of Famine, when no other Suttenance can be procur'd, is a lamentable, indeed, but not a sinful Expedient. But as for those Instances, when in distress and want of all Provisions, Men have been kill'd to preserve their Fellows, either by Compulsion and against their Consent, or else by the Determination of Lot, the Decision of them is a Point of some Difficulty and Uncertainty. Inasmuch as whatever the Law against Murthier suggests on one side, the sharpness of Hunger pleads as loud on the other, and the Belly, that Advocate without Ears: Especially, considering that unless this unhappy Means was made use of, the whole Company must have inevitably perish'd. This is one of those Cases in which a Man ought to die rather than commit the Fact, it being directly contrary to the Laws both of God and Nature²². To this purpose we have a Story of seven Englishmen, who being toss'd in the main Ocean without Meat or Drink, kill'd one of their Number, on whom the Lot fell, and who had the Courage not to be dissatisfied, assuaging, in some measure with his Body, their intolerable and almost famish'd Condition: Whom when they at last came to shore, the Judges absolv'd of the Crime of Murthier. Ziegler upon Grotius^b, giving this Relation, is of opinion, That the Men were all guilty of a great Sin, for conspiring against the Life of one in the Company, and (if it should so happen) every one against his own; thus regarding bodily Peril more than the Danger of their Souls: That no one ought to have set so little a Value on his Life, as to lose it for satisfying the Hunger of the rest: And that the rest ought not to have been so cruel to their Fellow, in compliment to their own Stomachs. But to this it might be answer'd, that 'tis too harsh and rigorous a Censure, to say that those Men conspire against the Life of another, who agree to take the Chance of dying one of them, for preserving the Lives of all the rest^c. And consequently they could put their Souls into no danger by this unfortunate Resolution. Nor is the Charge of undervaluing their Lives any better grounded; since he only can fall under this Imputation, who throws himself away without Necessity. Nor, in the third place, doth there lie any Objection of Cruelty, when the Person dying for the Safety of his Companions, receives the Instrument of Death with less Grief and Reluctancy than the others apply it. There is another Case worth examining,³ suppose in a Shipwreck more Men leap into the little Boat than it is able to carry, and the Boat belongs to no one by a more peculiar Right than to the rest; whether they may not fairly draw Lots who shall be cast over-board; and whether if any one refuse thus to take his Chance, he may not be thrown out without farther Deliberation, as one that seeks the Destruction of the whole Company? But these Cases being such as very rarely fall out,⁴ we choose at present to suspend our positive Judgment concerning them.

IV. This may more frequently happen, that two Persons being under imminent Danger of their Lives, both must unavoidably perish, unless one of them, for his own Deliverance, hastens, by some Act, the Fate of the other, which would however have soon arriv'd: Or, that upon necessity we may bring on another, indirectly, the danger of Death, or of some grievous Hurt; not designing to harm him, but only to exercise such an Act as may probably prove mischievous to him; at the same time desiring any other way to get rid of our Necessity and Streights, and endeavouring, as far as lies in our Power, to make the Damage fall light on the Suffering Party. Now this kind of hurt, as we judge it not to cause any Sin in the Giver, so we think the Receiver ought to look on it as purely an accidental Evil, upon account of which he has no reason to be angry at the Author. Let us consider an Instance or two of both Cases. If I, being a skilful Swimmer, fall into deep Waters with another utterly ignorant of that Art, and he, as the usual way is, clings fast about me, who am not able to drag out both Burthens; who will blame me for using all my Strength to get rid of him, and so to prevent my own Death, tho' perhaps I could, with hard shift, have held him some few Minutes above Water? So in a Wreck⁵, if I have taken Possession of a Plank which will not hold two, and another swimming towards me, shall endeavour to throw himself upon it, to the Destruction of us both; there seems to be no Reason why I should not apply the utmost Violence in keeping

²² Mr. Titius, Observ. CXLIV. thinks it neither unlawful, nor of an indispensable Obligation, but he says, "That they who are reduced to this Extremity, ought not nevertheless to resolve upon a Thing so sad and inhuman; for altho' commonly the Affections of Men one to another, especially such as are neither Parents nor Friends, are very cool, yet when they are involved in any common Danger, the Sense of that naturally awakens our Thoughts of Humanity and Compassion, which make us choose rather to die ourselves, or wait the unforeseen Events of Divine Providence, than have recourse to such an irksome and barbarous Expedient, by which we are not yet sure that we shall save our Lives."

³ In truth, the Master of the Shallop doth not seem to be obliged to draw Lots with the others, which he permitted lovingly to come into it, and consequently he might make them cast Lots to save himself.

⁴ Our Author determines it by saying, It seems so to me, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. Chap. 5. §. 22.

§. IV. ¹ But if that other being stronger than I, drive me from my Plank, the Necessity of saving his Life will not excuse him, because he brings upon me as great an Evil directly, as that he saves himself from. Moreover, I am here the first in time, the Plank belonged to me by the Right of the first Occupant, and so he could not drive me from it without Injustice. We must say the same Thing of a Man, who, when an Army is routed, will seize upon an Horse which belongs to a wounded Person, and leaves him infallibly expos'd to the Fury of the Enemy, to save his own Life the more certainly. These are the two Cases mention'd by Lactantius, in the Place above quoted, Chap. 3. §. 11. Note 2.

him off. And thus likewise if two Men are pursued hard by an Enemy, bringing Death in his Hand, if both cannot be saved, one of them may, for his own Security, either by breaking down a Bridge, or shutting a Gate after him, leave the other in imminent Danger of being kill'd. This kind of Necessity often happens in War; where 'tis a Rule, that at any time some few are to be left in distress for securing the main Body. *Arrian de Expedit. Alex. Lib. vi. c. 25. Compare Livy, Lib. xxvi. 15. Where the Thurini made a wicked and treacherous Use of this Pretence. Florus (Lib. ii. c. 18.) says of the Numantines, At length they enter'd into a Resolution of Flight: But this their Wives prevented, by cutting in pieces the Harness of their Horses; committing a base Cruelty thro' an Extremity of Love. Tacitus (Ann. xiv. c. 32, 33.) censures it as the Effect of ill Conduct, or of Treachery, that when the Romans were besieg'd in Camolodunum, Non motis senibus & feminis juvenus sola restiterit; the young and able Men did not throw out the Women, and Persons useless through Age, and so clearing the Place make it more capable of Defence. (Add. Livy, Lib. v. c. 40.) On the contrary, he tells us in the same Story, that Suetonius resolv'd to hazard the Loss of one Town for the Security of the whole Province; and therefore he would not be mov'd by the Cries and Intreaties of those who begg'd him to stay and protect them: But giving the Sign for marching, he receiv'd all into his Troops that were willing and able to follow him; and as for those whom either the Weakness of their Sex, or the Burthen of their Age hinder'd from stirring, they were left to the Mercy of the Barbarians. Yet Darius in Quintus Curtius, Lib. iv. c. 16. when Things were not brought to desperate Extremity, bravely refus'd to break down the Bridge of the River Lycus, which he had pass'd with some part of an Army in a Retreat; making this generous Declaration, That he had rather give a Passage to those that pursu'd, than take it from those that fled.

An Instance³ of the other Case which we mention'd in general, may be this: Suppose a Person of more Strength than myself follows me close with Intention to kill me, and I meet one in a narrow Passage, thro' which I must take my Flight; if upon my Request he will not get out of the way, or if he has not Time or Room to stand off, I may throw him down and run over him, tho' the Fall, in all probability, will be very grievous and hurtful to him: Unless he be such an one as, by virtue of some peculiar Obligation, I am bound at any time to serve voluntarily with my own Danger. And if the Person who thus stops my Flight be not able to look to himself upon my calling to him, as suppose a lame Man or a Child, I shall certainly deserve excuse, if I attempt to leap over him (either being on Horseback or a foot) rather than to fall into my Enemy's Hands by my Delay. As for that other Example, which some give, it plainly appears not to be without Fault: The Case is this, ⁴ A Captain flying from a Battle, and being closely follow'd by the Enemy, one of his Men happening to be got just before him in the Crowd, he runs him thro' to get off with the more Expedition. Now here the Captain was strong enough to have made his way only by pushing down the Fellow that stopp'd him, and therefore ought not to have us'd so violent Means. Yet if in getting by him he had undesignedly hurt him with his Arms, the Mischance would have been very pardonable. But in case a Man either out of a frolicksome, or a cruel and barbarous Humour, stops me on purpose, and refuses to make room for me to escape, I may presently use him as an Enemy, and thrust him down by any means I can, how much soever he is like to suffer by the Bruise². To conclude this Point, as the declining Death any way admits of much Favour and Excuse, so if the Danger offer'd be no more than a Maiming, or a grievous Wound, and we fly from it with the Hurt of those that chance to stop us, the Fact will bear much the same Apology or Defence. For he who offers such a Violence may be resisted, as much as if he directly attempted to murder us; and when we are compell'd to consult our Safety by Flight, the Consternation we must needs lie under vindicates our Innocence, as to any sudden and unfortunate Accident that we chance to trespass in.

V. Let us enquire in the next place, whether the Necessity of preserving our Life can give us any Right over other Mens Goods; so as to make it allowable for us to seize on them for our Relief, either secretly, or by open Force, against the Owner's Consent. For the more clear and solid Determination of which Point, we think it necessary to hint in short on the Causes upon which distinct Proprieties were first introduc'd in the World; designing to examine them more at large in their proper Place^a. Now the main Reasons on which Proprieties are founded, we take to be these two, that the Feuds and Quarrels might be appeas'd which arose in the Primitive Communion of Things, and that Men might be put under a kind of Necessity of being industrious, every one being to get his Maintenance by his own Application and Labour. This Division therefore of Goods was not made, that every Person should sit idly brooding over the share of Wealth he had got, without assisting or serving his Fellows; but that any one might dispose of his Things how he pleas'd, and if he thought fit to communicate them to others, he might at least be thus furnish'd with an Opportunity of laying Obligations on the rest of Mankind. Hence when Proprieties were once establish'd, Men obtain'd a Power not only of exercising Commerce to their mutual Advantage and Gain, but likewise of dispensing more largely in the Works of Humanity and Beneficence; whence their Diligence had procur'd them a greater Share of Goods than others: Whereas before, when all Things lay in common, Men could lend one another no Assistance but what was supply'd by their corporal Ability, and could be charitable of nothing but of their Strength^b. Farther, such is the Force of Propriety, that the Proprietor hath a Right of delivering his Goods with his own Hands; even such as he is oblig'd to give to others. Whence it follows, that when one Man has any thing owing from another, he is not presently to seize on it at a venture, but ought to apply himself to the Owner, desiring to receive it from his Disposal. Yet in case the other Party refuse thus to make good his Obligation, the Power and Privilege of Propriety doth not reach so far as that the Things may not be taken away without the Owner's Consent, either by the Authority of the Magistrate in Civil Communities, or in a State of Nature by Violence and hostile Force. And tho' in regard to bare Natural Right, for a Man to relieve another in Extremity with his Goods, for which he himself hath not so much occasion, be a Duty obliging only imperfectly, and not in the manner of a Debt, since it arises wholly from the Virtue of Humanity; yet there seems to be no reason why by the additional Force of a Civil Ordinance, it may not be turn'd into a strict and perfect Obligation. And this Selden observes to have been done among the Jews: Who, upon a Man's refusing to give such Alms as was proper for him, could force him to it by an Action at Law. 'Tis no wonder therefore, that they should forbid their Poor on any account to seize on the Goods of others, enjoining them to take only what private Persons, or the publick Officers, or Stewards of Alms should give them on their Petition. Whence the stealing of what was another's, tho' upon extreme Necessity, pass'd in that State for Theft or Rapine. But now supposing under another Government the like good Provision is not made for Persons in want, supposing likewise that the covetous Temper of Men of Substance cannot be prevail'd on to give relief, and that the needy Creature is not able, either by his Work or Service, or by making Sale of any thing that he possesses, to assist his present Necessity, must he therefore perish with Famine? Or can any human Institution bind me with such a force, that in case another Man neglects his Duty towards me, I must rather die, than recede a little from the ordinary and the regular way of acting? We conceive therefore, that such a Person doth not contract the Guilt of Theft, who happening, not through his own Fault, to be in extreme Want, either of necessary Food, or of Cloaths to preserve him from the Violence of Weather², and cannot obtain them from the voluntary Gift of the Rich, either by urgent Intreaties, or by offering somewhat equivalent in Price, or by engaging to work it out, shall either forcibly or privily relieve himself out of their Abundance; especially if he do it with full Intention to pay the Value of them, whenever his better Fortune gives him Ability. Some Men deny that such a Case of Necessity, as we speak of, can possibly happen. But what if a Man should wander in a Foreign Land, unknown, friendless, and in want, spoil'd of all he had by Shipwreck, or by Robbers, or having lost by some Casualty whatever he was worth in his own Country; should none be found willing either to relieve his Distress, or to hire his Service, and should they rather (as it commonly happens) seeing him in a good Garb, suspect him to beg without Reason, must the poor Creature starve³ in this miserable Condition? It may be objected indeed, that in Proverbs vi. 30, 31. he is call'd a Thief, and pronounced obnoxious to the Penalty of Theft, who steals only to satisfy his Hunger. But whoever closely views and considers that Text, will find that the Thief there censur'd is neither in such extreme Necessity, as we are now supposing, nor seems to have fallen into his needy Condition merely by ill Fortune, without his own Idleness or Default: For the Context implies, that he had a House and ² If in a Case of Necessity a Man may innocently do some Wrong to another in his Person, so far as to put him in danger of his Life to save his own, by a much stronger Reason will he be permitted, in like Cases, to take away or destroy the Goods of another, which are of much less Value than Life and Members. Thomas. Instit. Jurisprud. Div. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. §. 168. Note 1. and Titius's Observ. CXLVII.

² Comp. Laëtant. Institut. l. 5. c. 17. which some have vainly oppos'd to the Opinion here deliver'd.

³ These sort of Cases have no Difficulty in them, for he treats of the Affirmative Precepts of the Law of Nature, which oblige not when there is no occasion of practising them, and much more in a Case of Necessity, in which we can't practise them, but at the Expence of our own Preservation. See Mr. Titius, Observ. CXLV.

⁴ It is easy to see, that the Action here alledged is not innocent. This Officer might have made way for himself forcibly, by thrusting the Soldier aside, but if he had hurt him with his Arms undesignedly, he was excused.

³ Mr. Hertius has alledged an Example here, which is this; when the Magistrate, in a great Scarcity of Provisions, conspires with those that will not open their Granaries, that they may sell their Corn the dearer, or at least he neglects to hinder Monopolies, and punish the barbarous Cruelty of those, who to enrich themselves, care not how many Men they bring to Beggary.

Goods sufficient to make ⁴ sevenfold Restitution; which he might have either sold or pawn'd; a Chapman or Creditor being easily to be met with in Times of Plenty and Peace. For we have no Grounds to think, that the Fact there mention'd is suppos'd to be committed, either in the Time of War, or upon account of the extraordinary Price of Provisions. Besides, this Thief was faulty on another Account: For if he had not wherewithal to maintain himself, the Laws oblig'd him to sell himself for a Slave ^a.
